This has been a useful debate and I hope that the Minister has received the message loud and clear that we want good, strong, independent and lay representation on the SIB when it is finally established. In due course, as has been said, we shall have the designating order debate and during it we shall raise hell if we do not have the sort of representation that we have been seeking this morning and in previous debates during the Bill's passage. It is with that promise that I am happy to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Lords amendment: No. 439, in page 160, line 2, at end insert—

"(2) The arrangements must make provision for the investigation of complaints in respect of authorised persons to be carried out in appropriate cases independently of the agency and those persons.".

11.30 am

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment implements the assurance given on Report in another place that the Government would bring forward an amendment requiring a designated agency to have arrangements for the independent investigation of complaints against authorised persons. The amendment requires such independent investigation only "in appropriate cases". As I think Lord Morton recognised when moving a similar amendment concerning SROs on Report in another place, it would not be desirable to require all complaints to be the subject of independent investigation. It may be quicker and easier to resolve some complaints in other ways, but it is right that an investor should normally have recourse to an independent person if his complaint has reached the designated agency—the top supervisory body in the system—and has still not been satisfactorily resolved. I am glad to say that the SIB is in any case planning to set up an ombudsman system. I welcome this move. The amendment will make some such arrangement a requirement if powers are to be transferred to a designated agency. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Gould: The use of mandatory language in the amendment is clearly the consequence of pressure put upon the Government in another place. For that reason, it may be appropriate at this stage to pay tribute to their Lordships in that they, like the Standing Committee, have done what they could—it has been a substantial element—to make the Bill a better piece of legislation. The amendment is part of that overall achievement.

The fact that a mandatory requirement has been imposed on the SIB with a permissive requirement applying to the SROs means that we should ask how the Minister envisages those provisions reacting with each other. Does he foresee, as clearly we must, the SIB setting up its ombudsman procedure, in effect removing from the SROs the need to do similarly? In other words, the permissive power seems unlikely to be used, and it would be useful if the Minister would confirm that that is his view.

How does the Minister think that the ombudsman procedure being set up by the SIB will work? Is it, to use the phrase of the insurance ombudsman, whom I had the good fortune to meet yesterday, a powered ombudsman—an ombudsman with the power, conferred presumably with the agreement of the contributing parties—to award sums of money by way of compensation and to apply other remedies? Or is it to be an ombudsman who simply makes recommendations which he hopes will be acted upon?

In the light of the discussions that we have already had on matters such as McDonald Wheeler, how does the Minister see the remedy fitting into what is by now—I make no complaint of this—a proliferation of potential remedies available to aggrieved investors? It would also be welcome if the Minister would say briefly whether there is anything in the work of his Department that would offer some crumb of comfort to investors who may have lost money as a result of the collapse of McDonald Wheeler.

Mr. Nelson: Two points cause me some disquiet. The first is the general point that, while I understand the import of what my hon. and learned Friend the Minister said, I remain a little concerned that we may in some way be detracting from the prime responsibility of the SIB to undertake inquiries and investigations. We are setting up the SIB, as we are the SROs, with the clear duty to investigate cases of abuse and dereliction of duty by authorised persons.

If we are to insist, as the amendment does, that arrangements must also be made for the investigation of complaints to be carried out in certain instances by bodies other than the designated agency—the SIB in this instance, or, in the previous amendment, the SROs—are we diluting or circumventing the responsibility of the SIB to investigate?

I should be happier if the SIB had that responsibility. I do not see many instances in which there would be a conflict of interest or where the integrity and objectivity of the SIB in making investigations could be brought into question. If it could, something would have to be done about the SIB, its composition, its officials and mechanisms for investigations.

I am not clear in what instances an independent, separate body from the SIB, over which we have no legislative control and which is not established by law, would have a preferential right to conduct an investigation, as opposed to the SIB. I am not convinced of the necessity or wisdom of diluting the investigatory arrangements that we have hitherto granted to the SIB.

Secondly, hon. Members will be aware that in Committee we made some important changes, not only to the status of the SIB, but to its investigative powers and its powers to prosecute offenders. One of the important changes that we made was to ensure that the SIB was able to investigate unauthorised as well as authorised persons. The reason for that is that there is no point in being able to investigate just the good guys, and not the bad guys.

It must be possible to respond to a complaint from a member of the public or a practitioner that somebody is ostensibly carrying on an unauthorised investment business which, remember, under the Bill, is a criminal offence. Before those amendments, the SIB, which, ostensibly, is the overall regulatory body, was not able to undertake an investigation of an unauthorised—criminal—concern which was holding itself out as an investment business and possibly defrauding substantial numbers of the public. The SIB is now able to investigate allegations that a business or individual is carrying on an unauthorised investment concern.

I mention that because schedule 5, paragraph 4, to which the amendment applies, says:

"The agency must have effective arrangements for the investigation of complaints arising out of the conduct of investment business by authorised persons"— it does not say "and unauthorised persons"—

"or against any recognised self-regulating organisation, professional body, investment exchange or clearing house."

The amendment says:

"The arrangements must make provision for the investigation of complaints in respect of authorised persons to be carried out in appropriate cases independent of the agency and those persons."

So the schedule and the amendment insist that the SIB should have effective mechanisms for investigating authorised concerns.

As we have given—rightly—the SIB the power to investigate authorised concerns, surely it should have as effective mechanisms for investigating unauthorised concerns. If it is proper, as the amendment implies, that that can also be done independently of SIB, such an independent body should also have effective measures and means of investigating unauthorised and criminal concerns.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) welcomed the mandatory nature of the amendment, which contrasts with the permissive nature of an earlier matter. However, it seems to me that this is not entirely mandatory, because the mandatory nature is purely that provision should be required to be made, and it depends on what may be an appropriate case. Who will be the judge of what is an appropriate case? Is the SIB to judge whether a case is appropriate for independent machinery or whether it will carry out the investigation itself? Will that responsibility fall on the Secretary of State? Can the complainant decide what is an appropriate case? The matter is not entirely clear, and I would be grateful if my hon. and learned Friend the Minister would clarify it.

Mr. Cash: I wish to associate myself with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) in his extremely interesting and useful intervention, which supported many of the points made in Committee. I should like to add a gloss to them.

The arrangements under Lords amendment No. 439 provide for "the investigation of complaints in respect of authorised persons to be carried out in appropriate cases independently of the agency."

That continues the theme which we have, rightly, come back to over and over again during the debate — the importance of an independent assessment.

Paragraph 4 of schedule 5, headed "Investigation of complaints", draws a distinction, which is that "The agency must have effective arrangements for the investigation of complaints" in respect of

"authorised persons or against any recognised self-regulating organisation, professional body, investment exchange or clearing house."

Whereas Lords amendment No. 439 deals with independent arrangements in respect of authorised persons, we do not have independent arrangements in respect of the SROs, professional bodies, investment exchanges or clearing houses in the same terms.

Earlier I referred to the possible problem of blackballing within what could be described as a cosy club. I hope that that will never be the case. That could create severe difficulties and an independent investigation would be required into the activities of an SRO. We touched on that matter earlier, and I had an assurance from my hon. and learned Friend, for which I was extremely grateful. That point has not been included in the Lords amendment to paragraph 4. I fall back on the assurance that my hon. and learned Friend has given to deal with this substantial point. If people are to have the confidence that they should have in the SROs, they should know that the independence will be combined with a determination not to blackball people unreasonably.

Mr. Howard: I shall endeavour to deal with the various points raised in this interesting debate. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) asked about the relationship between this provision and the fact that there is not a similar provision for SROs. The position is, indeed, as he suggested was likely to be the case, that the compulsory requirement for the agency to have an ombudsman system applicable to all authorised persons removes the need for the recognised body to be obliged to set up its own ombudsman system. It is free to do so, if it wishes, as one way of meeting the requirement to have effective arrangements for investigating complaints. The precise way in which the ombudsman scheme would work is a matter for the SIB. It would be for the board to work out the details in relation to the various points that the hon. Gentleman has made.

On the implications of this proposal for the McDonald Wheeler case, I imagine that the hon. Gentleman would, on reflection, agree that the real answer lies in the compensation arrangements rather than in this provision. It may well be that there would be matters of complaint which could be appropriately investigated by an ombudsman, but the important safeguard for the victims of the McDonald Wheeler case when the Bill's regime is in place lies in the compensation provisions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) asked about the circumstances in which it would be appropriate for complaints of this nature to be made, and he expressed the concern that in some way the SIB's status and functions would be diluted by the provisions of this independent investigation mechanism. With respect, his concern is unfounded. What is here provided is an additional mechanism within the Bill's structure. If a complaint against an authorised person has made its way up the system and has been investigated by the SIB, but not to the satisfaction of the complainant, there may well be an advantage in having the additional facility of an investigation by an independent body of the type that we are discussing. That would maximise the extent to which a complainant could be satisfied that his complaint was being thoroughly and properly investigated.

My hon. Friend's second point is that these particular provisions are restricted to complaints against authorised persons. It is right that they should be so restricted. This provision relates to the scheme at the heart of the Bill. It is appropiate that the independent mechanism should be restricted to complaints against authorised persons. That is not to say that there will not have to be effective mechanisms for the implementation of the provisions, for which my hon. Friend was to some extent responsible during the passage of the legislation and which extended the ability of the SIB to investigate unauthorised persons. That remains and is not in any way impaired by these provisions. It will be necessary for the SIB to provide an effective mechanism for investigating unauthorised persons. That is one of the matters to be taken into account by the Secretary of State at the time of designation. I do not think that it is necessary for there to be this precise form of independent investigation of complaints against unauthorised persons.

Mr. Nelson: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister for what he has said. He made an important statement. He has said—it certainly does not say this in the legislation — that the SIB will have to have effective measures for investigating unauthorised persons. That is implicit in the amendment that has been passed. I suspect that the matter may have been overlooked as almost a consequential amendment to that amendment, but we should have added in the schedule the investigation of unauthorised as well as authorised persons. As the legislation stands, there is a duty on the SIB to have a mechanism only for investigating authorised persons. I hope that what my hon. and learned Friend has said will be taken note of by SIB.

Mr. Howard: I am not sure that my hon. Friend is correct in that. Clause 92 provides for effective mechanisms to be provided for the investigation of unauthorised persons. That is not dealt with in schedule 5. It is concerned with establishing an independent mechanism for the investigation of authorised persons.

That does not detract from the other provisions. I think that clause 92 will provide my hon. Friend with the answer to his point.

My note of the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) is wholly defective, and its significance has escaped my recollection. However, I should be happy to give way to him.

Mr. Butterfill: I am glad to clarify the point. I asked who would be the arbiter.

Mr. Howard: I am much obliged to my hon. Friend. The answer is, of course, the SIB. It would be for it to decide what are the appropriate circumstances in which the independent mechanism is to operate, but the Secretary of State will look at the totality of the rules made by the SIB and at the provision made for that independent mechanism when it comes to the designation process.

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for that explanation, but is it not a little extraordinary that there should be a mandatory obligation to set up this mechanism, although it then becomes entirely discretionary as to whether it is implemented?

Mr. Howard: That is not an entirely fair construction to make. When the matter was debated in the other place, it was accepted that it would not be desirable to require all complaints to be the subject of such independent investigation. There will be circumstances in which other, equally effective, arrangements can be made. I see no difficulty about leaving it to the SIB, subject to the requirement to satisfy the Secretary of State at the designation stage, to identify those circumstances in which independent investigation is likely to be particularly appropriate and desirable. I hope that I have answered my hon. Friend's point.

Schedule 13

Transitional Provisions

Lords amendment: No. 551, in page 208, line 36, at end insert—

"7A.—(1) Subsection (7) of section 80 of this Act shall not apply to a scheme which is in existence on the date on which this Act is passed if—

(a) the units under the scheme are included in the Official List of The Stock Exchange and have been so included throughout the period of five years ending on the date on which this paragraph comes into force;

(b) the law of the country or territory in which the scheme is established precludes the participants being entitled or the operator being required as mentioned in that subsection; and

(c) throughout the period of five years ending on the date on which the application is made under that section, units under the scheme have in fact been regularly redeemed as mentioned in that subsection or the operator has in fact regularly ensured that participants were able to sell their units as there mentioned.

(2) The grounds for revoking an order made under section 80 of this Act by virtue of this paragraph shall include the ground that it appears to the Secretary of State that since the making of the order units under the scheme have ceased to be regularly redeemed or the operator has ceased regularly to ensure their sale as mentioned in sub-paragraph (1)(c) above.".

Read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 552.

Mr. Tim Smith: I seek some clarification of amendment No. 552, which relates to delegation orders, and is part of the transitional provisions. As we are now dealing with the schedule on transitional provisions, can my hon. and learned Friend say when he thinks that the provisions will come into force, and give the timetable for implementing the Bill?

Mr. Howard: I am happy to respond to the second of my hon. Friend's points. When I have dealt with it, I may well be in a position to deal with his first point. However, the answer to the second point is that the hope and expectation is that the putative designated agency, the SIB, will be in a position to make its application for designation within a relatively short time, and that that application will be duly considered by the Secretary of State. It is hoped that he will be in a position to designate the agency in the early part of next year.

The agency will then have the task of considering applications for recognition by the SROs, which will have been drawing up their rules to provide equivalence with the investor protection given by the rules of the agency. It is a little difficult to judge the precise moment when recognition will be granted, but I very much hope that the final stages of putting the structure contemplated by this legislation into place will be completed in the latter part of next year, so that businesses will be applying for authorisation and will obtain it in that time scale.

Amendment No. 552 enables functions to be transferred before they come into force, so that, for example, it would be possible for the SIB to be made responsible for granting direct authorisations before the requirement to be authorised came into force, thus anticipating that last stage in the structure.

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 555 to 581.

Mr. Howard: I would have moved the amendment formally, but I seek your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I wish to associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) in paying tribute to the part played in this legislative process by those in the other place and by Committee Members, many of whom are in the House today. I am particularly grateful to officials in the Department, who have borne the brunt of this heavy burden of legislation, and who have discharged their responsibilities in a way that goes far beyond the course of duty. I am enormously grateful to them for the assistance that they have given me throughout.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 555 to 581 agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Tuesday 4th November, the Motion in the name of Mr. Secretary Moore relating to the Channel Tunnel Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, for three hours after is has been entered upon, and if proceedings thereon have not been disposed of at the end of that period, Mr. Speaker shall put the Question on any Amendment which may have been moved, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any other Amendments selected by him which may then be moved, and on the Main Question, or the Main Question, as amended.

That, at the sitting on Wednesday 5th November, the Motion in the name of Mr. Neil Kinnock relating to Agriculture (S.I., 1986, No. 1233) may be proceeded with, though opposed, for one and a half hours after is has been entered upon, and if proceedings thereon have not been disposed of at the end of that period Mr. Speaker shall then put the Question.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

11.57 am

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Although I am happy that the Adjournment debate should have started so unexpectedly early, I am sorry that it means that I shall not be joined, as I had expected to be, by my hon. Friends the Members for Basildon (Mr. Amess), and for Rochford (Dr. Clark) as well as by my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine). However, I hope that it means that my hon. Friend the Minister will have a little more time for her other important duties. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford was flying over from Germany especially for the debate, having thought that it would start later in the day. Obviously, I cannot speak for senior Ministers or attribute views to them, but I think that my hon. Friend the Minister will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), who is a distinguished member of the Government, has associated himself with this cause by attending a public rally in Southend, where he made a most distinguished and important speech of support. In short, I hope to speak today not just for myself, but for those who represent the area of Southend.

My hon. Friend the Minister will be aware that one of my few claims to fame is that I have been in the House for a long time—more than 20 years, which exceeds a life sentence. I can assure her in all sincerity that during that time I have never encountered an issue that has raised so much genuine alarm, concern and fear in one area as the decision of the North East Thames regional health authority to recommend that the radiotherapy unit at Southend general hospital should be closed, with patients being referred instead to a new centre to be established at Harold Wood hospital. This is not, in any sense, an example of the normal complaint from the unsuccessful area when decisions are made on the location of a Health Service facility, but a case of a substantial and growing area where the inhabitants believe with good reason that they have been consistently discriminated against by the regional health authority and that this final decision on vital cancer treatment services has been made unfairly, unreasonably, irresponsibly and in circumstances that reflect no credit on a vital public service.

If, as seems inevitable, the community health council lodges a formal complaint after the consultation period, the decision will have to be made by the Secretary of State. I should be failing in my duty as a constituency representative if I did not make the Minister aware at this early stage of the sense of outrage in Southend at the region's recommendation and at the circumstances in which the decision was made. This is reflected not only in the greatest campaign ever by the local newspaper, the Evening Echo, but in every section of the Southend community.

The Minister will be aware that the region's reappraisal of its cancer treatment services follows guidance from the Department's standing medical advisory committee which recommended that regional cancer treatment services catering for a population of about a million, with about 3,000 new patient referrals per annum, most of whom require radiotherapy, should be established because of the medical advantages of the concentration of medical expertise.

The regional authority commissioned Coopers and Lybrand to prepare a report which recommended the establishing of five regional units at Broomfield near Chelmsford, the Royal Free hospital, the Middlesex hospital, St. Bartholomew's hospital and the London hospital with the consequent closure of facilities at a number of hospitals, including Essex County, Southend and Oldchurch. The proposal caused so much concern and alarm throughout the area that the region, after careful and detailed consultations with the health authorities and with hon. Members, agreed to scrap the Broomfield proposal and to propose an alternative of six centres on a basis that inevitably would mean that one unit would fall below the desired 2,000 new patients per year. For example, it was agreed that Colchester should be retained because of the excessive journeys which patients would otherwise be obliged to make. Faced with the alternative of retaining Southend or Oldchurch the region opted for Southend because a major factor in the option appraisal was access to services for Southend residents if a centre were not established there.

On 4 July the Harold Wood option was disregarded because it was felt that the region would not wish to consider providing services on a new site at a large cost. We have a splendid facility in Southend and there is nothing at Harold Wood. However, members of the regional authority considered, for reasons which have never been clear, that there should be yet another reappraisal of the respective merits of Southend and Harold Wood. A detailed report of the final option, dated September, was prepared and in my opinion was a fair and objective summary. It pointed out that if Harold Wood attracted the same 50 per cent. local referrals which Oldchurch had secured it would have no more patients than Southend and that this was guaranteed on the basis of performance.

The report said that if Harold Wood attracted more than 50 per cent. it could have consequences for the already limited viability of Colchester. It said that to build an entirely new hospital would mean putting Southend and Oldchurch on a running down basis for five years which could have a serious effect on staff morale and the services provided to the community on the two sites.

More significantly, the report argued that the Harold Wood option would require expenditure of an additional £4.5 million to duplicate services already provided satisfactorily. The final recommendation seemed clear. If I had been a member of that authority I should have been influenced by what it said. The recommendation states:

"Given the high capital cost and uncertain success of the Harold Wood option, and the shortage of capital available to fund many other much needed service improvements in the region, the authority may decide that the Southend option would provide an acceptable pattern of services for cancer patients appropriate to the 1990s and beyond."

Although that recommendation seems clear to me, the regional council disregarded it and chose the Harold Wood option.

Southend residents and the entire staff of the hospital were unable to gather from the public discussion any good reasons why the appointed members of the regional council were prepared to disregard the clear message, the recommendation and the facts put before them. Anger and grave suspicion were added to outrage because before a final decision was made the Barking and Brentwood health authorty made a public offer of £2 million from future asset sales to reduce the additional costs, subject only to the unit being located in its area. The Minister has a duty to say whether she considers that such an offer or gift, which bears all the hallmarks of a bribe from public money, was a proper or acceptable action by a district health authority appointed by the Secretary of State. Capital receipts belong to the region. The region has a clear policy that £200,000 of every asset sale is provided back to the district. Yet a district health authority offered £2 million.

That offer of a gift by another health authority was bitterly resented in Southend because our district authority has been seriously underfunded by the region for years. In one recent year the shortfall was £7 million. Steps have been taken to reduce that differential by about £300,000 a year and the authority has repeatedly been advised by the region that the underfunding correction has to proceed slowly because none of the other authorities has a penny to spare. Despite that, it seems that one authority is able to pledge £2 million out of the air.

We have often reported the consequences of underfunding to Ministers and my hon. Friend the Minister will be aware from the extensive files that hon. Members such as myself and my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West and my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon, who has just rushed to get here, as well as my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford, have pressed the Government consistently to agree that something should be done about the underfunding.

The problem can be regarded in various ways, but I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to consider this fact. In Southend, the nursing cover per patient is 16 per cent. lower than the average for the whole region. The region's decision would have catastrophic consequences for morale at Southend hospital and for the comprehensive service that it provides. The general public in Southend are concerned and perplexed about what they see as a further sign of the region's callous disregard for Southend's health interests.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for attending the debate, especially as it is taking place earlier than expected, and I ask her for the clearest assurance that she and her colleagues will bear the facts—they are not opinions—in mind when decision time arrives. I ask for a clear assurance that Ministers will visit Southend to meet consultants and representatives of the Southend community before a decision is made. I ask also for a clear assurance that my hon. Friend the Minister will look carefully into the circumstances of the £2 million gift offered by a health authority in the region on condition that the services were located in its area. Will the Minister consider issuing guidance on the propriety of such actions? I should also like a clear assurance that steps will be taken to prevent any regional health authority from discriminating consistently against any area within its region.

This is a vital issue. It is an issue of justice and of fairness which must be approached seriously, urgently and firmly by Ministers charged with the duty of maintaining our health services. I am grateful to the Minister for the careful attention that she has paid to my remarks and I hope that she can give me at least some of the assurances which I seek on behalf of Southend and areas near that town.

12.8 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I welcome this opportunity to speak in support of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). I endorse every word that he uttered in introducing the debate. The region has made an extraordinary decision. If anyone cares to examine the matter seriously, he will find that there is no evidence that could have led the region to make such a decision. There is no evidence to support the decision on health grounds, the consideration that most concerns us, and there is no evidence that could justify the decision on financial grounds.

Anyone knows that when someone is told that he has cancer and that there is no treatment for it the traumatic and emotional consequences are extremely distressing. The region's announcement amounts to a sword of Damocles hanging above us, and we want it removed. The local people of Basildon have rallied round and are raising money to build a hospice — the St. Luke's — to treat those who, unfortunately, cannot be cured of cancer. The excellent facility that we have in Southend treats those whom we hope can be saved from cancer.

I tell the House that the Members who represent south-east Essex are united on this issue. I give warning that our constituents sustain us in our view on this matter. We are determined to stop the implementation of the region's proposal. We hope very much that the Government, when they come to the stage at which they have to give their views, will support the Members of south-east Essex.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) on taking the opportunity to initiate this debate. I am pleased that parliamentary circumstances have allowed us to have a rather fuller discussion than might have been possible. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) for his remarks and for the effort and energy that he has expended to be in his place to represent his constituents this morning in the light of the changed circumstances of the debate. I appreciate the efforts that have been made by both my hon. Friends. They have represented the interests of their constituents both today and up to this point extremely well, and their constituents are lucky to have them. I am sure that they recognise that. The same can be said of other hon. Members to whom I shall be referring later in my remarks.

I congratulate the Southend Evening Echo on the considerable and detailed interest which it has shown in the proposed changes in Southend. It has given a considered, careful and highly intelligent lead to local people. I have read with great interest the cuttings from the recent editions of the newspaper.

There is no doubt that the issue which my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East has raised has aroused considerable local interest. Ministers have received personal letters from all the local Members, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark), and my two hon. Friends who are in their places, my hon. Friends the Members for Southend, East and for Basildon. We have received also over 100 letters from the general public. The Southend Evening Echo, which is running a campaign to save the unit, has held public meetings, issued publicity material and launched a petition to which over 40,000 signatures have been appended so far.

I hope that my hon. Friends will acknowledge the efforts of the regional health authority to keep all local Members informed. I am told that they have received copies of all the relevant documents. I am told also that two meetings have been held with local Members to brief them. I note the assent of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East as I say these things. I understand that he told the chairman of the authority recently that he was better briefed on this issue than on almost any other recent issue. Again I note his assent.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I have no complaint about the way in which we have been kept informed. I think my hon. Friend will be aware that two meetings have taken place, which were extremely helpful. They took place, however, before the Harold Wood proposal was suddenly resurrected after having been rejected.

Mrs. Currie: I am sure that the region will note my hon. Friend's comment and will take it forward. We have the interesting circumstance that a member of my hon. Friend's family is a member of the district health authority.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: My wife.

Mrs. Currie: I suspect, therefore, that we can have a better informed discussion on this topic and on this part of the Health Service in this part of the country than perhaps would be possible in many other circumstances.

I must put on the record an apology to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East, who was concerned about the delay in ministerial replies to his parliamentary questions. I quote from the Southend Evening Echo of 22 October, which reports that my hon. Friend was "angry and disappointed by the Minister's attitude."

That was because my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had been given more than a week to answer questions on the proposed closure of the cancer unit and had not answered in that time. That was my fault. I was not happy with the bland answers that were being offered and I took them back. I take full responsibility for that. I hope that my hon. Friend is satisfied with that explanation. I must apologise to him also for the delay in replying to his letter of 22 September. I have the reply in my hand and he is welcome to it, unless he would like me to take it back to the Department for another few days for redrafting in the light of today's discussion. When we received my hon. Friend's letter there was a backlog of about 1,200 letters at the Department. That is now being cleared very quickly, but some letters, such as that from my hon. Friend, to which I attach great importance, were not being dealt with as quickly as they might have been.

As a Minister, I have to reserve my Department's position subject to consultation on this issue. If the timetable, as I understand it from the region, is followed, decisions will come to Ministers next summer. It is important that I set out that all I can do is to take note of what is being said. I cannot comment or give any opinions. Some aspects of the important details that my hon. Friends have raised will have to lie on the table. All that I can say about some of the matters to which they have drawn attention is that I shall ensure that the regional health authority's attention is drawn to them and that they are taken into consideration.

I shall set out the timetable as I understand it. A consultative document is to go to the North East Thames regional health authority in December. Any proposal for change will go to the local district health authority at Southend in January. If it goes through the January meeting, it will be the subject of the statutory three months' consultation. It will then be sent back to the regional health authority and be sent onwards to Ministers in about April or May. That is assuming that the consultation process is completed as speedily as it might be. If there is any delay, that process will take longer to complete.

I realise that it might be disappointing to my hon. Friends if I am unable to give an opinion or to come down one way or the other for or against, or even to be neutral, but I have set out the legal position, and it would be a shame if the development of cancer services in Southend and elsewhere were jeopardised by a contradiction of that position.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East for his invitation to visit Southend. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I are doing our best to visit as many of the health authorities and districts as possible. My hon. Friend will be aware that there are over 190 of them. I shall take into account his invitation to visit Southend and I hope that we shall be able to accede to it before too long. I certainly look forward to visiting Southend.

My hon. Friend talked about the proposal from the Barking and Brentwood health authority, and he used the word "bribe". I am sure he realises that it is not necessary to impugn the motives of anyone concerned. The Barking and Brentwood health authority, in the same way as the Southend health authority and the North East Thames regional health authority, is looking for better health for all residents, as well as better health care. We try to run a National Health Service and I am sure that it is in the light of the considerations to which I have referred that the Barking and Brentwood health authority made its offer.

As my hon. Friend rightly said, the capital involved does not belong to the Barking and Brentwood health authority. It belongs to the regional health authority, and that has been the position for as long as I can remember. The North East Thames regional health authority has a policy of pushing decision-making down the administrative structure as far as possible to districts and, if possible, beyond that. That is commendable. A substantial proportion of capital receipts should be allocated to the districts from which the receipts are obtained, so that the districts will have some incentive to realise the receipts.

The region could rescind its decision at any time, however, either in general or in particular. The money belongs to the region, and it is not for the Barking and Brentwood health authority to regard it as its money or to be possessive about it. If the region wanted to take capital money from one district to spend it in another, the region, like any other region, would have an absolute right so to do. It may well take that into account in the plans that it has for cancer therapy.

I am informed that the regional health authority chairman told the region, when the matters were discussed in September, that no consideration was to be given to the proposed allocation of funds from Barking and

[Mrs. Currie]

Brentwood, and that the decision was not to be influenced by an offer made in respect of a district away from Southend. I have had that assurance from the regional health authority chairman in person this week and I am prepared to accept it, as I hope my hon. Friend will.

My hon. Friend asked why there was so little money to spare for Southend and for RAWP, when suddenly £2 million appeared out of the blue. I am sure he is aware that money has been short in the regional health authority for some time—I shall explain that in a moment—because of the way in which the RAWP formula works. The Barking and Brentwood proposal concerns new money which is to be achieved through receipts from capital sales. In other words, it is in the form of a cheque in the post. The money has not been realised or received. Whatever may have happened to this date is quite unconnected with what may happen from this point onwards if that district health authority or any other is able to achieve an increase in its resources through capital sales. I am sure all hon. Members hope that that will happen.

I think that my hon. Friend may have confused the capital element and the revenue element. The Barking and Brentwood health authority offered capital money. My hon. Friend's concern was the revenue allocation over recent years to Southend. We recognise that concern. As my hon. Friend knows, the RAWP formula is under review and we are taking advice as to whether it is functioning in the way we hoped. I venture a guess that, when it was set up 10 years ago, it all looked a lot easier than it turned out to be. What we have tried to do over the 10-year period is to improve the resource allocation to those parts of the country, mainly outside London, which have been seriously under-funded over a long period. That has meant holding back resources to the four main regional health authorities which cover London, one of which is the North East Thames regional health authority.

This year most of the regional health authorities are close to target. However, it remains the case that the four London regional health authorities are above the RAWP target. The remainder continue to be those authorities outside London. My right hon. Friend recognises the particular problems of London, and this year has allocated additional moneys to the four London regions, which, in the case of two, has taken them further away from the RAWP target. That has become a matter of concern to other regions.

We must consider the RAWP targets with great care and ensure that they continue to reflect not only population movements but different patterns of need, so that we can be sure that people in Trent receive a service comparable with those in Southend and that, if possible, people in the south-west are happy they are receiving the same level of service as people in central London. That cannot be done overnight. It is in the light of those discussions that the funding of Southend and the efforts of the regional health authority to improve that funding can be regarded.

The region tells me that it recognises the under-funding of Southend. As my hon. Friend said, it has attempted to put that right by an additional allocation to Southend of several hundred thousand pounds over and above the direct proportion that it might have had, and intends to continue to do so. I hope that the way in which the matter is recognised will be acceptable.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): I am interested in the comments and promises that the hon. Lady has made about cancer therapy. Will she confer with her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science and impress on him the necessity for Britain to maintain an extremely close connection—in fact, to increase the connection—with CERN, the Geneva-based research centre? There could be a connection between what it is doing in particle physics and its understanding of the causation of cancer. I am sure that it would be a profitable and fruitful field if the hon. Lady directed her considerable abilities towards insisting that the British input into CERN remains as it is or is increased.

Mrs. Currie: I am not sure that I have reached cancer therapy services in Southend. I am aware that I have made no promises of any kind. However, I take the hon. Gentleman's point seriously about CERN and particle physics. My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden), who is Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science, has taken a close interest in CERN. This year, he has visited most of those departments in Europe which are concerned with it. I am well aware that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department take the matter seriously. There is no doubt that improvements in atomic physics and nuclear physics have been one of the main areas of help to cancer patients.

I deplore the way in which the word "nuclear" is increasingly used as a term of pejorative abuse. It is a matter of fact that nuclear physics have helped and have given life to many thousands of people in this country. Not long ago the Derby Evening Telegraph decided to have a scare about radioactive material in Derby and demanded that lists be published of the 70 sources of nuclear radiation in the Derby area. The vast majority of them turned out to be in hospitals treating cancer patients. The issue was then resolved. I take seriously the point that the hon. Gentleman has made and I shall draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Radiotherapy is provided at nine hospitals in the North East Thames regional health authority. They include the London hospital, the Middlesex, the North Middlesex, the Royal Free hospital, St. Bartholomew's, and University College in London. The hospitals outside London include the Essex County, Oldchurch, and Southend. Official advice to the Department, which we have accepted, considers that a modern radiotherapy centre should serve a population of about 1 million. North-East Thames has nine centres, for a catchment population of 4·4 million, including about 700,000 patients from North West Thames. One does not, therefore, have to be a mathematical genius to work out that, in the light of departmental advice, North East Thames has too many centres and they are too scattered.

The overall strategy of the regional health authority, as I understand it, is to concentrate radiotherapy in a smaller number of modern centres. The overall strategy was discussed at the May meeting of the regional health authority, and I believe that it was accepted with some enthusiasm. The next question was, which of the various parts of the region should have the new major centres?

I understand that there was some lobbying, including by hon. Members here, for the new regional centres to be in one or two places, including Southend. I may be wrong about that. The broad strategy of the region should be set against the background of departmental and medical advice of the highest level and against the background of its general acceptance. That was the overall philosophy, and that is what the authority wanted to do.

I propose to leave aside the provision of radiotherapy services in London and concentrate on those in Essex. It is worth remembering that between 5 and 10 per cent. of cancer patients travel from Essex to London units for specialist treatments, including radiotherapy. That is a choice for their GPs and for those involved in their care. We are happy for that to continue.

Patients in the Southend health authority area are served by two units, the Southend hospital and the Rochford hospital, which together form a twin-site district general hospital. It is a major acute hospital with 453 beds and an accident and emergency department. The unit's work is well respected and is of high quality overall. There is no doubt that Southend and Rochford hospitals are held in the highest regard by local people, who have written expressing their confidence in the staff at the cancer unit.

Right hon. and hon. Members have seen the regional strategy documents, and I believe that they have had an opportunity to discuss them. They have seen the departmental advice on the provision of radiotherapy centres. I shall be happy to provide appropriate extracts if it would be of assistance. Perhaps my hon. Friends will let me know.

There has been some misunderstanding about what might happen at Southend. The majority of services for cancer patients will continue to be based at district level, including Southend. These services will include surgery, some chemotherapy, certain other treatments, diagnostic and screening work and, of course, terminal care. Only radiotherapy and other related specialist treatments would require attendance at the proposed regional centres. The regional cancer treatment centres, where radiotherapists, their equipment, and oncologists would be based, are, I understand, intended to provide a high level of medical expertise as locally as possible. The local element is regarded as important, but the removal of radiotherapy facilities from a district should not entail the downgrading of its other cancer treatment facilities.

I understand that, in the case of Southend, in effect only the radiotherapy equipment would be affected, leaving most of the other cancer treatment facilities to continue. Therefore, we hope that the removal of a radiotherapy machine would not substantially affect the provision of these other services. I hope that the regional health authority will take into consideration the fact that radiotherapy is a factor in attracting top quality medical staff to the unit at Southend, and that any change should be so arranged as not to damage the career prospects of the staff concerned.

I make it clear that Southend's cancer unit will not close, as suggested by the Southend Evening Echo. Only radiotherapy and associated facilities are the subject of discussion. The people in Southend have been wrongly informed that all local cancer facilities will cease. It is not the case that the cancer unit will close. I hope that I can make that as clear as possible.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I note the presence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon). The removal of the radiotherapy treatment will force people to travel about 40 miles. Is the Minister aware of the hardship, inconvenience, pain and distress that would be caused to the large number of patients who would have to travel this distance? Does she suggest that a unit without radiotherapy treatment would in any sense be a comprehensive treatment unit?

Mrs. Currie: I acknowledge the presence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West. I am pleased that he is able to represent his constituency in this important matter. I am sure that the regional health authority is taking into account the travel required. I emphasise again that, if Southend people believe that their cancer unit will close, they are incorrect. The only discussion is about the machinery with which the radiotherapy treatment and related facilities are directly associated. Only a small number of staff associated with radiotherapy facilities might be transferred from Southend. The majority of the staff at the cancer unit will remain to provide other services for local patients. As we develop services for local patients, some other work will become so much more important.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: The Minister has been very kind and courteous. Does she seriously suggest that a unit with cancer diagnostic facilities and terminal care but with no treatment facilities is a cancer treatment unit in any sense?

Mrs. Currie: On the contrary, as my hon. Friend will know, radiotherapy is part of cancer treatment. However, it is not the only form of treatment. Surgery and chemotherapy are important, and we expect chemotherapy to become more important in years to come. For a patient receiving treatment for a year or more, radiotherapy may form only a small part of that treatment. It depends on the case and the circumstances.

I hope that my hon. Friend does not in any way denigrate terminal care or long-term care. Some cancer patients may require that for many years when radiotherapy has proved to be unsuitable or no longer satisfactory for them. Radiotherapy is a part of cancer treatment, but by no means all of it. I am sure that the staff who work in other parts of the unit involved in surgery and chemotherapy would want the care that they provide for patients to be taken into account.

As part of the preparation for today's debate I asked whether I could be informed about community services for cancer patients in the Southend area. I am pleased to say that not only will the community services for cancer patients in Southend continue, but that they will be improved under the proposed arrangements. Southend has a private eight-bed hospice supported financially by the district health authority. In Southend there are two home care nurses who provide a similar service to Macmillan nurses. I understand that there are advertisements for a further two nurses, so the service will be doubled. A combined terminal illness care team will be functioning by the end of the year. All those are services for cancer patients, especially for those for whom care has come too late or those for whom an apparent cure at some earlier stage proved to be inadequate.

Dr. M. S. Miller: I apologise for referring to something which the hon. Lady mentioned a few moments ago, but my attention was distracted. I return to the point made by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) about the size of the catchment area. I hope that the hon. Lady and her advisers will reconsider that. I accept that nine centres are too many for a population of about 4 million.

[Dr. M. S. Miller]

However, I do not accept that there should be one radiotherapy centre for 1 million people. We should be able to do a little better than that.

Although the hon. Lady is right in saying that there are many other treatments for cancer, radiotherapy is still applied and will, in all probability, become even better in the future. In my opinion, in areas where there is one centre for 1 million people it may mean that many cancer sufferers will have to travel long distances. The hon. Lady's Department should be considering something better than that, perhaps one centre for 700,000 or 800,000 people—certainly more than one per million.

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Gentleman speaks from a background of medical knowledge. If he has evidence to support the points that he is making perhaps, he would be kind enough to write to me or to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State so that we can ensure that full consideration is given to the general points that he has made.

The North East Thames regional health authority's original proposal would have had five centres for 4·4 million people. Its revised proposal now has six centres for 4·4 million people and, should the representations of colleagues from Southend be taken into account, it may well mean seven centres. There comes a point where one simply gets back to nine centres, and I hope the hon. Gentleman will agree that nine centres would be too many. The adequate number is a matter for the regional health authority and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in the light of representations made, if necessary, later on.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I appeal to the Minister to look seriously at the advice that she is being given. Who told her that the Southend hospice is funded by the district health authority? I am the president of the hospice, and I have to engage with my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) and my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) in raising vast sums. The hospice is funded, not by the district health authority, but by voluntary donations. Where is the Minister getting the information from? I appeal to her to check on it. We are providing home care services in the hospice because of the disappearance of Macmillan nurses. It is not a district health authority function. We are doing that with voluntary funds, raised by lotteries, functions, sponsored walks up Big Ben—everything under the sun. I appeal to the Minister to check on her sources of information about the Southend hospice. I am president and attend every meeting. I can assure her that it is not funded by the district health authority.

Mrs. Currie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who speaks from a position closer to the circumstances than I do. I should like to thank him and all those in Southend who raise money for the hospice, and indeed hospices such as the one mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon. There is no doubt that the hospice movement, which grew out of urgent local need and has tapped a source of local generosity and wholeness of spirit, has shown the Health Service how to do things, but my understanding is that some of the money for the hospice — some of the running costs — is found within the district. I am happy to check on that and I shall write to my hon. Friend the Member on that point. However, I am sure my hon. Friend will accept that the community services for cancer have not been as good as they could have been in Southend, and perhaps as a result of the current discussions the district health authority and the regional health authority are giving attention to that. We should see a substantial improvement within a matter of months. I am sure that my hon. Friend will not only take careful note of that, but will ensure that those promises are fulfilled.

Mr. Amess: May I make two points before the Minister concludes——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman must be brief. He cannot make another speech.

Mr. Amess: With regard to radiotherapy treatment, I understand the point about the closure of the Southend unit. I emphasise that for the people in south-east Essex the continuation of radiotherapy treatment is crucial. Some 60 per cent. of cancer patients in Basildon receive radiotherapy treatment at Southend. This is the final thing that I want to ask the Minister. I realise that it is difficult in this debate for her to say anything positive before there has been full consultation, but before any decision is reached will she please ask her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to receive a deputation of south-east Members, obviously including my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon)—the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry — and my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor)?

Mrs. Currie: I hear what my hon. Friend says. It has just occurred to me that it might be more useful to wait and see what consideration the regional health authority gives to the representations that are being made. When the consultation document is published and the formal statutory consultation prodedure is undertaken, it may be possible to consider that. I need to take advice on that, as I am sure my hon. Friend will appreciate. I am always glad to meet hon. Friends, particularly those who are making the effort to improve health services in their neigbourhood, and who put to us the case of improving those services. I shall attempt to be as helpful as I can to my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West and to my hon. Friends the Members for Southend, East and for Basildon.

I want to ensure that we put it on record today that the radiotherapy unit is not the whole of the cancer unit. The radiotherapy treatment is not the whole of the cancer treatment. I was moved to read the comments in the Evening Echo of 20 October, in which the circumstances of Mr. and Mrs Jim Mullan of Northview Drive, Westcliff were described. I understand that, sadly, they spent seven years watching their daughter Elizabeth Pollard battle against cancer, a battle that she lost in April 1984 at the age of 35. I quote from the newspaper:

"Mrs. Mullan . . . said 'It was hell, but thanks to Southend Hospital centre Elizabeth was allowed to die in dignity and reasonable comfort.

Towards the end she found it difficult to breathe, there was no way she could have travelled for treatment.' "

There is no suggestion whatever that Elizabeth or anyone like her will have to travel for treatment. Hospice care, terminal care, long-term care, surgery, chemotherapy and many other aspects of care for cancer patients for whom radiotherapy has proved to be ineffective will continue to be provided at Southend in the caring and responsible way in which it has been provided so far. The unit and the treatment that it provides in these areas can continue to command the confidence and, I hope, support of local people for many years to come.

I want to consider the pattern of referrals in the neighbourhood. It has been estimated that at present the radiotherapy unit at Southend attracts some 93 per cent. of local referrals. It also attracts a high proportion of local referrals from the district and patients from Basildon and Thurrock. The unit at Oldchurch has a comparatively low local referral rate. Only about 50 per cent. of patients from Barking, Havering and Brentwood go to that unit; the rest travel to London. No doubt that is a factor in the regional health authority's consideration of where to locate a possible regional centre.

The completion of the M25 has some influence on the area. Those hon. Members with constituencies a great distance from the M25 will be interested to note the major economic and social changes which the completion of this important capital programme will bring to the south-east.

Worries have been raised about travelling to other areas for treatment. I was sad to read an article in the Evening Echo on Tuesday 21 October, which implied that people would not seek treatment elsewhere. The article stated:

"Cancer patients will give up and die rather than make the 60-mile round trip for treatment at Harold Wood, a hospital consultant claimed on TV last night.

On BBC's London Plus Southend hospital's Dr. Colin Trasker said: 'There is no doubt people will just give up their treatment and not go.'

Interviewer Antonia Higgs said: 'You mean they'd die sooner rather than make the journey?' Dr. Trasker agreed."

I hope that my hon. Friends will join me in urging all concerned to make use of facilities—especially facilities for cancer patients — wherever and in whatever circumstances these may be provided. I hope that we never discourage patients from seeking the treatment that they need. That may entail travelling to the other ends of the country for treatment for rare conditions. While every effort is made to provide services as locally as possible to the patient, I hope that all concerned with the care, treatment and advice to patients will encourage them to make use of facilities wherever they may be.

It is a fact that 80 per cent. of patients attending the radiotherapy treatment department at Southend travel by car. Generally, patients in Essex drive or are driven to hospital for radiotherapy treatment, rather than use public transport. The ambulance service will continue to be provided for those cancer patients who require it. However, it is worth remembering that many radiotherapy patients are not ill at all and are therefore capable of driving or travelling to the hospital under their own steam.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Does the hon. Lady appreciate how that service works? The service is voluntary and patients sometimes travel as far as 30 miles. More than one patient may be involved in each case and sometimes three or four patients may travel in one car. The first patient to be collected travels in the car for a considerable time in a journey to and from hospital. It might be an idea to examine that service. I speak from personal knowledge, as I had a sister who died of cancer last year. She lived about 30 miles outside London and had to travel to Middlesex hospital. That was a gruelling journey if she was the first to be picked up and the last to be dropped off.

Mrs. Currie: I note the hon. Gentleman's point. I should like to put on record my Department's appreciation of all those people involved as voluntary drivers in that service. It is an important and valuable provision. The ambulance service is available if required and I hope that, where appropriate, it will be used.

I want to mention the details of equipment under consideration in Southend. The current radiotherapy equipment at Southend consists of a linear accelerator, —a Linac—a cobalt machine, a deep X-ray machine, a simulator and a planning computer. The Linac was bought in 1982, at a price of £350,000, and required a further £140,000 to install. The other equipment has been purchased since 1980. I understand that the cobalt machine was a reconditioned unit and may therefore soon reach the end of its useful life.

In preparation for the debate I asked for information on the percentage usage of radiotherapy equipment in Southend. I understand that the number of patients treated there is reasonable and typical for a unit of that size. The expected number of "fields"—single treatments — per day for such equipment is about 30 to 50. Southend's average is 43 for the Linac and 50 for the cobalt machine.

One factor that we must bear in mind is the efficient use of expensive equipment. I am taking advice on how many patients could or should be treated on the more modern equipment now available, especially as more of our patients are still active during the period of their being treated, and therefore have responsibilities to their employers and families. In the recent past capital has been the limitation, with few staffing problems. However, as capital and equipment have become available, some of the limitations have involved the numbers and availability of qualified staff. Some of our discussions now have to take place against a rather different background from that appertaining 10 years ago.

I understand that the region's intention is that the radiotherapy equipment currently at Southend should be transferred to the new regional cancer treatment centres wherever possible. I express no opinion on that; I am merely trying to set out the proposals. The region has advised that it is probable, but not certain, that equipment currently in use at Southend will be transferred to Harold Wood. That will depend on the timing of the prospective closure and development. The proposed radiotherapy unit at Harold Wood will be able to provide up to 3,000 new courses of treatment per annum by virtue of its greater population base. That would meet the requirement for a regional centre. Indeed, we expect that it will attract between 1,700 and 3,000 new courses per annum, depending on whether it establishes itself as a centre for excellence, which I am sure we all hope will be the case. It is then proposed that the Harold Wood centre should be linked with Basildon, Thurrock and Southend districts. I understand that to be the broad basis of the proposal.

I wish to mention other service improvements in Southend that will help not only cancer patients but others. Additional services for patients include a 20-place day hospital for the elderly at Westcliff hospital and an intensive care unit for mentally ill patients at Runwell hospital. As part of caring in the community, there are community care centres on Canvey Island and in Southend for the mentally ill; homes for mentally handicapped people in Benfleet and Shoeburyness; a team of staff, including six nurses, to care for mentally handicapped people in the community; and a group home for former psychiatric patients in Rochford. There are also planned major developments for Rochford hospital costing £5·5 million to build and £1·1 million a year to run, comprising a rehabilitation department, four wards with 96 beds for the elderly and three day hospitals for the elderly, elderly mentally infirm and the mentally ill. We hope that they will be completed by 1988. I hope that my hon. Friends welcome those improvements and changes, which I am sure they will agree show that the NHS in their constituencies is very much safe with us.

The North East Thames regional health authority is anxious to improve its services for cancer patients. The strategy report that was accepted in May was ambitious and broad ranging. Whatever it decides to do, whatever views the local district health authorities may take, whatever decision the Secretary of State may be asked to take, I am sure my hon. Friends will agree that the objective of the regional health authority is to provide the best possible cancer services for the people whom it is charged to serve with multidisciplinary teams, with a full range of diagnostic equipment, with better links for the local community and with better care for those whose cancers have defeated us.

I hope that all concerned will accept that the regional health authority and the district health authorities are operating from the very highest motives and are concerned only to achieve the best service for all, including those in Southend, Basildon and elsewhere.

Orthopaedic Treatment (Portsmouth)

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): I am grateful for this opportunity to discuss orthopaedic treatment in the city of Portsmouth.

It is fortunate that I should be able to raise this issue today as it is only three days since I was able to intervene in an Adjournment debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on the treatment of kidney patients at another of Portsmouth's hospitals—St. Mary's.

I assure my hon. Friend the Minister that my area is grateful for the way in which the National Health Service operates. The Wessex region is one of growth and development. It has experienced considerable improvements, especially during the past seven or eight years. Only today, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services announced an £8 million expansion programme for hospital development at St. Mary's hospital. The Portsmouth and South East Hampshire district health authority is able to assure local Members of Parliament that it has never been faced with cuts. That is the background against which I want to discuss orthopaedic treatment.

The last issue of Link, the regional health authority's newspaper, said that there was extremely good news in the region. It was that waiting lists for operations had been considerably reduced on the previous year and that the reduction was greater in Wessex than in any other region in the country. That was indeed welcome news and I am sure that the Department, area and district health authorities and medical staff should be congratulated accordingly. It was, however, cold comfort for one group of people—those waiting for orthopaedic treatment at the Queen Alexandra hospital in Portsmouth. The orthopaedic department at the Queen Alexandra hospital is especially successful. It has dealt with local people's needs extremely efficiently. Indeed, it is regarded as one of the most efficient in the country. Although the hospital is relatively new, it has suffered serious water penetration around the operating theatres. This fine hospital complex has some 17 theatres, but no fewer than seven have been affected and been taken out of use at some time. Not all 17 are suitably equipped for orthopaedic patients, however, so about half of the available theatres suitable for orthopaedic patients have been out of operation at some time. As a result, the department has had to concentrate on emergency and traumatic cases, and people awaiting elective surgery, especially hip replacement operations, have had the date of their treatment set back. It is the uncertainty about the dates on which elective surgery can be carried out which is most upsetting to patients. Of course they object to having to wait—almost everyone would like to have at once the operation that is necessary—but a wait can be accepted as long as the operation is performed on the due date. However, to be told that there will be a delay is extremely worrying for patients who are already tense knowing that they are to undergo major surgery.

At one point there were six consecutive weeks during which no elective surgery could be carried out. That is the point to which I wish to draw the Minister's attention. The medical staff and ancillary workers have, without exaggeration, worked heroically under those circumstances and they have now achieved the point in their operations programme that they would have reached had there not been the six-weeks' delay.

That is remarkable, but it means that the beds available in the wards supporting the orthopaedic department are now full. To quote the words used by an administrator this morning when I checked on the facts, the place is jammed solid. That means that there is a new restricting factor—not just the limitation on the operating theatre space but the availability of beds for patients immediately after undergoing the operation.

That is a matter of grave concern locally. It may be felt that time alone can bring a solution, but that is not true. Last year, when the waiting lists for orthopaedic operations was growing, it was found possible to arrange for hip replacement operations to take place at the private King George's hospital at Midhurst. I am told that this year space is also available at the Lord Mayor Treloar hospital at Alton. Both those hospitals would have space in their operating theatres and accommodation facilites for orthopaedic patients from Portsmouth to have their hip operations.

I am sure that I need not tell my hon. Friend the Minister that the success rate for hip replacements is high. They are a good investment of NHS money and the improvement in the quality of life which a hip replacement can bring about is dramatic.

The problem is that the regional health authority has not found it possible to provide funds this year to continue the programme of passing patients into the private sector, where facilities remain available. That is extremely sad. I understand the pressures on the regional authority. No doubt it is worried about the cost of the work at the Queen Alexandra hospital, although that, after all, is basically a matter for its capital programme rather than its revenue costs.

It cannot be argued that because the operating theatres are out of use for a period there is a financial saving at the district level which could be used to send patients elsewhere. The orthopaedic department remains where it is. The staff are there. There is a need for a once-and-for-all relatively small injection of cash to the regional health authority, specifically and immediately earmarked for one purpose only — for hip replacement operations during the period that we are awaiting the restoration of the full operating capacity of the Queen Alexandra hospital.

I shall not stand up again in 12 months' time and repeat this demand. The cause of the problem is completely outside the control of the NHS. It is a matter of grave concern that doctors and others who are able and willing to carry out the operations simply lack the space in which to do it. Each time the sum, which is as little as £2,500, becomes available an operation can take place. A relatively small sum provided once and once only would allow the orthopaedic department of this highly-regarded hospital to continue to reduce the waiting list for elective surgery.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will feel able to draw this one substantial problem to the attention of our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who has shown direct interest in the length of waiting lists. The problem could be solved with a relatively small injection of extra cash. That would bring untold benefits to my constituents and others in the Portsmouth and South-East Hampshire district health authority.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): I should like briefly to support the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) about the importance of orthopaedic treatment in the NHS, especially in the Wessex region. The region has been fortunate in that the revisions in the RAWP formula have improved our previous position. We were worried that too great a proportion of NHS funds seemed to be concentrated in London and that our region did not receive an adequate share of the national resources for the NHS. We hope that the present trend will continue and that any review of RAWP will continue to give the Wessex region a high priority.

The region has a higher than average proportion of elderly and retired people. More than 30 per cent. of my constituents are of retirement age or above. That high proportion of elderly people gives rise to special problems, not least problems affecting the NHS.

Orthopaedic surgery is important in treating the elderly. Too often we become seduced by the high-technology areas of medicine, about which we hear so much in our national newspapers. I fear that some of the London teaching hospitals, which may be more involved in those areas than any others, grab both too much of the headlines and too great a proportion of the cash available, leaving areas such as orthopaedic surgery out in the cold. That is undesirable and unfair because, although nobody would deny that saving life is important, the quality of life is equally, if not more, important. I recollect a member of my family who was terminally ill saying to me that what mattered to him was the quality of life. Certainly for people in Wessex, especially the elderly, it is vital that we ensure that in the latter part of their lives they can enjoy comfort, mobility and freedom from pain.

In those areas orthopaedic surgery can play an important part. Consequently, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can confirm that the Wessex region will receive high priority and, if possible, an improved allocation of the national cake, particularly in relation to orthopaedic surgery.

1.9 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I have been asked to respond to the debate.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) on his assiduity in securing a debate on such an important subject. He will realise from my remarks that the debate is very timely for the Portsmouth area. I know that there are immediate concerns in Portsmouth, particularly over the repairs at the Queen Alexandra hospital. I shall come to that shortly, but I must first thank my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), who put the argument for RAWP very succinctly. We have just debated services in Essex, yet we can see that there is also a need for services in other parts of the country to be improved. My hon. Friend has also shown how RAWP has helped people in those parts of the country that have been underfunded.

I have not yet had an opportunity to visit any of the facilities run by the Health Service in or around Bournemouth, but during the party conference I had an opportunity to visit my uncle who was resident in a home for physically handicapped people, run by a voluntary agency in Bournemouth. He has been an orthopaedic patient for some time, and is now slowly recovering. I should like to put on record my appreciation of all the staff at the Carlton Dene home in Bournemouth, as they have given my uncle and the other residents there excellent care. I thoroughly enjoyed my visit, and it helped to remind me that we are really talking about individuals in discussing the Health Service.

Great speeches were made at Bournemouth, and I shall come later to the speech made at the conference by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, but ultimately we are talking about individuals and their families. However, I was pleased to note the remarks made about the area by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West.

In this country, orthopaedic services, and particularly waiting times for out-patient appointments and in-patient treatment, were studied in great depth in a report published in 1981, which has become known as the Duthie report. It is the report of a working party chaired by professor R. B. Duthie, Nuffield professor of orthopaedic surgery at Oxford university. I shall therefore take much of the medical information that I have on this important subject from the report.

Orthopaedic surgery is mainly concerned with the repair and reconstruction of the skeletal system. Much of the work used to be mainly concerned with tuberculosis in children. Many of the existing orthopaedic facilities are in old sanatoria that were used for that purpose. But today tuberculosis in children does not cause the orthopaedic problems that it once did, and paediatric work has developed substantially, and is normally found in paediatric specialty facilities, such as children's hospitals.

Thus the problem mainly occurs among people in the older age groups. Among them, the skeletal system fails most drastically, because it suffers from the effects of degenerative diseases of the joints and fractures of weakened long bones such as the femur. The number of elderly people, and the percentage of the population that they represent, has increased over the past few years, and is expected to increase until the end of the 1980s. In the 1970s, the 65 to 74 years age group made the biggest contribution to the rise, but from 1980 onwards the continuing increase in the number of old people has been due to an enlargement in the group aged 75 and over. About one fifth of them are over 85, although the number of those aged 65 to 74 is decreasing slightly.

We estimate that about 3 million people in this country are aged between 75 and 84, and perhaps soon there will be about 750,000 people aged over 85. You and I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, hope, in time, to join them, and we also hope that all the necessary services will be laid on when that time comes. But that change towards a more elderly population has been reflected in the use of orthopaedic beds, and, indeed, of beds in other specialties which treat large numbers of old people. For example, in 1977 the elderly accounted for 5 per cent. more admissions than 10 years before and on average they occupied 11 per cent. more beds. By 1977 about half the available beds were occupied by elderly people and that continues to be so.

In Portsmouth we believe that nearly 70 per cent. of all acute beds are occupied by people aged over 65. The National Health Service is increasingly and substantially a service for the elderly. The increasing numbers of elderly people treated is a reflection of the success of medical treatments for the younger age groups. Our success breeds its own pattern of demand and we must ensure that we can adapt to it.

The increase in the load of illness and disability placed upon the orthopaedic services by the larger number of old people is only part of the explanation. The availability of new and effective measures to meet some of the needs has led to new demands for orthopaedic services. There is no doubt that the radical changes in the surgical treatment of arthritis which followed upon the development of total hip replacement in the early 1960s has led to an enormous demand for orthopaedic resources. Prior to that date osteotomy and arthrodesis operations had a much more restricted application to arthritis and were particularly unsuitable for elderly patients with advanced conditions of the disease. The total hip replacement is one of the most outstanding surgical advances in recent years. From its early restriction to one or two specialist centres, its use has spread to every orthopaedic unit. Knee and other joint replacements follow much the same course.

I was amused and delighted to read paragraph 3.34 of the Duthie report about a promise made 10 years ago. It states:

"In 'The Challenge of Arthritis and Rheumatism'", a report on problems and progress in health care for rheumatic disorders, which was published in 1977 and edited by Dr. Philip H. N. Wood of the Arthritis and Rheumatism Council's epidemiology research unit at the university of Manchester, it is said:

"Hip and knee arthroplasty are rapidly becoming accepted as standard procedures. No joint is safe from the ravages of the disease though, and much research is being directed to replacement arthroplasties that would help the considerable numbers of patients with damaged shoulder, elbow, ankle and finger joints. Moreover, in polyarthritis it is now possible to undertake programmes of principal joint replacement to restore some degree of independence and activity to patients who previously would have become totally crippled."

I have seen the truth of that promise in my own area. It was a joy to see. The Southern Derbyshire health authority covers six constituencies, including mine. One of my first visits after being appointed Minister was to the Derbyshire royal infirmary's rehabilitation unit in Derby. It was set up in 1973 at the initiative of my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) when he was Secretary of State for Social Services. The two units have become internationally known.

I saw the full range of diagnostic, surgical and rehabilitation facilities for patients suffering from a variety of chronic conditions, of which arthritis is probably the most well known. I saw occupational therapy, physiotherapy and hand surgery facilities. That specialty is affected equally by the rising numbers of elderly.

I was particularly moved to meet a lady of about my own age who had spent nine years in a wheelchair. She was walking around happily having been repaired in numerous places. She said that she now needed her ankles repairing because after many years of being in a wheelchair they had become weak. Now that she is walking with the aid of only a stick the ankles are showing signs of the degeneration that had necessitated earlier operations. She is now looking forward to having her ankles fixed.

That is a modern miracle but it involves an enormous amount of time, skill and effort. If one joint is affected in a patient, the probablity is that others will be. As skills to help these patients improve, pressures on orthopaedic facilities increase quite sharply. The number of patients awaiting treatment may change very little, but the number of interventions that can be made per patient may increase sharply. Therefore, the facilities can rapidly become overstretched.

I have seen the work that is being done in conjunction with the Derby royal infirmary at Bretby hall orthopaedic hospital, which is my constituency. There we see, perhaps, part of the answer. The 60 beds at Bretby hall are entirely for planned surgery and are retained only for the purpose in accordance with recommendations made in the Duthie report. Bretby hall is now able to do full hip replacements in an hour and a half in the operating theatre instead of the four or five hours that used to be necessary to perform the operation. Patients go home in 12 days. I am told that that is not quite a record, but it is standard procedure at Bretby hall. I hope that the expertise and skills that go into that sort of speedy and effective use of resources can be examined and perhaps copied elsewhere.

We must be aware that our elderly population my be much more adaptable than we think and may find it much easier to cope with some interventions than perhaps we were ready to give it credit for in the past. On one occasion recently the league of friends at Bretby hall was asked to make money available for a set of Sony Walkmans. The league asked why this equipment was needed and the explanation was that knee joint replacement operations and the replacement of similar joints can be done under local anaesthetic. When this is done the patients are alert and awake and it is quite a noisy procedure. It was therefore suggested that patients might prefer to listen to Elgar or whatever while the operation takes place.

At a later date I visited the hospital and met a number of my constituents, including one elderly lady who had had an operation to replace a knee joint under local anaesthetic. She had thoroughly enjoyed the experience. I asked her whether she had made use of a Sony Walkman, to which she responded with a firm "Of course not". She added, "I wanted to hear what was going on and I asked for a running commentary."

Demand is increasing sharply because the possibilities of successful interventions are increasing. As my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North has said, over 80 per cent. of these operations are now successful. People are queuing up for them and each patient may find it is not only the most serious joints that can be dealt with. It may be that other joints can be assisted. We might expect that in future patients will come forward several times for work to be done. If the intervention is no longer an unpleasant experience and if, as my elderly constituent suggested, it is becoming an interesting experience, we can expect that demand will continue to increase. On the other hand, my own experience suggests that by judicious use of existing facilities we can ensure that we are able to respond to demand. Indeed, we are determined to do so.

I shall give the House some of the overall figures that will put my general remarks into perspective. The trauma and orthopaedic specialty nationally covers a wide range of work and in 1978 it handled fewer than half a million patients. In that year it dealt with 441,000. By 1985, 527,300 were dealt with by the specialty. That is an increase of 19 per cent. In other words, for every five patients dealt with in 1978, six were dealt with in 1985. In the light of the circumstances that I have described, that is an amazing achievement. In March 1979, the number of cases on the waiting list was 133,500. By September 1985, the most recent date for which I have figures, the figure was 129,300, representing a 3·2 per cent. fall. In March 1979, there were 13,500 urgent cases on the waiting list. By September 1985, the figure had dropped to 9,623, representing a fall of 14·2 per cent.

Mr. Butterfill: Can my hon. Friend confirm that the waiting list figures would have been considerably better had it not been for the health workers' strike?

Mrs. Currie: Absolutely. I am willing to confirm that. There have been two significant NHS strikes in the past decade—one in 1978 and one in 1982. The 1982 strike had devastating effects on waiting lists. We have endeavoured to recover from that. However, in most specialities we have not only recovered from 1982 but, as in the cases I have described, we are now showing a considerable improvement, even on the 1978-79 figures. We have not finished yet. The estimated waiting time, in median terms, in 1979 was 13 weeks. In 1984, it was 12 weeks. The figure has been sticky. It has not dropped in the way we should have liked.

The first hip replacements were done in the late 1940s. I was reminded recently, after I made an injudicious comment that they were unknown 20 years ago—they were very much known 20 years ago—that the most effective ones were beginning to be done about 38 years ago. In 1978, the number of hip replacements stood at about 28,000. In 1983, the figure was 37,000 and, in 1984, it was 38,000. My hon. Friends will be aware of the promise made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State during his speech at Bournemouth in which he said:

"We have raised that number to 38,000 today. But I aim to do more. By 1990 I want to see that number approaching 50,000."

A figure of 50,000 would be almost double that which existed about 12 years ago. We are determined to achieve that objective. In 1978, the waiting time for hip replacements was about 23 weeks. After the NHS strike in that year, the waiting time rose to 25 weeks. By 1983, we had got it back down to 24 weeks. It is still at that level nationally. Obviously, the figure varies a great deal. The target time for non-emergency treatment is one year. Nationally, on average, the hip replacement programme is within that target.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West will bear with me if I direct much of my attention to the Queen Alexandra hospital in Portsmouth. I listened with great care to what my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North said. Much of what he said was right. I suspect that in his position I should have used much stronger language. The major part of the Queen Alexandra hospital was completed eight years ago, although there has been a hospital on the site since 1908. The new hospital was built by John Laing. Two major repair jobs have had to be undertaken, and that has had a drastic effect on patient services. All 14 of the main operating theatres closed for five weeks from 11 August so that badly defective concrete floors could be replaced. It is estimated that the repairs will cost £200,000. The theatres are on two floors in two groups of seven. It was hoped to open some operating theatres on the bottom floor while later work continued above. Only six other main theatres are available for use—five at St. Mary's hospital, which is the other district general hospital, and one at Gosport war memorial hospital.

[Mrs. Currie]

About 600 non-urgent operations were delayed, and only essential surgery was possible. The possibility of using two neighbouring private hospitals on an agency basis was explored. I am glad to report that since these events began the hospital dealt with all emergency and trauma cases without any problems. There was not a problem for emergency work or for anyone brought in off the street, but there was a continuing serious problem for all planned work.

The defective floors were laid about 10 years ago by subcontractors to John Laing which have since gone out of business. Talks are continuing between John Laing and the Wessex regional health authority, and the legal implications are being considered. My hon. Friend will understand if I say very little more on that matter.

In addition, as my hon. Friend mentioned, 75 beds on the top floor of the hospital have been put out of commission for three months because of extensive water damage to the hospital's flat roof. Repairs will cost an estimated £300,000. The flat roof construction of the hospital was a recommended technique for all major public buildings when Queen Alexandra hospital was designed. However, the method has been discontinued. The life expectancy of such flat roofing appears to be about 10 years. The regional health authority considers that there is no liability on the part of the contractor.

Those of us involved with the National Health Service and with other public building matters, such as municipal housing, in that period might well have wished that flat roofs were banned a long time ago. But they were not; they now are. We have to pick up the tab for the repairs that should have been unnecessary. The circumstances in Portsmouth fully bear out my hon. Friend's remarks.

Work on the first major repairs began in August and will not be completed until February 1987. My Department accepts that this is unfortunate. It is essentially a matter for the relevant health authorities to resolve, but Ministers are taking a close interest, as we are concerned about the effect on patient services. We are assured that the decision to close the beds and to reduce surgical services was not taken lightly. The health authorities concerned have been making every effort to ensure that the impact on patient care is kept to a minimum.

For the purpose of the debate, I checked the current situation. I shall endeavour to give my hon. Friend as much informatin as I can. The 14 theatres were indeed closed, as I mentioned. Seven theatres were opened on 22 September. I understand that five of these theatres are available for orthopaedic work. The total in-patient waiting list on 1 April 1986 was 1,136. By 30 September 1986 it had risen to 1,403. However, I am told that only 11·6 per cent. of patients waited for more than a year. It is worth reflecting that the equivalent figure for the rest of the country is about 30 per cent. Although there has been a substantial diminution in services, Portsmouth, until that date, had received a relatively better service than many other parts of the country. I am sure the people of Portsmouth appreciate that and indeed have come to expect it, as, of course, is their right.

Last year some hip replacements were done privately at the King Edward hospital at Midhurst. At least one orthopaedic surgeon has been trying to persuade the health authority to release more money for hip replacements to be done at Midhurst, where a good service was provided for local people. Another orthopaedic consultant has let us know that his waiting list has grown so fast that he cannot take on any more people for elective surgery, which is a very sad reflection on the circumstances in Portsmouth. I am told that that consultant is immensely hard-working and does as much as might be expected of him and that his patients respect and appreciate his work. We are conscious of the accuracy of my hon. Friend's remarks.

In June, the Portsmouth health authority asked the Wessex regional health authority for extra non-recurring revenue so that hip replacements could be contracted out to the private sector. I understand that at that time the answer was no. The authority asked again in September and has put it on the agenda for its district review in December. The authority also said that it was prepared to forgo for two years capital money that it has allocated to other services to reduce hip replacement waiting lists. We appreciate the efforts made by this district health authority to come to grips with the problem. I hope that it will not be necessary to damage or postpone plans for other services. However, if that is the only way we will be able to improve the waiting lists for hip replacements, it is for the district health authority, in consultation with the regional health authority, to decide what it wants to do.

I mentioned that the debate is very timely. My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North may not be aware of the fact that the district general manager is meeting clinicians on Monday 3 November to consider a possible reorganisation of orthopaedic surgery, with a view to expanding in-house facilities. Serious and urgent consideration is being given to the ways in which existing facilities could be utilised in order to get waiting lists down.

The health authority is looking at doubling day surgery facilities when the next stage of repairs is complete. Given the remarks I made earlier about the changes in anaesthesia and the techniques of orthopaedic surgery, it may be possible to do more of the work on a day basis and release other resources for more serious cases in orthopaedics or possibly for cases in some other specialties, which may otherwise have to wait if orthopaedics is to be advanced. The possibility of expanding day surgery is very worthwhile.

My hon. Friends will know that nationally the number of day surgery cases has doubled in the past six years and now about one million cases each year are being attended to in that way. I have had treatment of that kind. It is nice to be able to go home when one has finished, provided that adequate arrangements are being made at home to prepare for the patient and that that is what the patient wants to do. It is marvellous to think that people may have full hip replacements and major joint operations that turn them from complete cripples into walking people in a matter of weeks and that it may be possible, subject to the most stringent controls over the assessment of the patients, for them to get some of the work done on a day basis and be able to pop in from time to time to get the next bit done. That would be an adequate use of resources.

I hope that what I have said has shown sufficiently that we are taking the problems being put to us by colleagues in Portsmouth very seriously. It is a serious matter. In my judgment, it should not have happened. The problems we face with this building now require to be put right properly. It is no good simply wringing our hands over what has happened in the past. An enormous amount of money, nearly £500,000, is now being spent on putting those construction problems right. We are assured that the region and the district are taking seriously the effect that that has had on waiting lists, especially in orthopaedics, and that every effort is now being made to get to grips with the problem. I am confident that, within a short time, efforts will have been made, and I hope that funds are found locally, to ensure that the waiting lists can now be reduced.

In orthopaedics we have a service that never used to exist and was not possible and we have a pattern of disability among a section of the population that never used to be a problem because few people reached such old age. We now have both. It is a challenge to the Health Service which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, other Ministers and those whom we have appointed to the district and health authorities are taking seriously. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North for giving us this opportunity to discuss these matters.

London Ambulance Service

1.38 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I wish to raise aspects of the London Ambulance Service. I am grateful to the Minister for being here at this time. We have this practice of airing grievances before the Adjournment and my grievance is deep. Although I appreciate the Minister's presence, I make no apology for raising this matter because I do not think that she understands — I hope that she will by the time I have finished — the extent of the inconvenience and distress being caused by her Department and its works to thousands of people in London and to the employees of the London Ambulance Service, as well as the knock-on effects on doctors, out-patient departments and families throughout the metropolis.

In reply to earlier debates, the hon. Lady properly stressed the nature and concern of care and, in particular, the effect upon the individual. On several occasions she has reminded us of happy outcomes and marvellous things that the Health Service is doing. I am afraid that she will have little scope for that in her reply to what I have to say today because I believe that there has been a major sequence of maladminstration in the Health Service, which has caused a great deal of submerged unhappiness. I look to her to put it right. If she is concerned to achieve happy outcomes such as she has cited, I hope that she and her senior colleagues will do something about the matter that I now raise.

The North East Thames region has featured in a previous Adjournment debate, and my constituency of Newham is in it. We have our own district health authority, which is subject to the regional health authority. However, as the hon. Lady and others may know, the London Ambulance Service is run on an agency basis by the South West Thames regional authority for all the authorities in London. That causes an administrative layer and difficulties that might not appear elsewhere, but I fear that what has happened in London is happening elsewhere, although in London the administrative knock-on effect may be greater because of that structure. I should prefer the London Ambulance Service to be responsible to an all-London elected body but, alas, the Government have not regarded that and the service was removed from the care of the Greater London Council some time ago.

When we think of ambulances, we think of the emergency ambulances rushing through the streets, perhaps with a case aboard, and we drive to the side of the road to let them by. However, two to three times the amount of mileage is done on non-emergency services, carrying people who have to attend outpatient clinics and calling for them at their homes. Most often those people are not on stretchers. Sometimes they are in wheelchairs, but sometimes they are classified as ambulatory. It is to those non-emergency services in London and elswhere that I refer exclusively today.

In 1983 the Government established a Rayner-style departmental survey of the service. Under the guidance of the chairman of the East Birmingham health authority, Mr. James Ackers, the assistant district administrator, Mr. B. R. Payne, reported in March 1984. It was a long report and I do not intend to quote from it at length. The upshot was that Mr. Payne believed that there was some misuse of non-emergency ambulance services by people who might have walked. The letter that I shall read later talks about people getting to the hospital by other means rather than being carried by those expensive services.

In addition, there was some administrative slippage in the service, and Mr. Payne thought that a link between those who paid for it, particularly the district health authority, and those who used it, would lead to greater efficiency, although in his report he said that he thought that the extent of misuse was no more than 4 to 10 per cent. Of course, one man's idea of misuse may be another man's idea of non-misuse—it is a variable term.

Mr. Payne's calculations showed that there could be a saving in expenditure of about £9·4 million. The Secretary of State said in a letter dated 17 March 1984:

"The report identifies as the major weakness in the control of the non-emergency service the fact that those DHAs which do not have the responsibilty of managing it are able to make demands on it without direct and immediate financial consequences to themselves. The main recommendation is that the ambulance service should provide a given quantity of service to each DHA at an agreed cost and the DHA should develop a means of including an agreed element in unit or clinical budgets for patient transport. It would be open to districts to buy in part of the service from other public agencies or the private sector if this was more cost-effective, providing the quality of the service was maintained."

I emphasise those final words. In the middle of his statement, the Secretary of State used a deterministic phrase when he said that the service

"should provide a given quantity of service to each DHA".

In other words, the superior authority will decide how much is to be provided and that will be that unless very stretched financial resources are used for buying in more services. That is administration from above and, I put it to the Minister, a dreadful mistake. The important question is how much will be provided. In London, there is a considerable cut.

On 3 June, I asked the Minister's predecessor:

"What requests have been made by the South-West Thames regional health authority to district health authorities in respect of the use of the London ambulance service; what is the target of that authority's request for redirection in the number of 'non-emergency' cases to be carried?"

He replied:

"In a letter dated 20 March 1986, the South-West Thames regional health authority asked district health authorities to reduce the demand for non-emergency ambulance transport for walking cases by 40 per cent."—[Official Report, 3 June 1986; Vol. 98, c. 540.]

That is an extraordinary figure—40 per cent. of one category of patients were no longer to be carried by the London Ambulance Service. In fairness, I must stress that it was not 40 per cent. of all non-emergency cases but 40 per cent. ambulatory non-emergency cases—people who might be considered able to walk or to get to hospital by other means. But who decides that?

I have been in correspondence with the chairman of the South West Thames regional health authority — Sir Antony Driver—to clarify that draconian cut. I shall quote from his letter because it is fair and instructive to do so. He explained that the patients who were carried and regarded as walking patients were only a proportion of non-emergency cases. On his calculations, the reduction was nearer 12 to 15 per cent. of overall non-emergency cases than the 40 per cent. figure which he had previously given. He said:

"The further complication in using figures such as those which you quote"—

—the Minister's figures, not mine—

"is that the demand level for non-emergency transport is very much a matter of clinical decision, and in the past it is the unfortunate truth that doctors have not been as critical in examining the need for expensive ambulance transport compared with other forms as they might have been, and it is only now, during the period when the service has been unable to fulfil all the demands, that they have been required to be more critical. It is our earnest wish that the Ambulance Service continues to carry all patients for whom ambulance transport is clinically essential."

That is Whitehallese, "Yes, Minister" stuff. I wish to do a little exegesis on that bureaucratic letter. The chairman admits that the health authority has not been able to fulfil all the demands. That happened, of course, because of the cut of 40 per cent. in walking cases required by the Minister and, in turn, by the regional health authority.

The chairman said in his letter that doctors had not been so critical in examining the need for expensive ambulance transport as compared with other forms. What does he mean by "other forms"? Does he expect people literally to walk to hospital, to use the bus for outpatient treatment or to ask friends with cars to give them a lift? Those alternatives may be possible for many people. Doctors would not have expected ambulances for those people, but I understand that in a high proportion of non-emergency cases ambulances are requested by doctors.

What about the phrase "clinically essential" used by the chairman? I would have thought that a caring society and a caring NHS would have preferred either "clinically desirable" or "clinically advisable". We all know that even when in the best of health, on an off day we do not feel too good. Elderly people should not have to find their own way to hospital; it is far better that an ambulance be provided. The Minister has referred to the high proportion of elderly people in the nation. A high proportion of non-emergency ambulance cases are elderly or disabled people.

The 40 per cent. cut has been defended by the chairman, so the hapless district authorities or other regional authorities that rely on him to provide ambulance services must follow suit.

In practice, difficulties can be even greater than I have described. Even given a certain amount of increased efficiency in the handling of ambulances — which was fairly pointed out in the Rayner-style report—difficulties will arise. For example, there will be traffic problems, delays, difficulties with grouping people, waiting for people to leave outpatients, and so on. Theoretical mathematical calculations do not always work out.

In the north- east Thames ambulance division in March this year there were up to 200 cancellations a day, amounting to between 600 and 700 cancellations a week. I understand that in Newham general hospital, which is already 70 per cent. oversubscribed for its emergency services, there was about a 20 per cent. cancellation rate. The effect of that is considerable and the difficulties for the doctors and the outpatients can only be imagined. People wait for the ambulance, but do not know whether it will arrive. I understand that up to 12 cancellations were made for one of my constituents, and many hundreds of them had their appointments cancelled. Anyone who has used the appointment system in an outpatients department knows how complex it is to obtain one. Imagine then sitting waiting for an ambulance that does not arrive.

In north-east London during the last few months, and especially in Newham, the rate of cancellations has reached alarming and unacceptable proportions, especially for the elderly. Let us consider the difficulties for their families, who want to know whether they have been able to attend for their appointments and whether they can get home again. In many cases patients have been delayed when trying to get home. I have even heard of cases where, because ambulances were not available, the hospital staff —out of the goodness of their hearts—have obtained minicab services, no doubt at extra cost to the NHS.

The Minister has made it plain that she understands the problem. The cumulative anxiety of those wishing to go to hospital, their relatives who may be at work and the people who try to help out is enormous. The Government have created an administrative knock-on effect on an enormous scale. They talk of a caring Health Service, but it is unquestionable that there is a serious effect on family life, on out-patient departments and on the morale of the people who operate the service. The latter are subjected to questioning and abuse when patients arrive. They are expected to be proficient but are not given the tools or manpower to do the job. It is almost impossible to quantify the social disease that that process engenders. All hon. Members will appreciate that point from experience of their own communities.

On 3 June, I asked the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), some questions and received almost unbelievable replies. He said that in 1985 the London Ambulance Service ran nearly 3·7 million ambulance miles for emergencies and 7·7 million ambulance miles for non-emergency services. I have been told by people who use a wheelchair that ambulances without a tail-lift often arrive to collect them. The projection for 1986 is that emergency miles should remain much the same at 3·8 million but that non-emergency miles should be reduced to 6 million as a direct result of the Rayner study and the Minister's letter. That is a reduction of 1·7 million miles per year, or more than 20 per cent.

The consequences of the reduction in terms of human impact are mind boggling. Is the Minister suggesting that needs have fallen by anything like that amount or that there is that much misuse of the service? Like all other hon. Members, I as a taxpayer am prepared to ensure that, even if there is 10 per cent. misuse of the service, the other 90 per cent. should get the service that they need and on time. Hospital workers can then provide an efficient service. Goodness knows, they are under enough pressure as it is. The Rayner study is an irregular form of administrative study. By Government fiat, originating with the Prime Minister, after one letter from the Minister and one investigation by one assistant administrator in one health authority, we now have chaos and distress affecting a large number of people in London.

The hon. Lady has told us that she is a caring Minister. This is a short notice debate and I am grateful for her presence, but we look to her to give an undertaking to examine this matter. I do not believe that this caring Health Service and its caring Ministers can prove their point until we get back something like the 1·7 million ambulance miles that have been lost to the people of London.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): I must apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to my hon. Friend the Minister and to the House for not being here when my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) was unexpectedly called to make his Adjournment debate speech. I shall be all the briefer because the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) has since raised an important issue and is entitled to an answer before we rise.

The matter raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East touches on his constituency, mine and others. It concerns the provision of radiotherapy and cancer treatment services for a very large number of our people. I shall not go over the ground again because I have no doubt that it has been covered most adequately. I merely wish to reinforce the plea that I know will have been made against the regional health authority's proposals for the relocation of the first-class long-established and highly reputable cancer services at Southend.

The regional health authority has had three attempts at moving the goal posts to Chelmsford, Runfold and Harold Wood and has not come up with any real solution to the problem. It has not taken into account the terrible distress caused to cancer patients in our constituencies who have to travel considerable distances for treatment two or three times a week. The regional health authority's proposals have caused not only widespread dismay but great anger throughout south-east Essex. It is unbelievable that its proposals do not save money, but will, in fact, cost more.

I have written to my hon. Friend the Minister in detail about the matter and will do so again, but I simply want to state here and now that the NHS exists in order to deal with sick people as efficiently and humanely as resources permit. Instead, the regional health authority has caused immense distress and anxiety. It has taken over a year to arrive at a proposal that satisfied no one. I do not mean just ordinary lay people such as myself and my constituents and cancer sufferers and their relatives; I mean the Essex medical committee and the consultants caring for patients. I hope that my hon. Friend will take this expression of deep dissatisfaction seriously and will take a personal interest in the matter with a view to ensuring that when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State comes to make a decision he is fully informed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) must be disappointed at the way that the systems of the House operated today so that he could not be present for what I hope, on reading the Official Report tomorrow, he will agree was a useful and timely debate. I know that he had made representations to Ministers and the regional health authority and has effectively represented his constituents' worries on this matter, and I am sure that he will continue to do so. I hope that he will take note of what was said this morning and I shall be pleased to hear his further comments. I am grateful to him for supporting his constituents in the way that he has today.

The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), as he said, has asked questions on the London Ambulance Service and he is not alone in that. For example, questions have been put down by the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman), and on 18 May 1986 my hon. Friend the Member for Ravensbourne (Mr. Hunt) had an

[The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and

Adjournment debate on the subject which the hon. Gentleman can find, should he so wish, at columns 956 to 962 of the Official Report for that day.

The British ambulance service has been the subject of much scrutiny and change recently, partly, as the hon. Gentleman said, as a result of the Rayner scrutiny, which appeared some years ago. Most recently, the pay structures have been changed and the pattern of working of the service has been altered.

The salary structure agreement for ambulancemen came into effect on 1 March 1986 and it radically changed the pay arrangements for ambulancemen. It provided an opportunity for all ambulance services to rid themselves of inefficient working practices. It was intended that the changes would lead to a more efficient and effective ambulance service more sensitively geared in terms of staff deployment to patients' needs.

The agreement was reached in the ambulance Whitley council and was warmly welcomed at the time by all parties. I have recently had the opportunity to meet some of the members of the trade unions concerned at that time and to thank them for the immense amount of effort that went into negotiating that agreement and its subsequent implementation. All the details are not yet worked out. For example, ambulance officers are still the subject of some discussion. However, my Department would wish me to put on record the fact that we appreciate the enormous effort that went into negotiating that agreement by all concerned, not least by the trade unions.

There was no intention that the level of service provided to the general public should be reduced as a consequence of the agreement. The purpose of the salary structure was to replace a pay system which encouraged inefficient working practice. Both management and the trade unions recognised the importance of reducing overtime to the absolute minimum necessary for operational purposes and the need to eradicate other working practices which frustrated the establishment of a modern, cost-effective, efficient ambulance service.

The inclusive salary will replace the former pay system in which the basic rate of pay was substantially enhanced by additional payments for overtime, shift and weekend working. It also subsumed bonus payments previously paid to many services, but not to the London Ambulance Service. Overtime levels in the London Ambulance Service in the previous year, however, equated to 488 full-time equivalent staff, or about 20,000 hours a week.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will join me in deploring any system which relies so heavily on overtime to pay people a decent wage and which so destroys the opportunity that others may have of joining the service when so much of the service is provided on an overtime basis. He and I share concerns about young people who seek jobs and sometimes cannot find them. I hope that we can be reassured that the ambulance service at least and, indeed, many other parts of the NHS are doing their bit to ensure that we have more names on the payroll while we get the work done as efficiently as possible.

Mr. Spearing: The Minister may well be right and, obviously, we want the service properly staffed, with proper wages and a career structure, but that was not the burden of my remarks. Is the Minister suggesting that the talks or difficulties that she mentioned have in any way influenced the 40 per cent. cut in ambulant cases or the administrative instructions? She will agree that, although they are interesting, they are irrelevant.

Mrs. Currie: On the contrary, they are directly relevant. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will bear with me as I attempt to put the case as I see it and in such a way that the background can be fully explained.

The basic rate of payment now covers all payments of a standard working week, work round the clock and seven days a week as required. The national agreement also provided local management with the opportunity to review critically working arrangements in a number of areas. For example, the level of accident and emergency cover was to be reviewed to ensure that the level provided matched that indicated by operational need. You will see, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that in one sentence I have answered the hon. Gentleman's point.

Provision was also made for rotas to be reviewed and, where necessary, changed, using the criterion that operational necessity is the basis for staff being on duty, and operational necessity alone. Out-patient and day-centre arrangements were also to be reviewed and altered to provide optimum vehicle and manpower utilisation. The agreement further provided for a commitment for working practices to be kept under continuing review and for changes to be made where indicated. It also provided for the extended training of ambulance men and women and for them to practise extended skills without further payment.

The basic management principle on which the salary structure was based was carefully worked out with specialist experts. The expectation was that salaried status would lead to major changes in the organisation and delivery of ambulance services and to an improved service for those patients who needed it. However, it was realised that the full benefits of the agreement would take time to materialise, and that the pace of change would be variable across the country and depended critically on the ability of management to secure these changes. It is not surprising that there were teething troubles in some areas and it cannot be denied that there were and perhaps still are particular problems in London.

Prior to the introduction of the salary structure in March, the London Ambulance Service management reviewed its working arrangements and reached local agreement with the staff about the changes necessary to provide the level of service that it considered appropriate.

It decided that there was an immediate need to improve the quality of the emergency ambulance service in London. Changes were therefore introduced on 1 March simultaneously with the introduction of the salaried structure. More resources were diverted into the emergency side of the ambulance service, and these have helped to improve response and activation times, producing a better emergency service for patients. Clearly, that was a worthwhile development, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman can welcome it.

September is the latest date for which I have been able to obtain figures, but I understand that then the nationally recommended response times were met in 90 per cent. of emergency cases in London, as against about 85 per cent. previously. But that is still below the minimum standard of 95 per cent. that is set down nationally.

Consequently, we expect to see further improvement. The improvement in the emergency service had an immediate impact, however, on the volume of non-emergency ambulance services in London. That occurred because the manpower available to carry out non-emergency duties was temporarily reduced and new staff needed to be recruited and trained. That led to major problems during March and April, and a considerable number of complaints resulted.

Since then, however, the situation has improved considerably. The full benefit of additional staff will not yet have been felt, because of holiday absentees, but during October we hope that the full impact should have become apparent and we are assured that within the next few weeks a large number of staff who are full-time, part-time and training will come on stream. The London Ambulance Service is particularly recruiting part-time staff to cover day hospital work, which will in time release full-time staff to deal with out-patient work. Thus positive measures have been taken to improve the undeniably difficult situation that existed earlier in the year.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the most important thing is to ensure that the ambulance service is being used effectively. It is not a taxi service, or a free bus service. It is quite inappropriate that skilled personnel and expensive equipment should be used in anything but the way in which they were intended.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about ambulant non-emergencies. Surely he agrees that a substantial proportion of ambulant non-emergencies should be able to reach the care that they require without the assistance of the ambulance service, whether they are going to the hospital, day centre, clinic or a GP's surgery. The hon. Gentleman should address himself to that principle.

Mr. Spearing: I did.

Mrs. Currie: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman can find it in himself to accept the general principle that equipment should be used for the purpose for which it is provided.

He mentioned the mileage being covered. I refer him to a written answer given on 24 July 1986 and to volume No. 102 of the Official Report, columns 445 to 446. The hon. Member for Peckham asked what mileage was covered by ambulances run by the London Ambulance Service in the South-East Thames region in 1985. She also asked for the estimate for 1986. She was told that in 1985 the emergency service mileage amounted to 808,687 miles. The estimated mileage in 1986 was put at 838,000 miles. That is an increase of about 30,000 miles a year. The non-emergency mileage in 1985 was estimated to be 2,029,105. We estimate that the non-emergency service should provide around 1·6 million miles. In other words, there is quite a substantial drop of about 400,000 miles a year. Those figures are for the south-east division of the London Ambulance Service, which follows the south-east Thames boundary but includes Croydon.

Such figures confirm what the hon. Gentleman was saying. But in his reply to the debate on 15 May 1986, which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Ravensbourne, my predecessor said:

"The London Ambulance Service management has reviewed its working arrangements and reached local agreement with the staff about the changes necessary to provide the level of service it considers appropriate. It decided that there was a need to divert more resources to the emergency side of the ambulance service . . . I believe that it will be welcomed by all hon. Members."—[Official Report, 15 May 1986; Vol. 97, c. 960.]

That is what was intended, and that is what has happened.

In my response on 24 September 1986 to a letter from the hon. Member for Peckham dated 18 July I was able to update the training figures. I told the hon. Lady:

"As you will know, the South West Thames Regional Health Authority (which manages the LAS on behalf of the four Thames regions) acknowledged that problems had arisen on the non-emergency service and began taking positive measures immediately to overcome these difficulties. Their urgent measure to recruit and train additional staff has succeeded in providing over 140 additional ambulance personnel since March for non-emergency work. These people are already operational, and 80 more are now in training."

I am advised that we now have 150 additional full-time staff on non-emergency work with 21 part-timers and about 60 personnel in training.

In my letter to the hon. Member for Peckham I continued:

"The Region has also opened up the recruitment possibilities by seeking up to 300 extra part-time staff to deal with day hospital demand so that full-time staff can be released to carry out important out-patient work. Coupled with this, the Region's actions have allowed more staff to be available for the life-or-death emergency work to ensure that standards are improved in this vital area of the service. I feel that the Regional Health Authority deserves congratulations for the effective and speedy improvements they have made to staffing problems in just a few months."

A report in The Guardian of 27 October confirms some of the events. It says that the London Ambulance Service is carrying 30 per cent. fewer non-emergency patients today than it was two years ago. It says that only 27,500 patient journeys per week were being made this year compared with 39,500 in 1984. About 10,500 fewer walking patients were being transported—a reduction of 44 per cent. I am more than happy at that development. We are keen to have a better emergency service. We are determined to ensure that the equipment and resources are not used inappropriately.

The hon. Member for Newham, South said that he would like the LAS to be run by an all-London elected body. I assume that he would have liked the GLC to run the service. Once again Socialist Members are crying over spilt milk, because the GLC has been abolished. However, in its 20 years no attempt was made by any Government to reorganise in that way. The chance was there, but it was not taken. The GLC is no longer there and the ambulance service will not be run as the hon. Gentleman prefers. The hon. Gentleman is at a dead end. I am satisfied that the ambulance service is being run and managed in the interests of patients.

The hon. Gentleman is right to express worries, but it is also right for the Government to ensure that regional health authorities and those managing the ambulance service can guarantee the efficient use of skills and equipment. The ambulance service is part of health care. It is not a taxi or a bus service. It is no more acceptable for an ambulance to be used inappropriately than it is for an operating theatre to be used inappropriately. I am sure that the regional health authority and the London Ambulance Service are taking careful note of the points that have been made, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising them this afternoon.

Question put and agreed to.

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

HARWICH PARKESTON QUAY BILL

Ordered,

That the Promoters of the Harwich Parkeston Quay Bill shall have leave to suspend proceedings thereon in order to proceed with the Bill, if they think fit, in the next Session of Parliament, provided that the Agents for the Bill give notice to the Clerks in the Private Bill Office not later than the day before the close of the present Session of their intention to suspend further proceedings and that all fees due on the Bill up to that date be paid.

Ordered,

That on the fifth day on which the House sits in the next Session the Bill shall be presented to the House.

Ordered,

That there shall be deposited with the Bill a declaration signed by the agents for the Bill, stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill at the last stage of its proceedings in this House in the present Session.

Ordered,

That the Bill shall be laid upon the Table of the House by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office on the next meeting of the House after the day on which the Bill has been presented and, when so laid, shall be read the first and second time and committed (and shall be recorded in the Journal of this House as having been so read and committed).

Ordered,

That all Petitions relating to the Bill presented in the present Session which stand referred to the Committee on the Bill shall stand referred to the Committee on the Bill in the next Session.

Ordered,

That no Petitioners shall be heard before the Committee on the Bill, unless their Petition has been presented within the time limited within the present Session or deposited pursuant to paragraph (b) of Standing Order 126 relating to Private Business.

Ordered,

That in relation to the Bill, Standing Order 127 relating to Private Business shall have effect as if the words "under Standing Order 126 (Reference to committee of Petitions against bill)" were omitted.

Ordered,

That no further fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which fees have already been incurred during the present Session.

Ordered,

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House.—[The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

To be communicated to the Lords, and their concurrence desired thereto.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

British Airports Authority

1. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met representatives of British Airport Authority staff.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. John Moore): I have not met representatives of BAA staff.

Mr. Hughes: Does that not show contempt for the people who work in the BAA and have given a lifetime of service to build up the company to what it is now? As the Secretary of State is negotiating to sell the business over their heads, would it not be courteous for him to meet them and discuss their problems and anxieties about the future?

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman is a fair-minded man, so he will not mind my reminding him that I have not been asked by the staff whether I wish to see them. As the hon. Gentleman probably knows from his knowledge of my Department, no such meeting has ever taken place in the history of the BAA. Beyond that, the letter of 28 July from the chairman of the BAA to the joint staff showed the extent to which there had been full consultation, but if the staff wish to see me on any matters which come within my purview and responsibility I shall, of course, be delighted to see them.

Mr. Steen: When my right hon. Friend meets the chairman of the BAA will he remind him that it is Government policy to ensure competition, which means competition between British Airways and the independent airlines, and that allowing the BAA to indulge in unfair competition or restrictive practices is not Government policy and is frowned upon by Ministers?

Mr. Moore: The main question relates to potential meetings with BAA staff, but I am sure that the chairman of the BAA is fully aware of the Government's attitude and comitment to a policy of competition.

Channel Tunnel

2. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what level of capital investment by British Rail he intends to authorise in respect of the Channel Tunnel.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): We have approved in principle BR investment of up to £390 million at January 1985 prices. Individual elements in the proposals will have to be submitted for detailed Government approval.

Mrs. Bottomley: Does my hon. Friend agree that the tunnel will create valuable opportunities for manufacturers, especially in the north, and exciting new prospects for exporters throughout the country?

Mr. Mitchell: I agree with my hon. Friend. There is about £1,000 million worth of business to be picked up during the construction phase and, on average, 10,000 jobs per year will be created through the term. With reference to the north, I am glad to say that a famous engineering company in Glasgow already has letters of intent in relation to two tunnel boring machines.

Mr. Stuart Holland: In relation to the level of capital investment that British Rail intends to authorise in respect of the Channel tunnel, will the Minister comment on the report in the latest issue of New Civil Engineer, the source of which is British Rail market analyst Ken Gibbs, and which includes comments from Kleinwort, Benson, Mowlem and others, that an entirely new, privately funded and operated rail route from Folkestone to London may be undertaken with a terminus at Victoria? Will he comment on that now, or later, and relate it to the issue of why Waterloo should be the sole flagship terminal for Channel tunnel traffic?

Mr. Mitchell: I know of no authoritative suggestion that there should be a new rail line from the coast to Victoria. British Rail has made it clear why Victoria is not suitable for the length of trains necessary for that service.

Mr. Adley: As a railway enthusiast, does my hon. Friend remember that the South Eastern Railway built a line from Tonbridge to Reading via Redhill a century ago for the purpose of a Channel tunnel and that that line was not included in the Beeching cuts? Is he aware that, sadly, that line is not now included in the major electrification scheme to enable British Rail and the Government to achieve the regional objectives for the tunnel, which are one of the main objects of the exercise? Will my hon. Friend reconsider the arrangements whereby British Rail has been asked to provide plans only for that which is absolutely essential, thus omitting those advantages?

Mr. Mitchell: I understand that British Rail is currently reviewing its initial decision that freight would be hauled from the tunnel by diesel and is now considering electrically powered haulage. That may well affect the line to which my hon. Friend draws attention.

Mr. Gale: I do not wish to draw my hon. Friend on a matter which is the subject of a public inquiry, but will he confirm that in principle the Department welcomes private investment in British Rail?

Mr. Mitchell: It is up to British Rail where it sees opportunities for private investment to help, but at the moment it is not a central part of British Rail policy.

Rail Electrification

3. Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Transport what projects of rail electrification are currently awaiting his approval.

Mr. Moore: We have approved five major electrification projects submitted in the last three years. There are no further submissions outstanding. Work on four of the five electrification projects, including Bournemouth to Weymouth and Kings Cross to Edinburgh, is going ahead. The fifth, Tonbridge to Hastings, is already operational.

Mr. Butterfill: Does my right hon. Friend agree that quite apart from the benefits that these electrification schemes will bring to industry generally, they will also bring substantial benefits for the spreading of tourism away from London and especially to Dorset?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend is right. When I had the pleasure of opening one such scheme, the local authorities and the mayors of the areas involved were anxious to impress upon us the critical importance of tourism. Electrification will help tourism by improving not just the time but the quality and service of the trains.

Mr. Maxton: Is the Minister aware that there is considerable anger in the west of Scotland at British Rail's proposal, following the electrification of the King's Cross to Edinburgh line, that fast trains from Glasgow should be re-routed through Edinburgh? Is he aware that there is great anxiety that this will cause considerable damage to the passenger routes in the west of Scotland and generally to the line between Glasgow and London? [HON. MEMBERS: "It is just rumour."]

Mr. Moore: As my colleagues have pointed out, it is just rumour, but I will look into the matter, because it was raised the other night. I have heard rather more compliments about electrification than I have heard complaints about the rumours to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

Dr. Michael Clark: When granting approval for electrification, is it my right hon. Friend's intention also to approve the installation of automatic open level crossings? If so, will he bear in mind that such crossings have a poorer safety record than conventional crossings and that there is a great deal of resistance to them in both country and urban areas, as shown by petitions from my constituents in South Woodham Ferrers?

Mr. Moore: I am conscious of the petitions and of the point that my hon. Friend has raised. He may recall that this matter is under review. I have appointed Professor Stott to review the whole situation, because it clearly merits serious attention.

Mr. Ron Lewis: Is the Minister aware that the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) has caused vibrations as far down as Carlisle and far north west of England? I assure the Minister that there is general dissatisfaction about it all the way from Preston up to Glasgow. Will the Minister look at that issue?

Mr. Moore: I shall certainly look at that issue, but the main question relates specifically to the electrification programme, and I have confirmed that every submission put up by British Rail has been approved and that no submissions are outstanding.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Has the Secretary of State had sight of the Government's report to the EEC, highlighted a week or so ago by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), in which some very disparaging remarks are made about the infrastructure in Wales? When will we have electrification of our railway lines? Why should Wales always be last in the queue?

Mr. Moore: I must confess that I have not personally read every one of the 17 volumes of the report to which the hon. Member refers, although I have, of course, read everything in relation to my transport responsibilities. The Government's record on electrification is outstanding. It is extraordinary to hear a Member whose party when in government approved only £71 million worth of electrification projects criticising the Government's approval so far of £474 million. That contrast illustrates the absurdity of some of the current debate.

Mr. Steen: Before my right hon. Friend agrees to any more rail electrification projects, will he have regard to the fact that British Rail management refuses to stock British mineral water and insists that every——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is miles wide of rail electrification.

Mr. Pavitt: In view of the changes at the north London line terminal, what are the plans for electrification there?

Mr. Moore: So far, every submission that we have received from British Rail relating to electrification proposals has been approved by the Government.

Mr. Dalyell: Is the Secretary of State aware of the great increase in traffic at the stations of Linlithgow, Polmont and Falkirk High and the success of the Edinburgh to Glasgow line in recent months? In those circumstances, is he sure that an added electrification route from Kings Cross to Edinburgh and then on to Glasgow will not damage the successful traffic between Edinburgh and Glasgow? This is very important to my constituents.

Mr. Moore: I always consider the hon. Gentleman's detailed comments carefully. I am not aware of the precise details about increases in traffic, but I shall consider the matter. I do not imagine, however, that what the hon. Gentleman has said denies the high quality investment which most people regard as of great benefit to the east coast line.

Mr. Snape: Will the Secretary of State reconsider the statement that he has just made — that every case for electrification that has been received from British Rail has been approved? Will he consider the Manchester to Blackpool electrification case, which the Minister of State denies having rejected, presumably erroneously? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that that line should be electrified on economic grounds and because it would be a satisfactory diversionary line in case of problems on the west coast main line?

Mr. Moore: To be precise, I should have said that there was one application a while back regarding Cambridge. It did not relate to the Blackpool to Manchester connection. There was no application from British Rail in that instance. The application, which was considered las year, was an application by the local authorities. When the application was examined, it was thought that sprinter diesels would provide most of the benefits at a much lower cost to taxpayers and ratepayers. I therefore reaffirm what I said about British Rail applications.

Rail Freight Services (Wales)

8. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has had any recent discussions with the chairman of British Rail concerning the organisation of freight services in Wales.

Mr. David Mitchell: No, Sir.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Minister appreciate that on 30 October I received a letter from Sir Robert Reid, chairman of British Rail, saying that if the demanding financial objectives set out by the Secretary of State are to be met the Severn tunnel junction will have to close? Will the Minister intervene in this matter, because if rail freight in Wales is to have any future this wonderful facility should be kept, irrespective of the safety and environmental factors involved in the new proposals?

Mr. Mitchell: It has been the policy of Labour and Conservative Administrations that freight should pay its way. There is no relationship whatever between the freight rationalisation in south Wales and my right hon. Friend's recently announced objectives for British Rail. What British Rail is doing in south Wales is designed to enable it to compete successfully with road haulage in a competitive world and to secure a viable business. I assume that the hon. Gentleman wants BR to have a viable freight business in south Wales, so I hope that he will support the action of BR management.

Motorway Service Areas

9. Mr. John Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria his Department adopts for the provision of motorway service areas.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): The general policy is to provide service areas at intervals of about 30 miles.

Mr. Heddle: I hear what my hon. Friend says. Will he then explain to the House and to the many hundreds of thousands of those who use the M25 why that criterion was not adopted in the design of that orbital route?

Mr. Spicer: The proposal is that there should should be four or five MSAs on the M25. One must recognise, as the Government do, that the tendering, planning, and inquiry processes are very lengthy. We expect South Mimms to be fully operational in the spring of next year, and hope that Thurrock will be available in 1988. The other two — Clackett Lane and Iver — are still subject to inquiry processes.

Mr. Cartwright: Given the sheer volume of traffic using the M25, why have we had to wait for the completion of the motorway before the Government have come forward with proposals for these essential facilities?

Mr. Spicer: That is a reasonable question. In many ways it would be better to begin the tendering process before the motorways are completed, but it is extremely difficult to get tenderers to come forward and get the process started before the motorways are completed.

Mr. Higgins: Does my hon. Friend accept that perhaps different criteria should apply in the case of a road such as the M25 — a circular road — compared with a road that goes in a straight line such as the M1? Given the present level of traffic on the M25 in the rush hour, is there not some danger that if there were motorway service areas people who got off would never get back on again?

Mr. Spicer: My right hon. Friend makes a good first point. I shall not comment on the second point, save to say that we have one MSA almost every 30 miles, but not quite.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that he has been besieged by questions from Tory Members who have not taken on board the Prime Minister's words last week? She said that she wanted no criticism of the M25. What is going off? Only a few days have passed and senior Tory Members are stabbing the Prime Minister in the back. Will the hon. Gentleman assist us?

Mr. Spicer: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was making the perfectly sensible point, which I should have thought would be welcomed on all sides of the House.

that the M25 has been extremely successful in a number of objectives—particularly, for example, in reducing the number of lorries going into the centre of London. But it is always capable of improvement. That is why we have now said that we shall consider the question of four lanes.

Mr. Roger King: Will my hon. Friend give an assurance that when the northern link of the M40 is built from Oxford to Birmingham, the provision of motorway service areas will be catered for during the building programme and not some years after it has been opened?

Mr. Spicer: I have already said that that is a good objective, but when the tendering process is involved it is difficult to get the tenderers interested until they are clear as to the timing of the opening of the motorway concerned.

Mr. Chapman: To help the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), if not my own ministerial prospects, may I say how much my constituents appreciate the completion of the M25? As the whole of the M25 goes through the established green belt of the metropolis, however, may I have my hon. Friend's assurance that not more than four service stations will be built along this length of motorway and that wherever possible and practicable already developed land or derelict land will be used?

Mr. Spicer: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his first remarks. I cannot give him any assurance as to the number of motorway service stations, although I have already indicated that only four or five are planned at the moment along the entirety of the route. Therefore, the indications are that the stretch to which my hon. Friend referred will not have so many such stations as he fears.

Airports (Safety)

11. Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the relative safety performance of the United Kingdom's airports compared with that of other European countries.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Civil Aviation Authority has the statutory operational responsibility for safety at airports in the United Kingdom. I do not have comparative data about airports elsewhere in Europe.

Mr. Page: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Given that a couple of civilian aircraft have been playing leapfrog in the skies over one of our major airports, has he had talks or meetings with the chairman of the CAA to see what can be done to reassure the public about the safety of our airports and airlines?

Mr. Spicer: Yes, I have discussed this matter with the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority, who naturally shares my concern about this matter. He has asked me to inform the House that he would welcome meetings with interested Members of Parliament to discuss the details of air traffic control procedures. One risk-bearing air miss is one too many, but it is worth remembering that the air miss to which my hon. Friend referred is the first of its kind over London in the past 10 years, during which period there have been 2½ million movements at Heathrow alone, let alone Gatwick, Luton and Stansted.

Mr. Alfred Morris: When can we expect a further ministerial statement about the lessons that have been learnt from all the inquiries into the traffic accident to the Boeing 737 at Manchester international airport on 22 August 1985?

Mr. Spicer: I am unable to make a definitive statement to the House. All the very detailed investigations that are currently being undertaken have yet to be finalised.

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend will know that one of the most important safety aspects at airports is security and the prevention of terrorist threats. Will he comment on how good British airports are in this respect as compared with European airports?

Mr. Spicer: Although it is not strictly a safety matter, security is equally of great importance, and the standard of security at British airports is the highest in the world. Many figures could be used to support that statement. For instance, a bomb has never been placed on an aircraft that has left a British airport, nor has there even been a hijack.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: In so far as it has been alleged that an aircraft controller carrying out his duties was actually interrupted during the course of his work and that that may have been a contributory factor to the most recent incident, surely an emergency change in procedure is required. Does the Minister agree that it is not just a matter of the Civil Aviation Authority talking about coming to Parliament and discussing the matter with Members of Parliament, but that rapid action needs to be taken in case there is a similar incident in the future?

Mr. Spicer: The CAA is looking urgently at the proposition that there was some distraction, although it is not clear that distraction was the cause of the incident.

Mr. Dykes: Apart from examining the air miss over Stanmore to which my hon. Friend referred, which is very important, is he aware that we need to examine the rest periods and the hours of work of controllers, a point that has also been raised again? Will he discuss that question with the CAA?

Mr. Spicer: That, equally, will be looked into, but the current rest period at a busy control centre such as Heathrow is half an hour every two hours, so considerable rest periods are already built into the system.

Mr. Park: Does the Minister agree that in principle it would be best to segregate private flights from scheduled flights, bearing in mind, for instance, the number of private aeroplanes using Birmingham airport, while Coventry airport just up the road is not used to anything like its full capacity?

Mr. Spicer: That proposition is well worth considering. In the London system, which is far and away the busiest system, there is already clear segregation. However, I shall look carefully into this question. In the United States the lack of segregation has been a major cause of accidents in the past. Perhaps, therefore, we should consider segregation for all airports.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Does my hon. Friend agree with me that there is no reason, on safety grounds, why airlines should not be permitted to make transatlantic flights from Glasgow airport?

Mr. Spicer: I suspect that there are no safety grounds, although I should need to take the advice of the Civil Aviation Authority on that, but there are traffic distribution policy grounds for transatlantic flights being made at the moment only from Prestwick.

Mr. Dalyell: I thank the Minister for his courtesy and obvious concern on telephoning me when I raised with him the case of a constituent who was involved in the incident on the Edinburgh shuttle. Is there any way in which knowledge of these dreadful things—my consituent was terrified—can be made available more quickly?

Mr. Hind: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take the hon. Gentleman's point of order at the end of Question Time.

Mr. Spicer: I believe that a wide distribution of knowledge is a good thing. That is one reason why I very much welcome, as a start, what the chaiman of the CAA has said. He would welcome giving hon. Members as full a briefing on these matters as they are interested in receiving. After that, it will, to some extent, be a matter for their judgment how much knowledge is spread. As a matter of Government policy, I believe that we should make available as much information as we reasonably can, without starting scare campaigns.

Mr. Robert Hughes: I commend the air traffic controllers on their excellent work over the years, but is it not the case that the greater the traffic, the greater the risk and that the CAA report says that, in addition to one or two specific incidents, there has been anxiety about the deterioration in air traffic control standards? Therefore, will the hon. Gentleman study the report extremely carefully and present a report to the House to assure everyone that there is no shortage of staff or training and that money is available to increase the number of staff if that should be needed?

Mr. Spicer: It would be worth analysing that matter in greater detail, because we must not have views based on partial leaks. One misunderstanding has arisen out of a partial leak that referred to only a limited amount of data.

I have looked at the figures carefully and if hon. Members examine the numbers at risk in airmiss reports they will see that there has been a decline as traffic has risen from 1982 to 1985. An impression has been given by the limited figures that have been made available, but the converse of that impression is true. That is precisely why I think that we should have the full facts available.

British Rail (Staff Unions)

12. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met trade union representatives of British Rail's staff.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend has not yet been approached by representatives of the rail unions for a meeting, although I have met them on a number of occasions.

Mr. Boyes: When the Minister next gets the opportunity to meet the British Rail trade unions, will he explain to them why the Government have found it necessary to make a further 25 per cent. cut in their grant to British Rail? Will he also explain how many more people will lose their jobs as a consequence, bearing in mind that tens of thousands of loyal, devoted and skilled railwaymen have already lost ther jobs? It is all right sitting on the Government Benches making these decisions, but ple are losing their jobs, and travellers, such as myself, use British Rail week in and week out, are finding that e level of service is dropping, not because of the people who work on the lines, but because of the decisions of British Rail and because Ministers are cutting the system and starving it of cash.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman asked about my next meeting with the unions. The former Secretary of State met the unions in December 1983. The NUR was to have met us in July 1985, but cancelled the meeting, saying that it would be in touch to arrange another date. It has not yet done so.

The second part of the hon. Gentleman's question referred to the cut in the public service obligation. Of course, all taxpayers will be pleased with that cut, provided they can get adequate quality standards from British Rail in the delivery of its services. The chairman has accepted the revised targets that have been produced and has assured us that he is able to provide the quality of standard that he has been invited to provide. I ask the hon. Gentleman to stop running down British Rail and to recognise that the staff are doing a damned good job and that in many cases quality standards are rising.

Mr. Holt: Will my hon. Friend accept that he should not wait for the trade unions to approach him, but that he should be asking to meet the trade unions and asking why there are such high rates of absenteeism, particularly among transport catering staff? Passengers have to go for hours on end without food or drink on British Rail trains.

Mr. Mitchell: That is a management matter for British Rail and not one in which Ministers should get involved with staff unions. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the problem of vacancies. As unemployment among railwaymen has been mentioned, I should say that there are still unfilled vacancies and British Rail would be glad to have people come forward to fill them.

Mr. Anderson: Before the Minister rushes to criticise absenteeism or other matters, will he take the trouble to look at the scandalously low pay of many people who work on British Rail? He will find that even people who often work unsocial hours have take-home pay of only £70 or £80 a week. Even if the Minister and his colleagues wish to criticise absenteeism or the inability to fill vacancies, will he realise that the 25 per cent. cut will be made at the expense, to some extent, of railwaymen and their standard of living?

Mr. Mitchell: British Rail has managed with a 25 per cent. reduction in its PSO for the past three years and this has not resulted in any reduction in railwaymen's wages. Moreover, the level of their wages in real terms is slightly better than it was when the Labour Government were in office.

Mr. Steen: When the Minister meets the unions, will he ask them to have a word with British Rail management to ascertain why English mineral waters are refused on British Rail, with the consequence that the French have a monopoly on all British Rail rolling stock? Why do the French have such a monopoly, and why are English mineral waters refused on the same wagons?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend makes an interesting but somewhat detailed point about the management of the catering side of British Rail, which I shall draw to the chairman's attention.

Mr. Spearing: Is it not the contention of the unions and of others that any reduction in the real value of rail subsidies must be met either by reducing the quality of services or increasing fares over the general rise in inflation? Is the Minister suggesting that the reduction can be wholly met from increased efficiency?

Mr. Mitchell: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Snape: When the Minister next meets the appropriate trade unions, will he discuss with them the impact on fares and services of the Government's latest reduction in financial support for British Rail? Will he accept from me that on Friday afternoon, to take one example, my train to Birmingham was 40 minutes late for a 95-minute journey? Will he also accept that it is no consolation to regular rail travellers to gaze across fields at the permanent traffic jams on the M1?

Mr. Mitchell: I travelled on the first electric train from Huntingdon this morning and it was dead on time on arrival. Moreover, Network SouthEast has set itself a target of 90 per cent. of trains arriving within five minutes of scheduled time and is now beating that target. As for the improvements in efficiency which are required, 8 per cent. in three years is not beyond the wit of most major organisations.

Channel Tunnel

14. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from the public expressing concern about any delays in the Channel tunnel construction project.

Mr. Moore: The Channel tunnel project is still on target for construction to start next summer as planned, subject, of course, to parliamentary approval, and very few members of the public have expressed concern about possible delays.

Mr. Dykes: May I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer? In view of the scurrilous disinformation and hostile propaganda against this excellent project last week, will he go further and confirm that there is, as he said, no delay, that the finance is fully secured and that this is an attractive project for investments? Will he confirm also that there is no question of the French having unfair domination, that we are indulging in 50-50 co-operation with our great continental neighbour 20 miles away on a fully friendly basis and that this excellent project will produce thousands of jobs?

Mr. Moore: I do not think that I can pick up all the points in my hon. Friend's supplementary question, but essentially, the success of Eurotunnel in raising funds in the City was a remarkable achievement when we consider that the Bill has not yet completed its passage through Parliament, that the treaty has not been ratified, that the concession agreement is not yet in effect and that competitors have been running a fierce campaign to dissuade investment. That campaign suggests that those behind it share the Government's hopes for this exciting project.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Minister confirm that the money for the Channel tunnel was secured only at the very last minute by the intervention of the Governor of the Bank of England who started the arm-twisting process by saying to financial institutions, "Will you put up some money, albeit we might not need it for a long time?" Against that background, will the right hon. Gentleman give a categorical assurance, once again, that the Government will not use any taxpayer's money to finance this project at any time?

Mr. Moore: Questions for the Bank of England are a matter for its Governor. I confirm that the Government have no intent, desire, or see any necessity, to provide governmental money for the Channel tunnel project. The hon. Gentleman should address his remarks to his own party, which understands the excitement of the potential developments for British Rail to which hon. Members referred a few moments ago. The project has potential also for the north and all other parts of our great kingdom that might benefit from it.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that he has received no representations from anyone in Southend expressing concern about delays in this project? Is he willing to issue a clear warning to average British investors that if they put their money into the project later this year, they will lose it all if the project is not completed because of funds running out?

Mr. Moore: I would not seek to intervene in any way in the normal market process or seek to give advice to investors as to what they should or should not do with their money. I rely of course—as you would expect, Mr. Speaker—upon my hon. Friend for advice about the views of people in the Southend area.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Westland plc

49. Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General what representations he has received about the conclusions of the fourth report from the Defence Committee on "Westland plc: the Government's Decision-making," in so far as they relate to his responsibilities.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): I have received three letters from hon. Members in which they asked questions as to the role I played in the inquiry into the disclosure of the Solicitor-General's letter.

Mr. Dalyell: Is it, or is it not, true, as reported by Mr. John Lewis in the Sunday Telegraph on 27 July, that the Attorney-General did any such thing as threaten Sir Robert Armstrong that he would bring in either the Director of Public Prosecutions or the police if there was not an agreement from the Cabinet to have an inquiry into the circumstances in which the Solicitor-General's letter was leaked?

The Attorney-General: I have nothing to add to what has already been said in answer to questions and in statements.

Mr. Winnick: Is it not amazing that the Attorney-General has to threaten the Cabinet Secretary that the police will be called in to No. 10 unless an inquiry is held into public matters? Does the Attorney-General realise that the very fact that he refuses directly to answer the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), which I am putting to him again, must confirm that the newspaper reports are accurate?

The Attorney-General: My answer in no way confirms the report.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I cannot help but say that I am not sure that the Attorney-General is being as candid with the House as he might be. Am I right in assuming that the reason why no civil servant is to be prosecuted for leaking the Solicitor-General's letter is that the Attorney-General believes that ultimate blame lies elsewhere? Is he aware that his failure to prosecute civil servants effectively pins the blame on the only possible remaining culprit—the Prime Minister?

The Attorney-General: If I may say so, that is the non sequitor of the day. The only civil servant whom I was concerned with was the information officer. For the reasons that I have explained to the House, it is quite clear that no jury would ever convict her.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of the Attorney-General's reply, I give notice that I intend to raise the matter on the Adjournment.

Mr. Derry Mainwaring Knight

50. Mr. Greenway asked the Attorney-General if he will now state what sum was paid in legal aid to Mr. Derry Mainwaring Knight during the so-called Satan trial; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): Nothing was paid to Mr. Knight. Payments made under the legal aid scheme in respect of fees, as assessed by officers of the Crown court, are paid direct to individual fee earners. It has been the practice of successive Governments not to publish these.

Mr. Greenway: As Mr. Mainwaring Knight was convicted of conning hundreds of thousands of pounds out of people, was he required to repay the legal aid paid on his behalf for his defence? If not, should he not have been, in view of the great demand upon legal aid funds?

The Solicitor-General: The sentence imposed upon Mr. Knight, in addition to seven years' imprisonment, included a fine of £50,000 with two years' imprisonment consecutive in default of payment.

Mr. Ashby: What real efforts are made to investigate the means of people such as Mr. Knight to ascertain what money they really have and so recover legal aid fees?

The Solicitor-General: As my hon. Friend knows, there is an investigation into means. The decision whether to grant criminal legal aid has to be made promptly. It is not always possible, of course, to carry out as full an investigation as might be desirable in ideal circumstances. The matter is examined as thoroughly as possible.

"The Sun" (Cartoon)

51. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Attorney-General whether he will make a statement on his decision not to prosecute The Sun newspaper regarding a cartoon it published.

The Attorney-General: My decision was taken on the basis of all the relevant circumstances, which included as one—I stress one—of the factors, a mistake in my Department which arose from a misunderstanding between myself and an official and led to the complainants being wrongly informed that I had decided to prosecute. The true position was that I simply wished police inquiries to be made. The House will realise, of course, that I naturally regret this.

Mr. Hughes: What new information or representations had the Attorney-General received between 30 July and 21 August? What was their nature, and what was in them that made the Attorney-General change his mind?

The Attorney-General: Various representations were made from the Arab Society, but I do not know whether they were within those dates. Various people concerned with the matter, including The Sun, were wrongly told that there would be a prosecution. When they were interviewed by the police, on advice, they took a course different from the one they would have taken if they had known the true facts.

Mr. Nelson: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, whatever the sensitivies of Arab terrorists or pickets outside Wapping, the pig is a much maligned creature?

The Attorney-General: I have always been rather fond of pigs.

Legal Aid

52. Mr. Richard Page asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the recent Treasury review of legal aid.

The Solicitor-General: The review team comprised officials from the efficiency unit, the Lord Chancellor's Department and the Treasury. The period of consultation on the recommendations ended on 30 September. The Government are now analysing the responses and an announcement of our decisions will be made as soon as possible. At present this seems likely to be about the turn of the year.

Mr. Brown: This is a good starting point for a debate on legal aid. Will it be possible for Parliament to debate the report in Government time? Inasmuch as the report highlights the large sums of money now being spent through the legal aid scheme, could the Solicitor-General tell us whether there ought to be a Government Minister directly accountable to the House of Commons for that expenditure?

The Solicitor-General: The allocation of Government time is a matter not for me but for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. I note the hon. Gentleman's point about direct ministerial accountability. I am not sure that direct accountability would necessarily reduce expenditure from the public purse, but I note the point and will refer it to those concerned.

Mr. Heddle: Without anticipating what the report might say, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there are circumstances in which constituents of all right hon. and hon. Members have problems, particularly the low-paid, those on small incomes and, sometimes, those on retirement pensions, when they wish to appeal against rating assessments, and in order to put forward sensible appeals require professional advice? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that legal aid in certain deserving cases might be worth while?

The Solicitor-General: It is easy to think of types of dispute in which our constituents would like legal aid but do not have it at the moment. The present Lord Chancellor has enlarged the area of legal aid. I cannot hold out any hope to my hon. Friend that further enlargements are an immediate prospect.

BBC (Libel Case)

53. Mr. Dubs asked the Attorney-General if has yet made a decision regarding possible proceedings for contempt of court in relation to the publication by some of the media of premature reports concerning an out-of-court settlement in the British Broadcasting Corporation libel case; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Since the conclusion of the proceedings, I have received a letter from the trial judge setting out the aspects of the media coverage which caused him concern. Officials have procured copies of the relevant material, which I have considered with the benefit of advice from Treasury counsel. It is clear that certain factual inquiries need to be made before a final decision is taken as to the institution of proceedings for contempt. Those inquiries are now in hand.

Mr. Dubs: Does the Attorney-General agree that there are many disturbing features about this case and that there is a widespread sense of disquiet, both about the media coverage and about many other aspects of it? Will the Attorney-General examine the circumstances of this case rather more widely? If he does not do so, many people will feel that justice was certainly not done.

The Attorney-General: I am concerned principally with the media coverage, because that is under my responsibility. I must tell the hon. Member that before I received the letter from the judge I had already asked the Director of Public Prosecutions to start an inquiry.

Mr. Ashby: Has my right hon. and learned Friend heard of the new phrase, to "Panorama" somebody? Is it not the case that there was no intimidation of witnesses, but that the BBC had an absolutely hopeless case—that is what the matter is about—and it has been trying to "Panorama" its own settlement?

The Attorney-General: If there really is any evidence of intimidation of witnesses, I just wish that it could be made available. [Interruption.] As I said in an answer to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), who keeps interrupting me, the only document that he has provided to the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis is Mr. Pedley's wretched letter.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the Attorney-General not recognise that Mr. Christopher Hayward, the Dorset county councillor, was nobbled by an official at Conservative Central Office? Does he not understand that there is a tape in existence which will prove that, that it will surface inevitably, and that when it does we shall look to the right hon. and learned Gentleman to ensure that there are prosecutions?

The Attorney-General: What the hon. Gentleman is doing yet again is using the privilege of the House to make allegations in respect of which he has no evidence of any kind.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Overseas Aid

54. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the figures for United Kingdom expenditure on overseas aid are compiled on the same basis and using the same criteria as the figures for other Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Chris Patten): I am satisfied that the figures for Britain's overseas aid reported to the OECD conform to OECD definitions. The relationship between these figures and those for public expenditure on aid is explained in the introduction to the Overseas Development Administration's publication "British Aid Statistics", a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Clarke: Does the Minister recall that in the open letter that was addressed to him by his predecessor, the former Minister said that meetings between himself and the Prime Minister on those matters were few and far between? Will he therefore draw to the attention of the Prime Minister the need not to muddy the waters with regard to the figures by private flows, promissory notes, and so on? Will he distinguish his term of office by aiming unreservedly for the United Nations' target of 0·7 per cent?

Mr. Patten: On the hon. Gentleman's substantive point, I could not add reasonably to what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said to him in correspondence that was published on 30 June. I hope that I can help to deliver a quality and effective aid programme over the next few years.

Mr. Forman: I welcome my hon. Friend to his new responsibilities at the Dispatch Box. Does he agree that, whatever may be the finer points of the statistical arguments about assistance to developing countries, the important thing is to increase the beneficial flows, and in that respect the private flows are every bit as valuable, when carefully directed, as public flows?

Mr. Patten: I totally accept what my hon. Friend has said. The position of the Labour party on that issue is somewhat schizophrenic.

Mr. Anderson: Does the Minister agree that on whatever basis those figures are compiled they show a disturbing fall year on year from 1979? I refer to that valedictory letter in the Daily Telegraph from his predecessor. Does the hon. Gentleman recall that his predecessor said that the only time that the Prime Minister bothered to speak to him about aid was when she dismissed him? Does the hon. Gentleman expect to meet the Prime Minister more frequently?

Mr. Patten: It would make every day if I saw the Prime Minister regularly. Since 1982-83 our aid programme has been increasing in real terms, and I hope that we can secure the real terms increase in the aid budget.

Mr. Stuart Holland: The Minister will be aware that, according to the OECD, the Development Assistance Committee aid review committee on 18 September was given "a detailed account of the project appraisal criteria and procedures followed by the United Kingdom."

We understand that that reflected a British initiative. Will the Minister follow that through by making available a copy of that detailed account on project appraisal in the Library of the House?

Mr. Patten: I shall consider what the hon. Gentleman said. I am sure he will also have recognised that the OECD Development Assistance Committee in September welcomed the high concessionality of our aid programme. It also welcomed the relatively large concentration of aid from this country to the poorest countries, which was better than the average elsewhere.

Gibrepair Ltd.

55. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the new managing director of Gibrepair Ltd.; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have not met the new managing director of Gibrepair Ltd.

Mr. Colvin: Does my hon. Friend recall that one of the conditions for financial assistance by the Government to Gibrepair Ltd. to assist with the privatisation of the former royal naval dockyard was that a system of proper industrial relations practices, a sort of code of conduct, should be agreed between management and worker? Those of us who visited the dockyard during the summer were disappointed to find that there had been little progress on that front and that that was not the fault of the shop floor. Will my hon. Friend ensure that no further payments are made to Gibrepair Ltd., until the management and unions agree on a proper system of working practices, bearing in mind the extremely competitive market in which Gibrepair is operating?

Mr. Patten: I am sure that that is a matter which should and does concern the Government of Gibraltar as the owners of Gibrepair. My hon. Friend will know that in 1983 we agreed to provide up to £28 million towards the establishment and initial working capital of Gibrepair Ltd., and £26·6 million of that has been spent. We agreed in 1986 to allocate a further £2·4 million as a final contribution to the capital costs of the project. Final in those circumstances means final.

India

56. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what level of aid is proposed to India for the next 12 months.

Mr. Chris Patten: In the current financial year we plan to spend about £108 million on bilateral aid to India and approximately £6 million from the aid and trade provision. We have also told the Government of India that India could expect soft loans or mixed credit for British exports to a value of up to about £300 million over the next five years provided the two Governments identify and agree the desired projects. This would be additional to our normal programme of grant-aid.

Mr. Janner: I welcome the increase in aid to India. However, does the Minister agree that the level of poverty and deprivation in that country are staggering and that we should do everything in our power to help? Can the House have the Minister's assurance that the present unhappy differences on matters of policy between Her Majesty's Government and the Indian Government will not be allowed to interfere in any way with the aid programme?

Mr. Patten: We would like to see ever warmer relations with the Indian Government. India is the largest recipient of our aid on a bilateral basis, because the largest number of people in absolute poverty live there.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Now that Mr. Rajiv Gandhi has denounced Her Majesty's Government as racist for requiring visas, as India does, how can the Indian Government bear to accept aid from us?

Mr. Patten: That is a question that might be directed to Mr. Gandhi. We have made our views on visas well known to him.

Deforestation

57. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps his Department takes as part of its aid programme to discourage deforestation.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Government fully support conservation of forest resources and their use on a sustainable and renewable basis. They are giving priority to forestry projects within the aid programme, and, with other donors, support the Food and Agriculture Organisation's tropical forestry action plan. I am delighted to add that the Korup rain forest in Cameroon has just been designated a national park. Our project with non-governmental organisations to help conserve this forest will go ahead with the Cameroon authorities.

Mr. Beith: I welcome that answer. However, are all aid-supported projects, including those under the aid and trade provision, evaluated if they are in afforested areas in order to assess whether they will do damage to existing forests? If not, will the Minister ensure that such steps are taken?

Mr. Patten: I am endeavouring to ensure that we give environmental aspects of development aid ever greater priority. I take note of the extremely important point made by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Grist: Does my hon. Friend appreciate the pleasure which it gives me, as someone who has trekked in that forest in the Cameroons, to know that the aid is going to an area which was once ruled by this country, the Anglophone part of the Cameroons? What other African countries are making similar proposals to this Government?

Mr. Patten: We have made progress in other countries with forestry projects, for example in Ghana. We are now spending £5·8 million on forestry projects, which is about an 80 per cent. increase over the past five years, so I hope that many other countries will benefit from that in the future.

Mr. Barnett: The Minister will be aware that this is a major problem, especially in tropical areas. I wonder whether he can tell the House what kind of expenditure goes on afforestation within his tropical scientific unit and how many qualified foresters are working under the technical co-operation programme? The Minister will know as well as I that there are many first-class university departments and research institutes in forestry in this country and that we have a major contribution to make.

Mr. Patten: As I said in reply to the last question, we are spending about £5·8 million on forestry projects and about £500,000 on research. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman about the number of foresters.

Turks and Caicos Islands

61. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement concerning the level and use of United Kingdom budgetary aid to the administration of the Turks and Caicos Islands.

Mr. Chris Patten: A total of £1,460,000 has been approved for the current year. Budgetary aid is provided to cover an overall deficit on the recurrent account. Its purpose is to enable the Government to maintain a minimum reasonable level of public services until means can be found of generating additional sources of revenue.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Minister remember the substantial capital investment in a controversial airport on the Turks and Caicos Islands associated with an equally controversial Club Mediterranée project, on the advice of the Foreign Office, to eliminate that very deficit? When will the deficit be eliminated? Is the Department responsible, not for development, but for the general grants in aid?

Mr. Patten: I can tell the hon. Gentleman about the impact of tourism, which I think is the main point behind his question. In our judgment, Club Med has had a beneficial effect on the Government's income through increased tourism. The number of visitors has increased substantially. That should help to deal with the budgetary question.

Mr. Hind: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have noticed that Transport questions 4, 6, 17, 18, 26, 28, 33, 43, 44 and 46 deal with the effects of deregulation under the Transport Act 1985. Significantly, with the exception of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), who asked question 43, every other hon. Member who tabled questions on the same subject was absent. They include five members of the Labour Opposition, one Liberal and one member of the SDP. That means that others interested in the topic were denied the opportunity of asking supplementary questions.

Does this mean that those members of the Opposition who did not bother to turn up are satisfied with my right hon. Friend's wonderful policies and that they illustrated their satisfaction by their absence? Will you, Mr. Speaker, permit me now to ask——

Mr. Speaker: Order. No, I will not. I did not think that the hon. Gentleman was rising earlier, otherwise he might have had his chance. There were a number of absentees today. If hon. Members cannot be present for questions they need only let my Office know and their questions will not be called.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When you became Speaker of this House you undertook to protect Back Benchers' rights. I believe that you have done so to a greater extent than any other Speaker since I have been here. In the context of the protection of Back Benchers, is there not a right to get answers from Ministers, not necessarily on judgment or policy, but on fact and personal behaviour? For example, I asked the Attorney-General whether he did or did not threaten Sir Robert Armstrong with the DPP and the constabulary? Are we not entitled to a straight answer—yes or no—either "I did threaten him" or "I did not threaten him", rather than a complete evasion? On matters of personal behaviour by Ministers, however senior, are we not entitled to a yes-no answer to a yes-no factual question?

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for what he said in the first part of his point of order. All that I can do is to give Back Benchers an opportunity to ask questions. I am not responsible for the answers.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of what you have just said, and as my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) did not get a response from the Attorney-General, will you look into whether it is possible for the Attorney-General to answer questions more frequently? The matter could go before the appropriate Committee. When the Attorney-General came into the Chamber today, he looked ill, and I thought that he did not answer my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow because he did not quite feel up to it, but when the Attorney-General answered other questions, he did so very fully. He spent two or three minutes answering questions on other issues——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already dealt with that matter. I cannot be responsible for the answers that are given. The hon. Gentleman is sitting opposite the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, so perhaps he should put his question to him.

Mr. Williams: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know you accept that the interests of Back Benchers should be protected, but we are in some difficulty, as the Government have assured us that we cannot ask people such as the Cabinet Secretary what happened because, as officials, they are not supposed to answer such questions, and, ultimately, responsibility to inform the House lies with Ministers. But when hon. Members table questions—I am not even talking about unexpected supplementary questions — the legitimate response can only be yes or no. When we ask a serious question, such as whether the law was threatened against the Prime Minister and the Cabinet Office, we cannot obtain an answer. At some stage we shall have to ask you to give us some guidance, Mr. Speaker, on how, in the light of what has been said about Westland, the rights of Back Benchers can be protected against ministerial abuses and the refusal of Ministers to answer our questions.

Mr. Speaker: Opposition Front Bench spokesmen and Back Benchers would not expect me to take responsibility for deciding whether answers to questions are correct. I have no idea whether they are, and that has never been part of the Chair's function.

Mr. Winnick: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will agree that Back Benchers should be able to question Ministers. Earlier today I went to the Table Office to ask when I could table a question to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and I was notified. I found out that the right hon. Gentleman answers questions very infrequently, and that when he does so it is for five minutes only. The right hon. Gentleman has been making the most outlandish attacks on the BBC. Your would argue, Mr. Speaker, as I would, that if the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster wishes to do that, so be it, but as the right hon. Gentleman has been taking a much higher profile than any of his predecessors, will there be some opportunity, when the new Session begins, to ask the right hon. Gentleman questions more frequently? When he comes to the Dispatch Box, can it be for more than five minutes at a time? The present situation is entirely unsatisfactory.

Mr. Speaker: I should refine the advice that I gave to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). It is not a matter for the Procedure Committee, but, normally for the usual channels to decide on the frequency of questions and the length of time in which they are answered.

Orders of the Day

Housing and Planning Bill

Lords amendments considered.

3.34 pm

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Carthcart): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Amendment No. 4 amends the Tenants Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980. Part I of the Bill relates to the right to buy while the rest of the Bill deals exclusively with provisions affecting England and Wales. Tomorrow we shall be debating Lords amendments to the Housing (Scotland) Bill. The Government have now introduced an important clause that gives Ministers powers to vary upwards only the discounts available in respect of the right to buy, and have thus introduced into a basically English Bill a clause affecting Scotland.

I appreciate that, as things stand, you, Mr. Speaker, do not have the power to tell Ministers not to do that. However, the way in which the Government have misused English legislation to introduce legislation for Scotland is now so great that I would ask you, at the first instance, to see the Leader of the House and representatives from the Opposition to find out whether it is possible to devise strict rules about what is Scottish legislation and what is English legislation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has more or less answered his own point of order. It is not a matter for me. It would have been open to the hon. Gentleman to put down an amendment to Lords amendment No. 4. The hon. Gentleman has not done so, but if he catches the eye of the Chair he will have an opportunity to make that point during the course of the debate.

The Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction (Mr. John Patten): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, Scottish Office, who is responsible for such matters, is on the Front Bench and will be able to respond to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) should he be fortunate enough to catch your eye during the debate on that amendment.

New Clause

EXCEPTION TO THE RIGHT TO BUY WITH RESPECT TO DWELLING HOUSES FOR PERSONS OF PENSIONABLE AGE

Lords amendment: No. 1, before clause 1 insert the following new clause—

".—In Schedule 5 of the Housing Act 1985 (exceptions to the right to buy: certain dwelling-houses for persons of pensionable age), there shall be substituted for paragraph 11—

"11.—(1) The right to buy does not arise if the dwelling-house—

(a) is particularly suitable for occupation by persons of pensionable age, having regard—

(i) to its location, and

(ii) to its size, design, heating system and other major features so far as those have been provided by the landlord, a predecessor of the tenant or a person qualified to succeed the tenant by virtue of Part IV of the Housing Act 1985,

(b) was let to the tenant or a predecessor in title of his for occupation by a person of pensionable age or a physically disabled person (whether the tenant or predecessor or another person).

(2) In determining whether a dwelling is particularly suitable, regard shall be had as to whether the dwelling—

(a) is easily accessible on foot;

(b) is on one level;

(c) being a flat located above ground floor access by lift is available;

(d) has no more than two bedrooms;

(e) has a heating system serving the living room and at least one bedroom.".".

Mr. John Patten: I beg to move, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment (a), in lieu of the Lords amendment, and Lords amendments Nos. 57 and 191.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I was expecting the Minister to say why the Government are asking the House to accept amendment (a) rather than Lords amendment No. 1. There is a difference between the two and I was hoping that the Minister would explain briefly why the Government feel bound to make a minor change in wording but a fundamental change in substance to the Lords amendment.

Mr. Patten: Alas, it is not possible to give a short response. If the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) wants a response, it will have to be long and detailed because this is a complex issue.

This is an important group of amendments. They affect the rules for excluding non-sheltered housing for the elderly from the right to buy. We discussed that issue at length in 1980 and 1984, as the hon. Gentleman knows. It is a point upon which many local authorities and individuals have strong views and, indeed, their Lordships in another place clearly had strong views on that as well.

This is not the first time that we have had a dispute with another place over the right to buy for elderly people. For all the arguments that we hear on this point, and very persuasive many of them are, some parts of the amendments that were carried in another place smack of discrimination on grounds of age. I never expected to have to accuse their Lordships, of all people, of agism, at least in part, if not in whole.

Under the present rules introduced in 1984, for which my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) was responsible when he was the distinguished occupant of the seat of the Minister with responsibility for housing, it is open to landlords to apply to the Secretary of State to have a house or flat exempted from the right to buy if they consider that it is particularly suitable for the elderly and that it was let for occupation either by a pensioner or by a physically disabled person. There have been few difficulties over the letting test, but there have been many more difficulties with the way in which the test of "particular suitability" has been applied.

Against that background, the Lords amendment would make two main changes. First, it would simplify the test of "particular suitability" which has to be satisfied before a house can be exempted from the right to buy. Secondly, it would take away the Secretary of State's jurisdiction in the matter, an important issue, and leave decisions on exemption to the landlords themselves.

[Mr. Patten]

Taking the latter point first in answer to the implicit questions posed by the hon. Member for Perry Barr, the Government cannot accept that decisions on exemption from the right to buy should be left to individual landlords.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): The Minister just said that the Lords amendment will take responsibility away from the Minister and give it to local authorities. Surely the Lords amendment takes it away from the Minister and gives it to the county courts, which is the case in most other disputes under the right to buy.

Mr. Patten: In the first instance, the Lords amendment gives the responsibility to the local authority. I shall reply in detail to the hon. Gentleman's point.

The suggestion in another place was that that would have the advantage of giving the courts, not the Government as the hon. Gentleman said, the final decision on questions of exemption. That is a puzzling assertion by some of their Lordships and now by the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), because decisions taken by the Secretary of State under the present arrangements are in the same way subject to the final jurisdiction of the courts. Therefore, it would be a substitution of the first in line, the local authorities, for the courts, rather than the courts for the Secretary of State. There is no real difference in that respect between what happens now and what the Opposition appear to propose.

The practical difference is that under the arrangements proposed in the Lords amendment decisions would be taken by one of the parties interested in the outcome. This answers a point alluded to by the hon. Member for Bootle. The council is an interested party in the outcome, just as a prospective purchaser is. It is extremely good to have someone who is disinterested, such as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, taking this important decision.

A reason why we have had problems with this issue since 1980 has been the difficulty of drawing a clear, objective distinction between non-sheltered housing particularly suitable for the elderly and the general run of ground floor accommodation. Even if all authorities could be expected to apply the test impartially — I do not know whether that would be the case — they would apply it differently and the result could be that tenants in one local authority area might find themselves excluded from the right to buy, whereas tenants in a similar property in a different area might find themselves included in the right to buy. That would make nonsense of the law which my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne and his predecessor helped to carry through the House. This is the main point of disagreement. In the Government's view, decisions must rest with the Secretary of State.

The other aspect of the Lords amendment is the simplification of the test of suitability. My noble Friend Lord Skelmersdale has made it clear that we are prepared to respond to responsible and constructive criticism on this point. I hope that the hon. Member for Perry Barr and other hon. Members who served on the Committee will recall that we tried to be as responsive as we could to points put in a constructive spirit. Having reflected on some of the problems of the past two years, we agree that some simplification of the test is necessary and we are prepared to see it. The Government amendment accepts the substance of the Lords amendment on this point. In future the suitability of a dwelling for the elderly will be assessed aganst the list of five features set out in subsection (5) of amendment (a).

There are two main respects in which we have made changes to the Opposition's proposal and now I shall answer specifically the question asked by the hon. Member for Bootle. First, we have included a reference to proximity to shops and public transport facilities. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that that is an improvement on the Lords amendment. Hon. Members will agree that that must be considered in assessing a dwelling's suitability for the elderly, although in practice the standard will have different effects in different locations.

Secondly, I propose that there should be power to vary the list of features or to add to it by order. I hope that we have got the list right this time, but we may not have done so. I hope that we shall have the power to vary the list by order in future. However, I give the House an undertaking that there will be consultations with the local authority associations and other interested bodies before any order is made under this provision.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): We are talking about the right to buy of certain people. I brought to the attention of my hon. Friend and his predecessor the problems of people on the Bournville housing estate. On that estate, the land has been partly financed by charity, but all the building has been financed by state and local government funds. A problem arises in that one set of people can buy property and another set of people living as far away as the area of this House cannot even though 95 per cent. of the money has come from local authorities. I have not been able to have this injustice put right. If people are not allowed to buy a house, why cannot they at least have the discount? There is a terrible injustice when one person can buy and another cannot. The other day the other place stopped the Government when they tried to help. Is that justice?

Cannot something be done to help people who feel a real sense of injustice? We all want to be able to encourage people to buy their homes.

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is right. I know how long and hard he has campaigned for his constituents about this matter. He has made his views known to me by letter and at a meeting. We tried to make it possible for his constituents to have the right to buy, like everyone else, but, alas, we were defeated in another place. That defeat was a mistake and we shall have to return to the issue on a future occasion.

I have two final points to make about the Government amendment. It is drafted in such a way as to provide that, where the letting test is met and the Secretary of State is satisfied that all the features are present, he will have to grant an exemption. We accept the Opposition's point that not all tenants' improvements should be disregarded in deciding whether to exempt a property from the right to buy. But the Lords amendment went too far. It would have limited the disregard to features that had been provided by the present tenant. That goes too far in other directions. It could, for instance, mean that where a widow had succeeded to a tenancy on the death of her husband, she could be denied the right to buy because her late husband paid for the installation of central heating. That would be unfair. The Government amendment requires the Secretary of State to ignore not only features provided by the present tenant, but also those provided by a predecessor in title of that tenant.

I hope that Opposition Members will see this as a reasonable and constructive response to their amendment. In the technicalities, amendments Nos. 57 and 191 were consequential amendments to the main Lords amendment, but they are also necessary as being consequential to the Government amendment.

Mr. Rooker: I am grateful to the Minister. We should not pass this on the nod because the Lords will have to take account of what is said in this debate, given that they previously overturned the Government proposal. I share the distress of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark). People locked into the situation that he described on the Bournville trust estate should at least have the right to the portable discount even if they do not have the right to buy because of the charitable housing status. Under present arrangements, those people cannot even get the portable discount. That anomaly should be put right, as it would be if positions in the House were reversed.

I come to this issue relatively new because the earlier debates between the other place and this House took place in 1980 and 1984. The Minister must be aware that this time the Lords have put the amendment into the Bill only because the Government previously operated in bad faith. That is why the Lords are so angry. Both they and Members of this House know that the right to buy has been applied to properties that meet all the criteria for houses for the elderly—houses on one level with no more than two bedrooms, with electrical facilities, wide doorways, and so on. That has been allowed by the Secretary of State. That is what has made the Lords so angry and upset the Association of District Councils and local authorities.

Nobody has put this to me on a crude party political or ideological basis. The Government have simply not operated their own criteria, or at least the Secretary of State has not. In 1984, the criteria were changed and the circular was issued. I pay tribute to the Minister's predecessor, the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), in this respect. Exemptions had been allowed, properties had been sold and post-war bungalows designed specifically for the elderly were allowed to be sold for reasons not always given by Ministers.

The Institute of Housing, in the survey organised by Harrogate, gave example after example of properties which met all of the criteria in the circular, in respect of which the Secretary of State was satisfied that the criteria had been met, but for which he still refused exemption. Such examples greatly distress local authorities because of the acute shortage of properties for the elderly. Everybody knows that one of the reasons for introducing the right to buy was to get money. As the Prime Minister put it on 5 November 1974:

"To offer them for sale would still bring a substantial profit to local authorities which they could use to build special units for old people, for which there is a serious need."—[Official Report, 5 November 1974; Vol. 880, c. 897.]

There is still a serious shortage, not to mention an increased number of elderly people because of the structure of the population.

Can the Minister say that the Government will operate amendment (a) in good faith and to the letter and that Ministers will grant no more exemptions when the criteria are met? It is important for the Lords to have this put on record and it is central to whether we divide the House on this. The Government have previously been charged with acting dishonourably because they have allowed exemptions when properties meet all of the criteria. If the Government say that they will act honourably—that they will operate amendment (a) to the letter and that there will be no fiddling when a property meets the criteria—I could not in all conscience ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to divide the House. In such circumstances, I would merely say to the other place, "Three times we have had this debate and twice the Government have misled both Houses." It is to the credit of the other place that it has proposed an amendment which forces the Government to put in statute what is in the circular, although there is a change regarding transport. That is an important step forward. The other place would not trust the Government if decisions were made by the Secretary of State rather than by the county court because the Government's track record shows that they cannot be trusted. I cast no aspersions on Ministers, but I ask the Minister to be more specific as this is an important point.

I do not know how local authorities feel about my next question. I tried to put it to one this afternoon, but it could not provide an answer. I see nothing wrong in incorporating into the lease of properties particularly suitable for the elderly, which could be sold, a restriction requiring that they be occupied only by the elderly. That happens in the private sector under leasehold for the elderly schemes, but it does not apply in the public sector, even if properties are especially suitable for the elderly. The restrictions in the private sector are perfectly legitimate and are accepted by those who purchase leasehold, so why cannot the same apply in the public sector? When public sector properties regarded as especially suitable for the elderly come out of the public sector and are occupied by people who are neither elderly nor disabled, people feel that that is not right and that the system is not being operated correctly. I see no problem about imposing restrictions, but I am told that at present local authorities cannot operate in that way because the Secretary of State would say that it was unfair. I offer that point as something for the Minister to consider in the future. In my view, such restrictions would be quite fair, open and above board. The system operates in the private sector and could usefully be applied to the public sector.

The Minister must explain more clearly how he intends to operate Government amendment (a) before my colleagues and I decide whether to divide the House.

4 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): I support the motion to disagree with the Lords amendment and I am in favour of the Government amendment. I do not think that it is possible to leave to district and borough councils—in effect, that is what the Lords amendment would mean—the decision as to whether a house or flat ought to be exempt from the right-to-buy provisions on the ground that such a property is particularly suitable for a person of pensionable age. If that decision were left to local authorities, I believe that some of them—alas—are so opposed to the right to buy in any event that capricious decisions would be made. [HON. MEMBERS: "Sheffield."]

[Mr. Ian Gow]

My hon. Friends are quite right. That is an excellent example of capricious local authorities responsible for housing. If the Lords amendment were allowed to stand, I believe that there would also be greatly increased delay in making decisions about elderly people who wanted to exercise the right to buy conferred upon them by this House. There would also be increased litigation, which would mean further protraction of the proceedings. We are therefore right to go back in substance to the provisions of paragraph 11 of schedule 5 of the Housing Act 1985.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) said that the Government had not acted in good faith in making a designation about houses that are particularly suitable for occupation by pensioners. He also said that, although he was accusing the Government of bad faith, he was not extending that charge to Ministers. From my knowledge of this matter, I can say that all applications made by local authorities for exemption from the right to buy were dealt with by Ministers — [Interruption.] I am trying to answer the accusation made by the hon. Member for Perry Barr. He cannot accuse the Government of bad faith without accusing Ministers of bad faith. In that sense I plead guilty to the charge levelled by the hon. Gentleman, because it is not possible to accuse the Government of bad faith without also accusing Ministers.

Every application made by a local authority for exemption from the right to buy on the ground that the house or flat was particularly suitable for occupation by persons of pensionable age was carefully scrutinised by Ministers at the Department of the Environment. Every decision made by Ministers was made purely on the basis of the facts as presented, and in every case the decision was made in good faith. The hon. Member for Perry Barr is wrong to accuse the Government of bad faith without extending that charge to Ministers, and I reject the charge that Ministers have ever acted in bad faith in making such a decision. It is right to leave to the judgment of Minsters which houses should be exempt from the right to buy and it is right to specify, as the Government amendment does, with even greater clarity than is contained in schedule 5 of the Housing Act 1985, the criteria that the Minister shall take into account.

We must also get the balance right before denying to people, simply because they are of pensionable age, the right that Parliament has conferred upon others. We are talking about people who are entering the early evening of their lives, about depriving people aged 65 of the right to buy their homes when they might already be regarded as suffering some small disadvantage by being that age, which may some day come to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are talking about imposing on such people the added disadvantage of being denied a right that has been conferred upon others who are younger. We must ensure that we do not penalise people in that way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) referred to tenants of Bournville houses. I think that we and the hon. Member for Perry Barr are at one on this. I hope that the Minister will consider carefully the possibility of extending to such tenants, through the portable discount scheme, the right to buy conferred upon similar tenants.

I hope that the hon. Member for Perry Barr will decide not to divide the House, because I believe that the Government amendment fully meets the situation.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I am very much in the same position as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). The Government amendment is a useful step in the right direction, but I do not think that it goes as far as it might to meet a real problem.

I come to this issue comparatively fresh. What impresses me most about the Lords amendment is the breadth of support behind it. It was supported by the Association of District Councils, which is Conservative controlled, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, which is Labour controlled, the Institute of Housing, the National Housing and Town Planning Council, Age Concern and Shelter. That is a pretty powerful group of organisations facing any Minister who is seeking to find consensus on this issue.

The broad measure of support behind what was done in the other place underlines what has already been articulated by Opposition Members about concern in respect of the practical way in which exemptions were being handled. I make no accusations of bad faith. I simply comment that many matters of very small detail seem to have been introduced when considering an individual case.

The Institute of Housing has provided us with one example — a letter from the Department of the Environment to the housing officer in Birmingham. It asks all sorts of questions about the property, such as the size of the bath, where the grab rail is in relation to the bath, the height of the bath, and whether the bottom of the bath is flat or non-slip. There are all sorts of questions about how the door of the bathroom can or cannot be locked. That introduces a whole range of detailed considerations that were never intended to be the sort of issues on which a judgment should be made in this admittedly difficult area.

That may be one reason why the rate of exemption has been so extraordinarily low—only 16 per cent. in 1985 according to the Haringey survey. I understand that the rate of exemption has increased in recent times to about 36 per cent., but it has been an extremely slow process. I understand the anxiety of Ministers to crawl over all the details and to make sure that justice is being done, but I am not at all sure whether that is the job of Ministers. However, if they do that sort of thing, it will clearly be a slow process.

The Department of the Environment wrote to Birmingham city council on 7 May in reply to a letter from the city council dated 22 February. It had taken a very long time to reply, but at the end of its letter the Department of the Environment had the cheek to say:

"I would be obliged if an early reply could be forwarded."

That shows what happens if this problem has to be considered in such detail.

I welcome what the Minister intends to do. It will end extremely detailed consideration of minor issues. The amendment sets out clear and straightforward criteria upon which judgments can be made as to whether property has been purpose built for the elderly and whether it should therefore be exempted from the right-to-buy arrangements. Unlike the Minister, however, I am less attracted by the proposal to make one of the criteria convenience of location to shops and public transport.

I accept absolutely that in an ideal world shops and public transport are very important to elderly persons. However, we do not live in an ideal world. Local authorities have to build housing for the elderly wherever sites are available. Sometimes, unfortunately, they are not convenient to shops and public transport. I can think of examples in my constituency of purpose-built housing for the elderly which is not convenient to shops or buses. In certain instances, purpose-built housing was convenient to shops and public transport when the local authority erected it, but we all know what is happening to shops.

Mr. Allan Roberts: And we all know what has happened to public transport.

Mr. Cartwright: I shall be dealing with public transport in a moment.

Small shops are being closed. Shopping is being concentrated in the great out-of-town shopping centres and in hypermarkets, which often means that the small corner shop that was conveniently placed for the elderly is no longer there. The hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) prejudged what I intended to say. We all know that bus services are not expanding and that often they are a casualty of the Government's deregulation policy. Therefore, I am less persuaded than is the Minister that it is reasonable to build in this criterion as a test of the suitability of the housing to be exempted from the right-to-buy provisions.

I accept that a difficult judgment has to be made. Given the tendency of some local authorities — my own included — to undermine the right-to-buy provisions, I understand the Minister's reluctance to give too much power to local authorities. However, this new clause provides a reasonable compromise. The initial decision lies with the local authority, but it can be challenged in the courts, as can any other local authority decision under the right-to-buy arrangements. That is the sensible way to tackle the problem. Therefore, I prefer the Bill as it left the other place.

Mr. Allan Roberts: The Minister said that the Government have had problems over this issue since 1980. I have been along for the ride ever since I served on the Standing Committee on the Bill that ultimately became the Housing Act 1980. Having served upon nearly every Standing Committee on housing Bills since then, I have witnessed the Government's difficulties and the way in which subsequent housing Ministers have taken up their portfolios, tried to deal with the difficulty and then have moved on to pastures new.

The Government are in difficulty over their attempt to enshrine the right to buy in legislation because their claim that the right to buy is popular does not apply to the elderly. Public opinion is certainly not on the Government's side. That is why the other place defeated the Government on this issue. Local authorities and charitable organisations, including Help the Aged, oppose the Government's proposal.

The public believe that the elderly should be able to rent adequate, decent housing and that local authorities should be able to protect their stock of housing for the elderly so that when people reach retirement age and need bungalows or sheltered housing such accommodation can be provided for them, thus enabling local authorities to fulful their duties and responsibilities to the elderly. For that reason, attempts have been made to prevent the Government from selling elderly persons' dwellings and sheltered housing.

Surveys of tenancy preferences show that most people wish to own their homes rather than to rent accommodation, whether from a local authority, a housing association or a private landlord, but that that does not apply to those of retirement age. Tenancy research shows that the majority of elderly people prefer to rent their homes. Indeed, the statistics show that both the young and the elderly prefer to rent their homes. Many elderly people prefer not to have to deal with repairs or to look after a garden, especially if the husband or the wife has died. Therefore, they want to sell their homes and to move into rented accommodation. The Labour party's policy would enable that to happen. In our view, the right to rent is as important as the right to buy. Therefore, public opinion is on the side of the other place and the Lords amendment.

There is also concern about the fact that if dwellings rented by the elderly are sold relatives may be involved in the purchase, especially if the elderly person concerned cannot really afford to purchase the property. Their intention may be to acquire the property for their own use when their elderly relatives die or have to be moved, because of infirmity, into other accommodation.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Before the hon. Gentleman leaves the spurious view that most elderly people want to sell their houses and move into council accommodation, apart from some anecdotal point that has been made while standing at a public bar, what evidence is there of that kind of nonsense? Although many elderly people want to sell a large property and buy a smaller one, I do not know of one elderly person who wants to swap freedom for becoming a council tenant. Could the hon. Gentleman tell the House where this evidence is to be found?

Mr. Roberts: I did not say that most elderly owner-occupiers want to sell their property and become council tenants. I said that a study of tenancy preferences shows that about 60 per cent. of people of retirement age would prefer to rent rather than be owner-occupiers. That is also true of young people.

Any survey of tenancy preferences shows that the vast majority of the British people want to buy their own homes, but many elderly people wish to sell their homes in order to rent and they make such a request to local authorities. That is not bar gossip; it is direct constituency experience. People come to my advice bureau with such a request. Furthermore, I was chairman of the city of Manchester's housing committee for five years; many people said that they wanted to sell their homes and become local authority tenants. But nobody has suggested or implied that the vast majority of owner-occupiers want to become local authority tenants. Nevertheless, a significant minority want to do so, because of the difficulties associated with running their homes as owner-occupiers, especially if the husband or wife has died and if there are problems over repairs and other matters.

I was mentioning the potential for abuse in the system. Relatives who join elderly tenants in purchasing a property may eventually acquire it for their own use. Our great fear is not that elderly people will buy their homes and live in them as owner-occupiers. As the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) said, if that is what it is about, why should they be denied the right to buy?

However, old people's properties are specially built with public money for the purpose of providing accommodation for the elderly, and such properties could in future be occupied by a young person, a married couple or a couple with children. Many local authorities have letting policies that ensure that children do not live next to old people, because that can be a recipe for conflict. There will be problems if more and more of the properties that were built for the elderly become occupied by people who are not elderly while many old folk are left looking for rented housing.

The Government talk glibly about the better use of the housing stock and sometimes present that as the answer to our housing problem, almost suggesting that we do not need to build new houses or increase the supply of houses, but the essential requirement for a better use of the housing stock is special accommodation for the elderly, so that those people can transfer from their three-bedroomed or four-bedroomed council houses.

Elderly people queue up at our advice bureaux asking for specially built bungalows or flats because they cannot manage their big houses. If the local authority has properties available, it can release larger council houses for families on the waiting list or for families with children who are trapped in deck access properties or in high-rise or walk-up flats. In that way, two needs can be met at the same time. The denial of that possibility to local authorities makes public opinion and the other place conscious of the need to safeguard the stock of housing built specially for the elderly.

"reasonably convenient location in relation to shops and public transport"

which the Minister alone will interpret is difficult for us to accept, because of the way in which Ministers have interpreted such tests in the past. I was glad that the hon. Member for Eastbourne owned up to some of the decisions that he had taken. Ministers have agreed for insignificant, seemingly irrelevant, reasons that property could be sold. If the proposed test is applied, the Minister might say that because a bus stop is 100 yds away the location is not "reasonably convenient", whereas it would be if the bus stop were only 90 yds away.

Elderly people should be protected. The Minister accused the other place of discrimination on the ground of age, but I believe that the other place was trying to protect the elderly, especially those who need rented accommodation, those who are under-occupying council houses, those who run into difficulties as owner-occupiers and those whose children have left home or whose spouses have died.

It is not Labour party policy, but I think that we should consider offering rent-free accommodation to elderly people who have lived in council houses all their lives. The owner-occupier who receives Government assistance for 20 or 30 years, in the form of tax relief on his mortgage interest, has mortgage-free occupation after a lifetime of subsidy, and I do not see why elderly people in local authority properties should not benefit in a similar way.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I hope that I am pushing at an open door as I raise again the suggestion that I mentioned earlier, which seemed to have the support of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) and my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow).

I thought that it would be right to try to get a pledge today on the transferable discount. There is a problem not only about Bournville housing, but about housing provided by Rowntree, another great charitable family.

Tenants in homes on the excellent estates in Bournville —anyone who knows the area, as the hon. Member for Perry Barr does, knows that it is one of the best housing areas in Birmingham—know that if their houses were built on land owned by the city or the state they are able to buy their homes, but those living in houses built in areas where charitable money met only part of the cost are not allowed to buy their homes—it was the Government's intention that they should be allowed to do so, but some of their Lordships took a different view—but they suffer the great injustice of not being allowed to have the transferable discount that some other people enjoy.

Perhaps only hundreds of people are affected, but surely justice to hundreds is as important as justice to hundreds of thousands. I hope that, after all these years, we shall come to an understanding, which the Opposition seem to support, that those people will be given rights and that we will accept that their situation is not just. If government is not about justice to individuals, what is it about?

I have corresponded with my hon. Friend the Minister, just as I corresponded with my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne when he was the Minister. I believe that both of my hon. Friends favoured my proposal, but that their advisers did not. As we have present today a Minister, an ex-Minister and the hon. Member for Perry Barr, who hopes to be a Minister, can we agree that justice should be done to people who properly feel aggrieved?

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I shall be brief, because my view on the sale of council houses and bungalows is well known. I do not agree with the policy. I do not wish to discriminate against old people, but there is a shortage of such accommodation.

My postbag, like that of every other hon. Member, has its share of letters from people who want aged persons' dwellings. Unfortunately, such property is just not available. I can speak only for my own local authority, but in my area every suitable dwelling specifically built for an aged person has been designated as an aged person's dwelling. There were a number of reasons for that, and not least was the fact that designation was a great help in obtaining concessionary television licences for aged people.

There are insufficient aged persons' dwellings to go round. It used to be argued that if council houses were sold the stock was not diminished. That was true, but the letting was lost. An aged person's dwelling is built specifically to help aged persons. If it were passed on to another aged person, there would be some truth in the argument that the housing stock would not be diminished, but nothing in the Bill provides that a property that is sold must be bought by an aged person. When the tenant who has bought the aged person's dwelling dies, the property will be sold on the open market and anyone can buy it, irrespective of his or her age.

My own local authority reserved dwellings for people under 65 so that they could use the last years of their working lives to furnish that property.

Subsection (5)(a) of the Government's proposed new clause refers to "easy access on foot to the dwelling-house".

I hope that the Minister will enlighten us on the Government's thinking behind that provision. What is meant by that phrase? Within the locality which I represent there are old-age pensioners' dwellings that are not easily accessible on foot because of the area in which they have been built. Some of the dwellings are on hillsides and, therefore, they do not meet this criterion. If an elderly person is to reside in one of these dwellings, he or she must be physically fit.

4.30 pm

Paragraph (d) refers to "suitable heating arrangements". Heating difficulties have probably been overcome by the installation of central heating systems in most old-age pensioners' dwellings, but some still have only one fireplace on which the heating of the entire house depends. This is a problem that can probably be overcome in a few years' time.

Paragraph (e) refers to

"reasonably convenient location in relation to shops and public transport."

I represent a large rural area and many of the dwellings of aged persons are not in a "convenient location" for access to shops and public transport except perhaps the post office. What do the Government mean by a shopping area, for example? Does it mean a number of shops that will supply the needs of aged persons, or part of their needs? How many miles do the Government have in mind that aged persons should have to travel on public transport to reach a shopping area? What should be the frequency of the public transport? There are some places where a bus will be available for such a journey every two or three hours, but next year that service may not be available. If the Government explain their thinking in more detail, many anxieties will be relieved.

Mr. John Patten: It has been said by hon. Members on both sides of the House that the transferable discount is a matter of considerable concern to the individual. Attention has been drawn to this important matter by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) and by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), and it has been reflected in correspondence and meetings. The present transferable discount scheme rejoices in the name HOTCHA, and I can never remember what the initials stand for. Civil servants are always serving up things called HOTCHA. The transferable discount for tenants, which is called HOTCHA, applies only to dwellings excluded from the right to buy which were provided with what is known in the trade as HAG—housing association grant —or other public funding. That was not the position, as I recall—I do not have the papers in front of me—at Bournville, but I am willing to be corrected by my hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak. We do not have a scheme which would enable us to look for transferable discounts in these circumstances.

There is much pressure from all sides for transferable discounts to be examined overall. Someone may not wish to purchase the house in which he is residing and may wish to move to another while carrying the transferable discount on his back, as it were. A number of councils of all political colours, for example, Brent — "Minister praises Brent, shock, horror" — and Bromley, are very sensibly considering paying sums to council tenants if they agree to move from public sector dwellings into private sector dwellings so as to free public sector accommodation. I learnt yesterday on "This Week Next Week" that another council, Woodspring — if this was on "This Week Next Week" it must be true — is about to do exactly the same thing. Within Government we must consider the overall effect of transferable discounts on different tenants in different positions. The present scheme that is operating under law cannot deal with circumstances such as those to which my hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak refers.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): The Minister has said that the HOTCHA scheme — Home Ownership for Tenants of Charitable Housing Associations — applies only to housing which was provided by HAG. He then used the phrase "or other public funding". That qualification is by no means clear. I have had complaints expressed to me by a number of tenants of housing association homes which were provided by public funds — sometimes with the assistance of a local authority subsidy — which, nevertheless, do not qualify for the transferable discount. I have been so advised by tenants of Peabody dwellings and of other housing associations. These matters are not entirely clear because we are dealing with an administrative scheme and not one that is governed by statute. It will be helpful if the Minister explains what areas of housing by public funds or subsidy will be subject to the HOTCHA scheme.

Mr. Patten: In the context of this group of amendments, I cannot help the hon. Gentleman. This is a complex subject and perhaps we should have considered it in Committee. I do not think that it is something that can be handled on the run this evening.

Mr. Rooker: The Bill is available to the Government.

Mr. Patten: Nor could I satisfactorily devise a scheme which could become part of the Bill, which is the suggestion of the hon. Member for Perry Barr made from a sedentary position. I shall write to the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) to set out the present position exactly. I shall write also to my hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak. The Government must give consideration to these matters, and that is something which we shall do.

I turn to the new criteria which are to be adopted and which were referred to by the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay). They have been referred to as well by the hon. Members for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) and for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright). Shops and transport will be only two of the criteria. The Secretary of State will be able to grant an exemption if the availability of the criteria is marginal or not wholly satisfactory if he is satisfied on the evidence as a whole, taking into account all the criteria. Applications will not fail automatically merely because dwellings are a long way from shops. In the application of the new criteria, ministerial judgment will come into the matter.

I respond to the swingeing, broad-ranging and hard-hitting allegations of fiddling and lack of trustworthiness which have been aimed at some mysterious and shadowy figures in government, whatever that is, who have interpreted these rules in the past. They have not been aimed at my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) or myself. It is alleged that the interpretation has been against the interests of public sector tenants.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Why not blame the Minister who has responsibility for sports matters?

Mr. Patten: I must defend my hon. Friend from the vicious attack of my hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak! My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is devoted to the application of fair and free play, whether in legislation or on the football field.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I withdraw.

Mr. Patten: I am delighted that my hon. Friend has chosen to withdraw such a terrible slur on my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary!

The hon. Member for Perry Barr referred to the important evidence of the Institute of Housing. I hope that I enjoy cordial relations with the institute, which is an interesting group. It provides us with important information, and I very often meet its members at conferences. Those who attend the conferences often barrack me, but always in a cheerful way. They have never done so in a nasty or malicious way, perhaps with the exception of one lady who I have always believed to be a member of the institute. She sits below me at meetings and shouts things such as, "Pompous Tory twit". I do not like that sort of thing. I did not come into politics to be described as a pompous Tory twit. The comment that this lady shouted that hurt, and deeply, was "Fat, pompous Tory twit". My tailor in Oxford, Mr. Stamp, labours long and hard to conceal that sort of thing, and he, too, was deeply hurt by the lady's accusation. The thing that really worries me about her is that when she comes to meetings and barracks me she is always knitting. That makes me feel extremely uneasy. There is the sound of the tumbrils coming to get me, and the tricoteuse.

I shall deal with the detail of the Institute of Housing rather than the eccentricities of its members. It stated in evidence that it published in January 1986 that a substantial number of applications were being turned down by Ministers. It said that only 16 per cent. of applications from authorities were successful. For once, the institute was wrong. At the very time that it reported, we were accepting claims from local authorities at a level of about 34 per cent. The House may like to have confirmation from me that the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) was correct — the current success rate for local authorities is standing at a little under 36 per cent.

I take what the hon. Member for Woolwich has said very seriously. Of course, we will operate the rules fairly, as we always seek to do. Certainly I always seek to do that. I hope that the hon. Member for Perry Barr will realise that, under the Government's amendment, the Secretary of State would have no choice but to grant an exemption if satisfied that the listed features were present and that the letting test was fulfilled. I hope that that is a safeguard against the sort of things which the hon. Member for Perry Barr has unfairly suggested have happened in the past.

Mr. Rooker: On the Minister's point about portable discounts, if my memory serves me correctly, the Opposition tabled a new amendment during Committee related to portable discounts, but, in the wisdom of the Chair, it was not deemed selectable within the terms of the Bill. Therefore, we are not late in coming forward with our proposal. It might not go down very well with people outside, but we think that it is important to the interests of the people concerned. That is why it should be on the agenda. I welcome the fact that the Minister has said that he will look into the matter.

I accept the point that, for practical purposes, the tenants described by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) and others are, in effect, private sector tenants. Their rights are somewhat different, but there is an injustice which must be corrected. I also accept what the Minister said, in a round about way, about some local authorities being unreasonable. I do not deny that. Some local authorities, given wide discretion, would be wholly unreasonable. There is no doubt in my mind about that. But if they are unreasonable they can be hauled before the courts. That is important. I do not wish to encourage people to put money into the hands of the legal profession, but there is an avenue for redress. It would be a problem if every ground floor accommodation in the land was alleged to be wholly, exclusively and particularly suitable for the elderly. That would be a gross travesty of the truth. No one could make that case. To do so would be unreasonable. We must consider the other side of the question, but the Minister seems to want it all his own way, as the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) observed.

I do not wish to personalise this, but if I do not do so I am accused of not naming the Minister. I do not want to do that because I do not know who makes the decision. There is more than one Minister in the Department. The charge was levied against the way in which the Government operated the 1980 and the 1984 rules. There is plenty of evidence about that. In the past, elderly persons' dwellings that met all the criteria listed were still allowed by Ministers to be sold, so there must be something wrong. What is more, Ministers would not give reasons for those decisions. That has already happened. The evidence exists and it cannot be denied. We are asking for a cast iron, copper-bottomed guarantee that it will not happen again, that reasons will be given and that Ministers will be accountable. The only way in which we will ever achieve that is if we stick with the Lords amendment. I have grave doubts as to how the other place operates, although I do not seek to rubbish it. It is the other House of Parliament, albeit unelected, and we must listen to what it says.

We must support the amendment because of the way in which the system has operated in the past and the way in which the Minister has slipped in the other changes, especially in relation to transport. The Minister has not been as detailed about those points as we should have liked. Essentially, the charges are a transport policy matter and should not be a housing matter, but with the cuts in transport many rural areas can never fulfil the transport criteria as they have lost bus services and other transport.

4.45 pm

These matters must be looked at in the round, and we should give the Lords another opportunity to examine them. We should agree to the Lords amendment and allow the matter to be re-examined. Over the years, the Lords have spent more time considering this matter than we have. I do not wish to imply that they are wiser than we are, but they have pushed the Government a long way and that is to their credit. I also give credit to the Government, who have responded in a much more detailed way than previously. However, as the Government could not accept more of the spirit of the Lords amendment, the Opposition will vote in favour of the Lords amendment.

Question put, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendment 1 disagreed to.

Amendment made to the Bill in lieu thereof:

New clause

EXCEPTION TO THE RIGHT TO BUY IN CASE OF CERTAIN DWELLING-HOUSES FOR PERSONS OF PENSIONABLE AGE.

Before Clause 1 insert the following new clause—

'.—(1) In Schedule 5 to the Housing Act 1985 (exceptions to the right to buy), for paragraph 11 (certain dwelling-houses for persons of pensionable age) substitute—

"11.—(1) The right to buy does not arise if the Secretary of State has determined on the application of the landlord, that it is not to be capable of being exercised with respect to the dwelling-house.

(2) The Secretary of State shall so determine if, and only if, he is satisfied that the dwelling-house—

(a) is particularly suitable, having regard to its location, size, design, heating system and other features, for occupation by persons of pensionable age, and

(b) was let to the tenant or a predecessor in title of his for occupation by a person of pensionable age or a physically disabled person (whether the tenant or predecessor or another person).

(3) The Secretary of State shall for the purposes of this paragraph disregard the presence of any feature provided by the tenant or a predecessor in title of his.

(4) A dwelling-house which the Secretary of State is satisfied has the following features, shall, subject to sub-paragraph (3), be taken for the purposes of this paragraph to be particlarly suitable for occupation by persons of pensionable age.

(5) Those features are—

(a) easy access on foot to the dwelling-house, including in the case of a flat above or below ground-floor level access by lift to the level of the dwelling-house;

(b) accommodation on one level;

(c) no more than two bedrooms;

(d) suitable heating arrangements for at least the living room and one bedroom;

(e) reasonably convenient location in relation to shops and public transport.

(6) The Secretary of State may by order vary the list of features in sub-paragraph (5) by adding or deleting features or amending the description of any listed feature; and an order may contain such transitional provision as appears to the Secretary of State to be appropriate.

(7) An order shall be made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.

(8) An application for a determination under this paragraph shall be made within the period for service of the landlord's notice under section 124 (notice admitting or denying right to buy).".

(2) The above amendment applies to any decision made by the Secretary of State after the commencement of this section, notwithstanding that the tenant's notice claiming the right to buy was served, or the application for a determination was made, before commencement.'.—[Mr. John Patten.]

DISCOUNT ON RIGHT TO BUY AND SIMILAR SALES

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 2, line 1, after "is" insert

", (subject to any order under subsection (2A))".

Mr. John Patten: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 3 and 4 and the amendments thereto.

Mr. Patten: Amendments Nos. 2 and 3 provide for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to have power to provide by order for higher discounts to be available to tenants exercising the right to buy. This is an important provision. Currently, as the House is all too well aware, a tenant of two years' standing qualifies to buy at a discount rate of 32 per cent., but if the tenant has more than the basic two years he or she qualifies for extra discount, in steps of 1 per cent. for each additional year, up to a maximum of 60 per cent. overall. Clause 1, of course, provides for the discount scale for flats to run from a minimum of 44 per cent. by 2 per cent. steps to 70 per cent. The proposed power will enable the minimum and maximum discount and the size of the steps to be increased by order.

Amendment No. 4 makes parallel provision for Scotland. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland—the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram)—who is responsible for housing in Scotland is on the Front Bench. The reason for making this amendment in the Housing and Planning Bill rather than the Housing (Scotland) Bill is timing. When the amendments were tabled in another place, it was too late to add new matter to the Scottish measure.

Mr. Maxton: Feeble.

Mr. Patten: I never give feeble excuses; my explanations are always telling and to the point. I draw the attention of the House to the important safeguards in the amendments. There is an important safeguard, and the House should reflect on it. The power to make orders is to be exercisable only with the consent of the Treasury, and orders are to require affirmative resolutions of both Houses of Parliament. So any orders which may be made will be subject not only to the due financial scrutiny of our friends in Great George street, but, and much more importantly from the point of view of Opposition Members, to that of Parliament. The reason for seeking that power is that it seems sensible at this stage to have flexibility to adjust the right-to-buy discount scales further in the light of experience.

This is the third time that Parliament has legislated on this subject: the Housing Act 1980 provided for a maximum discount of 10 per cent., the Housing and Building Control Act 1984, which was brought to the House by the then Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), raised it to 60 per cent., and now we are providing for higher discounts for flats. We were pressed in Committee to go even further. It would not be surprising if, at some point, it seemed right to change the discount scales again. If that were so, it would be a pity if the pressures of the legislative programme held it up.

That is why we propose a power to make changes by order, subject, as I have said to parliamentary scrutiny through the affirmative resolution procedure.

We do not propose to make any changes at the moment. It would be misleading if I were to volunteer suggestions as to the sort of changes that might seem right at some future date. At the same time, it would be short-sighted of the Government, and certainly of me, if we did not open our minds to the possibility of future changes in right-to-buy discounts.

The public housing sector is very different from what it was in 1980. It is only to be expected that in two, four or six years the problems and opportunities could look very different again. That is why it seems sensible from the administrative point of view to provide that future changes could be made without the need for main legislation.

I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to look closely at the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). They are interesting amendments and tell us much about Liberal party thoughts on housing. The amendments would enable orders to be made reducing discounts below the levels for which the statute provides. It seems that that is what the Liberal party is up to, and it is surely not right. The right to buy—I am not speaking from a partisan position—is firmly established, and it is reasonable for tenants thinking about buying their homes in the future to make plans on the assumption that the option of exercising the right to buy will not be taken away or made less attractive at some future date. To argue by analogy, people entering into an agreement to buy their homes under mortgage conditions would want to know what mortgage interest tax relief would be available in the future.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch) rose——

Mr. Patten: I should like to know what my hon. Friend has to say about that.

Mr. Squire: I assure my hon. Friend the Minister that a large number of would-be purchasers in Havering in the early 1970s lost out when the council changed control and bitterly resented the action of the then Labour council in that respect.

Mr. Patten: That was with the Labour council in Havering then; now the Liberal party nationally seems to want to sow uncertainty in the minds of council tenants.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): I should not like my hon. Friend to think that it was only the Labour party and the Liberal party. The SDP parliamentary candidate for my constituency has come out against council house sales.

Mr. Patten: Exactly. It seems to be——

Mr. Ross (Isle of Wight) rose——

Mr. Patten: May I please answer the first question? I do not want to get to the stage of intervening in my own answers, as it confuses me, and it certainly confuses the House.

We see that all parties, except the Conservative party, express doubt, both nationally and locally, on the right to buy, and the future of the right to buy.

Mr. Ross: Although the Minister was not in his present position then, roofing grants for houses built before 1919 were a marvellous give-away for about a year. There are now waiting lists of hundreds. That is what Conservative policy has done to housing and roofing grants.

Mr. Patten: I must restrict myself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I would not wish to be ruled out of order by you. I must not go down the seductive road of discussing roofing grants as the hon. Gentleman suggests, because we are discussing the right to buy and the Liberal amendments.

The amendments would create uncertainty if tenants could not assume that discounts would be at least as favourable in the future as they are now. There is already enough uncertainty in tenants' minds because of the clear qualifications of the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party on the right to buy. They both have qualifications and, incidentally, they do not speak with one voice on that issue. Neither the Liberal party nor the SDP supports the right to buy wholeheartedly and without qualifications. They are sowing seeds of doubt in the minds of tenants of council flats and council houses, just as their new, emerging views on mortgage interest tax relief are sowing uncertainty in the minds of home owners and prospective home owners.

Any future Government would be perfectly free to bring forward legislation to dismantle the right-to-buy scheme, or to reduce the discounts available. If that is what the Liberal party has in mind, the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey might like to take the opportunity today to put his party's intention on the record and tell us the contents of its secret manifesto on the right to buy. If the intention of Opposition Members is to reduce discounts available to tenants, surely that ought to be the subject of main legislation. I invite the House to reject the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey to Lords amendments Nos. 3 and 4 on those grounds.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The Minister is trying the trick that he tried yesterday in a different forum, which gave him the opportunity to try to expose differences in Opposition parties on matters of principle that are very important outside the House. Yesterday, it was mortgage interest tax relief. I shall return to that later. I shall deal first with the amendments in the round before, quite properly, answering the questions that the Minister raised. I make it clear that there is not only agreement between the party of the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) — the Social Democratic party—and my own, but that agreement will allay fears and, indeed, encourage people to trust our views on these matters rather than those of the Minister and his colleagues.

The issue here is the old and familiar constitutional question of which matters come into primary legislation and which into secondary legislation. The starting point is whether it is appropriate that the raising and lowering of discount levels, which would affect tens of thousands if not hundreds of thousands of people, should go through the House by way of an order with a short debate probably lasting a maximum of one and a half hours and probably late in the evening. On the constitutional principle, it seems appropriate that matters of significant importance to people contemplating buying or local authorities contemplating having to sell their housing should be the subject of primary rather than secondary legislation. The Lords amendments apply to England and Wales and also to Scotland, and provide that several matters will be subject to the secondary legislation procedure: first, whether the discount should be raised; secondly, the percentage by which the increase over the time scale provided in the legislation is arranged; thirdly, whether there can be different provisions in different cases. There is also a grey area that the Minister wishes to include in the subsidiary legislation, which is described as "incidental, supplementary or transitional provisions".

[Mr. Simon Hughes]

That may be a something or a nothing.

The most recent experience that we have had of such secondary legislation, dealing with many authorities in Britain or classes of them, on individual matters connected with financing and where extreme problems have been caused for those authorities and for the House, was in the context of the Rates Act. Under that Act, rate capping was permitted by the Government. The Government now bring forward an order, in which they list the authorities that they intend to rate-cap. In one debate all the finances of all the authorities—some of the largest city, borough or district authorities in Britain — come under the scrutiny of the House. The House will recall that there have been regular complaints that this mechanism for addressing the severe and important questions of the financing of local government does not provide a suitable opportunity or adequate time for sufficiently detailed debate. The underlying question is whether it is appropriate to debate such matters on the Floor of the House rather than in Committee or, more importantly, locally in the areas of those authorities. Experience of the rate-capping legislation has shown the procedures to be profoundly unsatisfactory.

I come to whether my amendment on the English provision and the similar amendment to Lords amendment No. 4 on the Scottish provision provide an acceptable alternative to the Lords amendment. The first question is whether the procedure should be carried out in the House by secondary or primary legislation. My view is that it should be primary legislation because of the number of people affected and the value of the matters under consideration. If that is not to be so, however, my amendment seeks to explore whether the Government accept that it is appropriate that they should be able to vary the provisions in either direction if they think that that is suitable. It is up to the Government of the day to decide the parameters within which the right to buy operates. That has been the decision that the Government determined when they legislated in 1980 creating an entitlement to buy for council tenants. That has come to be accepted increasingly across the country, and it seems unfair and lacking in even-handedness if the Government can always and only increase discounts but never reduce them.

The Minister asked for our view and I shall give it to him. It is clear that there has been some unhappiness over the years. As the Minister knows, we have recently spent some time making sure that we have a clear and correct position to put to the country. The alliance is now agreed that the right to buy will remain and that Parliament should set the limits within which it operates, but we should like increased local discretion over exemptions and discounts.

The reason for that, as the Minister should know well, is different areas, which may be Liberal, Social Democratic party, alliance, Labour or Tory controlled, have different circumstances. The Minister, with the Labour housing spokesman, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), and myself yesterday watched a film on the now twice quoted "This Week Next Week" programme, from Woodspring district council in Somerset—[HON. MEMBERS: "Avon."] I beg the pardon of the House. It is in Avon. The Conservative chairman of Woodspring council housing committee expressed to the watching world dissatisfaction with the way in which the right-to-buy system was operating because it was applying unfairly to the council in determining its housing priorities.

I hope that the Minister, as a Minister in the Department of the Environment, which is responsible for local government, will accept from his national knowledge and his local experience in Oxford that one cannot say that the same circumstances apply all over the country. There have been debates in the House on portable discounts for estates such as the Bournville estate in Birmingham, the Peabody estates in London or the Dulwich College estate in Southwark. There are different local circumstances in each case. I ask the Minister to agree that it is appropriate, whether in Labour-controlled Southwark, Conservative-controlled Woodspring or alliance-controlled Sutton, that within limits fixed by the House local authorities should be able to make certain decisions, because those decisions should depend on the pressures on the various elements in the housing stock — old people's housing, sheltered housing, and so on—at any given time.

The Minister referred to uncertainty about another matter, but there is no uncertainty there. As he knows, yesterday I made it clear to him publicly that the alliance is committed to sustaining a regime under which people buying their homes on a mortgage will get tax relief which they can set against the cost of the mortgage. It is mischievous of the hon. Gentleman to pretend that he does not know that and did not hear that yesterday. He knows that the alliance, like the Conservative party and all other parties, is committed to the retention of that form of interest relief.

Mr. John Patten: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: No, I did not intervene in the Minister's speech. He heard the argument yesterday and it is important that he should not misrepresent it when the subject is raised in a debate in the House the very next day.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: The debate is about whether the Government think that in the light of the Rates Act——

Mr. Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: —and other experiences there should or should not be a summary procedure for determining important matters connected with housing supply. From the Liberal Bench, I ask the Minister to consider whether it would be better not to have a summary procedure and to keep changes to primary legislation. That is what we should like most. But if the Minister is allowing a summary procedure, he should put within it a range of options available to himself and his successors.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Sadly, everything that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) has said will confirm the fear of council tenants around the country that, by foolishly voting for the Liberal or Social Democratic party, they will lessen their chances of purchasing their council house. It is naive in the extreme to suggest that one can have local variations so that in one council area there is a discount of 60 per cent. while someone's twin brother living in another area has a different discount right. That is deeply unfair. I know that the Liberals and the Social Democratic party do not believe very much in fairness and equity, but I thought that the hon. Gentleman would have noticed that one.

I return to more important matters because it is most unlikely that most local authorities will have the opportunity to choose discount rates. I refer to a matter that concerns many of my constituents greatly. Unfortunately, in many respects, the price of housing in the Thames valley and my constituency has risen dramatically in recent years. Many of my council house tenants who are eligible for 40, 50 or 60 per cent. discounts on the purchase of their council house find that they do not receive their maximum discount because when the Housing Act 1980 was passed a maximum of £25,000 was put into the Act as the discount that was allowable notwithstanding the percentage. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to review that in any order that he introduces because many people are being penalised unfairly. It might be thought that, if the house was worth so much money that one could get a discount above £25,000, one could probably afford the house anyway——

Mr. Rooker indicated assent.

Mr. MacKay: I see the hon. Gentleman nodding. The majority of people eligible for those large discounts are fairly senior members of the community who are in their 50s or early 60s and their chances of getting a substantial mortgage, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) realises, are slim. Therefore, it has made the difference, in a number of cases in my constituency, between buying or not buying a council house. Without getting the full 60 per cent. discount, because of the £25,000 limit, they have had to withdraw from purchasing because they cannot obtain mortgage facilities on the number of years they have left before reaching retirement age.

It is to be hoped that very shortly we shall obtain the Royal Assent to this Bill. It is desperately important for the Department of the Environment to make it clear to all local authorities how quickly they can proceed to sell at the new discount rates and how quickly buyers can sell without having to repay the discount. Some of my constituents have exchanged contracts and are waiting to complete the sale of their council houses. They are waiting to confirm that the five years is reduced to three. There are long chains involved. At the moment Bracknell district council and the royal borough of Windsor and Maidenhead will not be able to say when those people can complete, even after Royal Assent. Therefore, I hope that clear guidelines are sent out to all local authorities quickly.

Mr. John Fraser: I listened to the Minister moving this amendment. He displayed all the qualities of the Tory party in relation to housing. He did not speak with the words of the builder, the developer, or the provider of housing but only with the philosophy of the Tory estate agent out to sell public assets and take his own political commission. That sums up Tory policy towards homes. They want to reduce the numbers being built and they are making no effort to meet the massive housing need in this country. The emphasis is on the sale rather than the provision of housing.

Our principal objection to this amendment is that it deprives the House of the ability to talk about council housing or local authority housing association housing in the round. It denies the House the ability to look at the problems and opportunities of the right to buy in a much more rounded context. The amendment enables the Government not to vary the level of discount, but to increase it and assist in the sale of public assets — in some circumstances that is desirable—without considering all the other aspects of the matter. We oppose the Lords amendment because we believe that this is a matter that should be dealt with by primary legislation, so that there is an opportunity to discuss other issues.

This is not a debate about the right to buy. The Labour party has made it clear that we do not intend to repeal the principle of the right to buy, although we shall make some changes. One of the principal changes will be to ensure that much of the £6,000 million that has been derived from the sale of council houses and flats will be used to build replacement houses and flats.

One of the attractive features of the right to buy when the Tory party first announced it was that it was said that it would release homes that, people wanted to own for themselves—there is nothing capitalist or socialist about owning one's own home—and that it would also release money to provide other homes. To that degree, the proposition is one which can be fully supported. However, as soon as the sale of council houses had taken off, the Treasury intervened—the Treasury is mentioned in the amendment—to ensure that that money was not to be used for the replacement of stock. A Labour Government would ensure that, although the right to buy would continue, all money derived from the sale of homes would be used to provide more homes, which are so badly needed. We want an opportunity to put that proposition in primary legislation before the House. The Labour party will ensure that when homes are sold in areas where there is housing need a local authority—without any damage or injury to people who have bought their own home—will have a pre-purchase option to take the home back into its stock of homes to let. That does no harm to the purchaser. Indeed, it may help purchasers because they will not have to pay an estate agent's commission and will save some money.

There are some parts of the country where the shortage of homes to rent is so enormously acute — I have mentioned central London—that it would be irresponsible to continue with the sale of homes. In those circumstances we should compensate the tenants by giving them a transferable discount to move elsewhere. There is no doubt that there are some parts of the metropolis where the shortage of land and homes to rent is so acute and severe that it is irresponsible for the Government to be concentrating a large part of their housing association expenditure through the Housing Corporation on stress area investment and homes to rent in central London. I agree with the proposition that they should do that, but it is irresponsible to be pushing money into that sort of exercise and at the same time stripping out the same kind of homes which are provided by local authorities. Therefore, although we shall keep the right to buy, we shall certainly want to make some changes to which no sensible person would object.

Our objection to this amendment is that it enables the Government to increase the discount without any other debate. The House would be restricted to about 90 minutes of debate, usually after 10 o'clock, on what could be a transfer of public assets involving many millions of pounds, without any guarantee that the money derived from that sale will be put back into housing. We believe that the housing crisis in this country demands more than a single-issue debate which takes place in 90 minutes. We are suspicious of the Government taking a power that may be used to give an extremely expensive bribe to the electorate shortly before an election. We demand to be able to debate not just the sale of council housing but the distribution and social effects. We want to debate the use of the proceeds and we challenge the ease with which the Government might make a crude and irresponsible bribe by giving away what amounts to another person's assets in order to achieve some electoral advantage. For those reasons we shall vote against the amendment introduced in the other place.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): This debate will be remembered because of the speech of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) who purported to speak on behalf of what is known as the alliance. While he was addressing the House, the official spokesman on housing for the Social Democratic party was seated only a few feet from him. You will have heard, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey move his amendment which would give my hon. Friend the Minister the power to vary by order the rates of discount downwards. The hon. Gentleman went on to say that it was the policy of the Liberal party and the alliance that there should be different rates of discount and variations in the right to buy according to which local authority a tenant happens to live in. In effect, he was saying that if the Liberals have their way there would be diminished opportunities for discount and the right to buy affecting some people according to the accident of the borough or district in which they happen to live.

I was watching the face of the housing spokesman for the Social Democratic party very closely as he listened to the exposition of his hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey. When the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) seeks to give his own gloss or interpretaton or, if he is a man of courage, his own repudiation of the exposition of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, I hope that he will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

A revelation has been made, not only to the House of Commons, but to those who listen carefully to what goes on here about the right to buy. The revelation is from the Liberal party and it has never before been spelt out so clearly. We have heard that the Liberal party is in the business of restricting not only the right to buy — because that would depend, in the Liberal spokesman's view, upon where one lives—but the right to discount.

5.30 pm

That astonishing speech, which I cannot believe has been approved either by the doctor or by the leader of the Liberal party, will be repudiated by both. My advice to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey is that when he is about to make a new policy statement on behalf of his party he would be wise to have it cleared by both those gentlemen.

Mr. John Patten: That also applies to helicopters.

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend must not lead me astray about helicopters. That was when the Liberal leader was summoned by the leader of the party of which the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) is a distinguished adornment from my constituency so that a meeting could be held at the House of Commons.

I agree strongly that the House should agree with the Lords in the amendment. The Housing Act 1980 set a three-year qualification period before a tenant could exercise the right to buy. The maximum discount was 33 per cent. after three years' tenancy and up to 50 per cent. after 20 years' tenancy. The Housing and Building Control Act 1984 diminished the qualification period from three years to two years and increased the maximum discount to 60 per cent. We are now talking about the third change that we have made in the discount level. We are moving from 44 per cent. to 70 per cent. in respect of discounts for flats.

I seek clarification from the Minister. Am I right in thinking that my hon. Friend is not able by order, even with approval by both Houses of Parliament, to vary the two-year qualification period? I believe that it would be a sensible change if we built on the reduction in the 1984 Act from three years to two years by making a further reduction in the qualifying period from two years to one year. I am a moderate man and I make only a modest proposal. On my reading of the Lords amendment, the Minister will not be able to do that by order but will have to propose primary legislation.

If it is reasonable, as I believe it to be, to allow a tenant of 30 years a 60 per cent. discount, why do we not carry the logic further and allow a tenant extra discount according to the total number of years as tenant? Not many people will have been local authority tenants for 30 years or more, but those who have, by definition, will be elderly and will find it difficult to obtain a mortgage. Most will be retired. It would be right to continue the principle that we have fashioned by increasing the discount along with each year of tenancy over the 60 per cent. discount for a house and the 70 per cent. discount on a flat.

Discount depends upon the value of the house or flat. I remind my hon. Friend of an anomaly illustrated by a case on which we had an Adjournment debate on 19 June. Sometimes before a district council places a value on a house or flat it invites the district valuer to give his advice on the open market value of the property. If a tenant disputes that value he has the right of appeal to the district valuer—to the very person who originally advised the council about the open market value of that property. That is manifestly unfair. The district valuer is invited to determine an appeal against a value which he fixed when asked informally by the council for advice.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Surely a tenant can appeal to the land tribunal.

Mr. Gow: I wish that my hon. Friend were right.

Mr. John Fraser: The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) is right because when he was Minister he refused to accept my amendment to that effect.

Mr. Gow: I think that the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) is agreeing with me when I say that there is no appeal beyond the district valuer. I did not agree with his amendment, but I regret that the district valuer is both the court of first instance and the court of appeal. I do not necessarily think that the land tribunal is the right body to hear such appeals. However, the valuation issue is so important that there should be a change in the system. I know that we cannot make such a change at this stage, but I urge the Minister to consider the arguments.

When a district council places a value on a property following the application by a tenant to exercise the right to buy it should not at that stage seek advice from the district valuer. The local authority should seek advice from the private sector, from a local estate agent. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) will be pleased at that suggestion. If a tenant disputes the value decided by the district council, it is wrong that he should have to appeal to the person who originally fixed the value.

The House will have noted with warm approval that the one millionth council house was sold in August this year——

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): It was in Scotland.

Mr. Gow: I am glad that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary reminds us of that.

One of the reasons why so few flats have been sold compared with houses is that the values placed on flats, whether by district councils, frequently following the advice of the district valuer, or by district valuers on appeal, are too high. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister does not agree with me but that is so. Too often there is no comparison by which either the council or the district valuer can decide a value. The only way in which we can determine the open market value of an empty flat, whether on the 10th or the 20th floor, is to put it up for sale. That will tell us its value with unerring accuracy and indisputable logic.

I hope that in the next Bill which my hon. Friend the Minister introduces he will reconsider this vital issue of the value of flats. I congratulate the other place on having introduced this excellent amendment and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will very shortly submit to both Houses of Parliament proposals to increase the discount on the sales of houses and flats, so that extra discount will continue to be given according to the number of years that someone has been a local authority tenant.

Finally, I commend to all hon. Members a deep study of the astonishing declaration of policy made by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: One of the benefits of attending this sort of debate is that one learns something new. I am indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) for clearing up my misapprehension about appeals against a district valuer's valuation. I had been labouring under that misapprehension for some considerable time. But I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne will forgive me for suggesting that he is obviously labouring under a misapprehension too in thinking that I have any great empathy with estate agents, since I have no connection with that profession and not generally much sympathy for it either.

I wish to underscore a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) when he referred to the maximum level of discount allowable. In the outer south-east, and many parts of London, the average valuation of council houses is very high. The valuation of a council house in my constituency would have to be put at £40,000 or £41,000 or less for someone to obtain the maximum discount on it. One cannot buy any council house in my constituency for less than that price, and that means that someone who has clocked up his full 30 years is very much on the borderline at the bottom end of the market, and as he moves up the market he is increasingly penalised. Anyone living in a semi-detached house — many were built by the former Commission for the New Towns and by the Hemel Hempstead development corporation—would automatically be penalised. Three or four-bedroomed detached council houses were built for middle and senior management. Some people moved from London and have been in them since they were first built. They have not taken advantage of the opportunity to buy, and have no prospect of doing so at the moment unless they have very significant savings.

That difficulty is compounded by the fact that house prices in those areas move up more sharply than in other parts of the country. The problem gets worse and worse. Thus, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will give some sympathetic consideration to the points that have been raised.

I welcome the positive steps that my hon. Friend has taken in response to the pressure put on him by myself and other Back Benchers in Committee. The amendment represents progress, although I wish that the Minister had gone further. Someone contemplating buying a flat or house in the areas represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East and myself would find that prices were increasing too fast for any savings that he could possibly make. Therefore, we should review the maximum discount regularly simply to keep the price of those houses and flats within the reach of those who live in them.

There is an opportunity for people to freeze the price originally for two years, and now for three years as, I am glad to say, my hon. Friend the Minister accepted my amendment. However it would have been much more satisfactory if that had been extended ad infinitum, as it would have brought all of the houses and flats eventually within the reach of those who live in them.

The Government have made a significant move. There is no doubt that it has certainly been more difficult to sell flats than houses. That to a large extent is because of the price. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne that the absence of market indicators about what that price should be has been no help in trying to establish what people can afford. I hope that one consequence of the legislation will be to extend the same sort of opportunity to tenants of flats.

The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) was characteristically gentle, but at the same time hostile towards many of the people in his constituency and other parts of London who want to buy their council houses and flats. He suggested that, according to Labour party policy, portable discounts might be available to people instead of them buying the houses or flats in which they live. But that defeats the whole point of the exercise, because many of my constituents and, no doubt, those of the hon. Member for Norwood have bought their houses and flats because they are their cherished homes. They are not simply bricks and mortar, but the places in which they have lived and brought up their families, and to which they have made many improvements. They may have brought their gardens up to the standards that they want. They may like the neighbourhood because it is close to the facilities that they use.

If the portable discount scheme became a substitute for the right to buy, those people would have to uproot and shift out, thus bringing even more pressure to bear on land and housing in outer London and the south-east. That area already has enough problems.

It was with great reluctance that I agreed to the proposal put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne when he was Minister that portable discounts should apply to tenants of charitable housing association houses. Those people must enjoy the same privileges as any other tenant where public money is involved. They, too, should have the right to buy the houses or flats in which they live. The attitude of the other place on this matter is absolutely reprehensible. When I spoke to Lord Selkirk, one of the principal peers involved in defeating the Government on that occasion, and invited him to discuss the matter with charitable housing association tenants in my constituency, he refused point blank to do so. He said that he was not interested in their point of view. That is all too typical of the attitude of those in another place who enjoy the privilege of owning one, two, three or more houses but who have at every opportunity sought to restrict home ownership.

I have great pleasure in supporting the Government's amendment, although I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will respond to my criticisms about its omissions.

Mr. Maxton: It is with some trepidation that a Scottish Member of Parliament intervenes in what is essentially an English debate and an English Bill. I must point out to the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) that the Earl of Selkirk normally takes his seat in the House of Lords on the Conservative side——

Mr. Robert B. Jones: So what?

Mr. Maxton: Lord Selkirk is the uncle of the Conservative Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) and the entire Housing (Scotland) Bill is about him. That Bill is largely about giving housing association tenants the right to buy. The Minister has shown the greatest concern for one housing association above all others — the Link housing association in Barnton in the constituency of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West. One of the most of the interesting things about the whole debate has been how the uncle of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West has spent most of the time trying to ensure that that is not affected.

I rise to speak because amendment No. 4 is related entirely to Scotland. Even if the Government had had a complete change of heart and had decided to abolish discounts altogether at this late stage, I would still have objected, either from the Back Benches or from the Opposition Dispatch Box, to the fact that we have a major Scottish clause in a Bill relating to England and Wales. I accept that part II on planning covers Scotland, but part I is related to housing in England and Wales and does not cover Scotland.

The Minister's excuse for that is that it was too late to introduce a similar clause in the Housing (Scotland) Bill, the final stages of which will be dealt with by the House tomorrow. I do not understand that. The Housing (Scotland) Bill started its progress through the House of Commons in November, nearly 12 months ago. The Minister now tells us that it is too late to include an amendment that the Minister himself described as a sensible proposal. I said at the time that the Minister's reason was feeble and he tried to deny that, but he has made no effort to explain why this amendment is sensible now when it appeared to make no impact on the Under-Secretary of State, Scottish Office in November. It did not even impinge upon him. Why, if it is sensible today, was it not sensible then? If it was not sensible in November, why was not it sensible when the Government came to change the discounts yet again on flats? That amendment was included in the Housing (Scotland) Bill in another place and we debated it here. It is an insult to Scottish Members of Parliament and the way in which Scottish legislation is considered in the House for a clause of this nature to be suddenly put into a Bill at this late stage.

It is time that the House took a decision about what is and what is not Scottish legislation. There should be a clear demarcation between Scottish and English legislation. A measure relating to housing in Scotland should go into Scottish legislation. That is the custom for most of our legislation and yet suddenly the Government consistently abuse that by including clauses relating to Scotland in other Bills.

The Minister tried to suggest that every party's views on the right to buy differed from those of the Government and that somehow or other this was a popular measure. That has always been the argument. The Government almost make it clear that discounts and the right to buy are a matter of buying votes among council house tenants. It is worth pointing out that since 1979, when the Government introduced the right to buy and then the first discounts, charging them once and now again, their popularity in Scotland has gone down and down. The latest opinion poll showed them enjoying the marvellous support of 14 per cent. of the Scottish people. Five Conservative Members of Parliament out of 21 will be lucky if they hold their seats at the next general election. That is what the Scottish people think about the Government and this type of legislation. [Interruption.] I know that the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) is bitterly disappointed that the Prime Minister overlooked him yet again in the reshuffle. I read in the press that he was expecting high office but did not get it.

The Minister will have a difficult job explaining to the House why this Scottish clause is in the Bill and he will have an even more difficult job explaining why such legislation is not in a Scottish Bill. I and my hon. Friends will vote against the amendment tonight.

Mr. Ancram: I was amazed to hear the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) question the popularity of the right to buy in Scotland. He said that its unpopularity was evinced by the fact that every time we put up discounts our popularity declined. The Labour party conference last March considered a report drawn up by an academic who used to be a Labour councillor. He discovered that 67 per cent. of Labour supporters wanted the right to buy. That is why at that conference the Labour party in Scotland decided to stop opposing the sale of council houses—[Interruption.] It did not follow the English and it did not pursue the path of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr, (Mr. Rooker).

When I pressed the hon. Member for Cathcart, during the passage of the Bill, to tell us the policy of the Labour party in Scotland he consistently refused to do so. It is refreshing to hear from the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) that at least the Labour party is clear on its policy down here, even though he may disagree with it. I hope that he will advise his hon. Friend the Member for Cathcart before we get too much nearer a general election that it would at least be honest to tell the Scottish people what Labour party policy is.

Mr. Maxton: The Minister must be unable to read. The Labour party passed its policy document at the March conference. If his advisers are incapable of obtaining a copy, I will send him one. There are differences between housing in Scotland and England. That is why we have separate housing legislation. I wish that the Minister would accept that.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman keeps taking refuge in that document. On a previous occasion he offered to send me a copy. I have been waiting five months, but it has not yet arrived. I suspect that I know why. When the millionth council house was sold in Moray in September 1986 I was listening to the car radio as I travelled to London and I heard the hon. Gentleman making it clear that he opposed the right to buy. Obviously, he does not want to send me that document if it undermines his own arguments.

The hon. Gentleman asks "Why now?" The reasons for the amendment were set out most persuasively by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction and I shall not try to add to those. The proposal is sensible. We came to that view at the same time —[Interruption.] We come to many sensible conclusions together on the Conservative Benches even if Labour Members are unable to do so. At the end of July the Housing (Scotland) Bill had already left the House of Lords and returned to this House, so it was not possible to insert the provision. If the hon. Member for Cathcart checks our proceedings, he will discover that. It was therefore decided that the provisions should be inserted in this Bill. If we do not have similar provisions for Scotland and England, different discounts might apply in the future merely because of geographical differences, as my hon. Friends mentioned. That would cause great resentment among the 67 per cent. of Labour supporters in Scotland who want the right to buy.

The logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument is that we should have differences between Scotland and England. It is surprising how selective he is. When we have differences in the rating of sports clubs because the law in England is different from the law in Scotland, for example, the hon. Gentleman is among the first to ask me to legislate to bring the law in Scotland into line. On that, I rest my case.

Mr. John Patten: We all greatly enjoyed that skirmish. I hope that it is clear from the debate that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland and I are at one on this matter. We have had many consultations and have reached exactly the same conclusions at different times.

I listened with great care to the brief speech of the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) in which he restated well-known Labour party policy on the right to buy. There are considerable differences between us and I shall not attempt to elaborate on them. There was nothing new in his position any more than there would be in mine if I repeated it this evening. We simply disagree on the constitutional propriety of changing discounts by order. To make even minor changes to discounts can be a long drawn out business involving primary legislation. It is for the convenience of good government and for the administration of the House to change discounts by order. I am sorry that we disagree about that because we agreed on many matters in Committee.

The speech of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) was much more interesting in terms of new information. Those of us who were lucky enough to be present listened to it with great attention. I listened with some interest to what he said about mortgages, but I am still entirely unclear about the attitude of the alliance towards mortgage interest tax relief. The hon. Gentleman seemed to support the status quo, but he painted a completely different picture from that which he gave yesterday on the excellent television programme "This Week Next Week", on which we were privileged to appear together with the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). We shall have to continue looking at the alliance position on mortgage interest tax relief.

We are on clearer ground about the right to buy because the hon. Gentleman was specific about that. He spoke on behalf of the alliance—that is, the Liberal and Social Democratic parties—although his hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), the SDP Front Bench spokesman, was also present. First, he said that this was a constitutional issue and that if one wanted to put discounts up or down one should have the opportunity to do so. That must mean that the alliance intends at least to consider reducing the discounts available to council tenants, should it ever have the opportunity. If not, why argue for such a power in the first place? That revelation is now on the record.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) almost shot my fox—a disgusting habit—on the hon. Gentleman's second point. I repeat my hon. Friend's comments. As the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey was speaking as the alliance spokesman on housing, it is now clear that it is alliance policy to bring about substantial changes in the right to buy for council tenants of flats and houses if it ever gets the opportunity. Throughout the country, prospective council house purchasers will want to know whether they will be affected. They will want to know whether a person in place A will receive a bigger discount than a person in place B, and whether a person in place C will be given the chance to buy while a person in place D will not because the local council has so decided. The alliance cannot have it both ways. We now have it on the record as official alliance policy that substantial changes to the right-to-buy legislation will be made. We want to know who the losers will be, where they are, how many people will be threatened and how, and we shall find that out in the next 18 months. For once, we have had a straight answer from an alliance spokesman and it is on the record that the alliance is not fully in favour of the right to buy.

[Mr. John Patten]

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Patten: No, Sir. The hon. Gentleman did not permit me to intervene in his speech.

I now turn to friendlier territory—and what could be friendlier than the speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) and for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones)? Both pressed me about the upper limit of £25,000. It is, indeed, a serious issue and applies to the right-to-buy discount by virtue of an order under section 131 of the Housing Act 1985. Many hon. Members have urged me to raise that limit and I am considering the matter now. I hope to make my views known shortly — to use that deathless ministerial parlance. On the second point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East — the question of making information available to local authorities such as his excellent authorities in Bracknell and the royal borough of Windsor and Maidenhead, which have done so much to promote the right to buy—I will ensure that they have full information about the new provisions of what I hope will soon become the Housing and Planning Act 1986 well in advance of the due date of the Act becoming law.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne raised a couple of important points about the qualifying period. Alas, the powers which the House is invited to approve this evening do not extend to that and further primary legislation will be needed. Obviously, I must turn my attention to that in the future as well as to my hon. Friend's point about the valuation placed on flats, which he also raised in his interesting speech on Second Reading to which I had the chance to respond.

Finally, my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West spoke of the need to keep under continuous review the level of discount, the dates on which houses were purchased and their relation to the discount obtaining at that time. It has been a most interesting debate and I have been able to assure many of my hon. Friends about detailed points on the amendment, but above all this debate will be remembered by all of us as the one when the alliance finally revealed its policy on the right to buy.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 2

SERVICE CHARGES PAYABLE AFTER EXERCISE OF RIGHT TO BUY

Lords amendment: No. 5, in page 3, line 6, leave out "service charges" and insert—

"—(a) service charges, or

(b) improvement contributions."

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): I beg to move that this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 6 to 16, 19 to 23, 54, 169A, 169B, 170 to 177, 187 and 204 to 207.

Mr. John Fraser: There is a problem with forecasting service charges and the landlord, be it a local authority or a housing association, finding that, because of an absolutely genuine change of circumstances, it cannot get back the money that it has spent on service charges because the amount spent exceeds the estimate given when the right to buy was exercised.

In Committee, the Minister gave an undertaking that he would consider the plight of smaller local authorities and housing associations which may have no reserves with which to deal with such an unanticipated and unavoidable strain on its funds. What will the Minister do as a result of the undertakings that he gave in Committee?

Mr. Tracey: As the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) will know, the provisions contained in new paragraphs 16C of schedule 6 to the Housing Act 1985 were criticised in Committee on the ground that a minority of leaseholders in a block of flats might either block the carrying out of improvements which were highly desirable, or have the benefit of the improvements without having to pay anything for them.

The amendments delete the provisions which were criticised and put in their place provisions modelled on the limitations which clause 2 imposes on service charges for repairs in the early years of the lease. The effect of the new provisions is that a tenant who claims to exercise the right to buy a flat will have to be given an estimate of any contributions to be required under the lease in respect of improvement costs incurred during, broadly speaking, the first five years of the lease. Those estimates will then set a limit to the contributions which can be recovered, except that there will be an inflation allowance. There will thus be a common regime for improvement contributions and for contributions to repair costs. In both cases, the landlord will be free to seek whatever contributions may properly be required of the leaseholder under the lease, but during the first five years the leaseholder will not have to make any payments of which notice was not given before the sale.

I fully understand what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I hope that the House agrees that we are trying to strike a fair balance between the interests of the leaseholder and those of the landlord and other occupants of the block. I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's anxiety about the type of housing association which cannot cover all of its costs when carrying out repairs because of problems with service charges. I am still sounding out what we can do to help in these rather special circumstances and what provisions we can make to that end.

We have to establish a common regime and a common balance between the interests of the leaseholder and the interests of the landlord. We are trying to do that. That is why we ask the House to agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. John Fraser: With the leave of the House, may I say that that was a lot of rubbish and waffle. It had nothing whatever to do with fairness and balance. If it had, the same regime would apply to the private landlord. It is absolutely untrue to speak of fairness and balance.

A private landlord would be able under schedule 19 of the Housing Act 1980 to recover moneys that were fairly expended on maintaining and servicing property. What happens if a landlord gives a reasonable estimate of what expenditure is to be during the next five years and something utterly unexpected happens? There may, for example, be an extremely severe winter which damages the fabric of the building. The landlord quite reasonably has to recover the money involved from the tenant. Especially for small housing associations, there may be no other source of funds. What will happen in those circumstances?

Although large local authorities may have the funds necessary to met such unexpected expenditure, it is quite unfair for the housing revenue account and other tenants to have to bear the expense. As I said before, calling that fair and reasonable is rubbish and waffle.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 6 to 16 agreed to.

New Clause

CONSULTATION BEFORE DISPOSAL TO PRIVATE SECTOR LANDLORD

Lords amendment: No. 17, before clause 4, insert the following new clause—

" .—(1) In Part IV of the Housing Act 1985 (secure tenancies and rights of secure tenants), after section 106 insert—

106A.—(1) The provisions of Schedule 3A have effect with respect to the duties of—

(a) a local authority proposing to dispose of dwelling-houses subject to secure tenancies, and

(b) the Secretary of State in considering whether to give his consent to such a disposal, to have regard to the views of tenants liable as a result of the disposal to cease to be secure tenants.

(2) In relation to a disposal to which that Schedule applies, the provisions of that Schedule apply in place of the provisions of section 105 (consultation on matters of housing management).".

(2) After Schedule 3 to the Housing Act 1985 insert as Schedule 3A the Schedule set out in Schedule (Consultation before disposal to private sector landlord) to this Act (consultation before disposal to private sector landlord).

(3) The amendments made by this section apply to disposals after the commencement of this section."

Mr. John Patten: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we can take Lords amendments Nos. 26 and 27 and the amendment thereto, No. 169 and the amendment thereto and No. 201A

Mr. Patten: It will be useful to have a debate on this important issue. We have here a daunting group of amendments which honour an undertaking that I gave in Committee and which give council tenants a statutory right to be consulted about proposals which would transfer ownership or management of their homes—not their dwelling units—to another body.

I shall concentrate on amendments Nos. 17, 169 and 27 as they contain the main changes on the subject. Amendments Nos. 17 and 169 insert the new section 106A and the new schedule 3A into the Housing Act 1985. Those are important pieces of detail.

One of my local newspapers had my handwriting analysed recently by a professional graphologist. It was an independent assessment. The graphologist was not told who or what I was, and said that the writer had no grasp of detail, preferred the broad brush approach and was probably an actor or a Member of Parliament. I now feel that I must read out the detailed matters with some determination so that the excellent Courier newspaper series realises that there was a small mistake in the graphologist's otherwise excellent analysis of my handwriting. It was my best handwriting as well—that is what I found so irritating.

The effect of these amendments is to give council tenants a statutory right to be consulted about proposals to sell their homes to a private landlord. They provide that the Secretary of State shall not give his consent to a disposal if he is satisfied that a majority of the tenants are opposed to it.

Amendment No. 27, which inserts a new section 27A into the 1985 Act, makes similar provision in relation to proposals to delegate the management of tenanted council dwellings to another body. These are lengthy amendments because it is necessary to spell out in some detail—and I was pressed hard in Committee about this—how the consultation arrangements are to work. This is done in new schedule 3A and new section 27A. These provisions place specific duties on the councils to consult their tenants—duties that councils will not be able to evade or skimp as the Secretary of State will be able to ensure that councils comply with them in full.

The amendments will require local authorities to consult tenants fully and to take their views into account before making an application to the Secretary of State. Tenants will have to be told of any significant changes made to the scheme after they have been consulted, including any modifications made to meet their objections.

The tenants will then have a further period of at least 28 days in which to lodge any remaining objections directly with the Secretary of State. If the Secretary of State concludes as a result of this consultation that the majority of tenants are opposed to the proposal, he will not be able to give consent and the scheme will not proceed. Before considering any application for his consent, the Secretary of State will be concerned to see that there were no shortcomings in the way in which the consultation was carried out. If necessary, he will have the power to require the council to carry out further consultations.

As the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) is seeking to delete paragraph (6) of new schedule 3A and subsection 27A(7) which are contained in this group of amendments, I must stress that the Secretary of State will be an effective long stop in seeing that the consultations are complied with properly.

These provisions provide that a transfer of ownership or management to a private body which takes place with the Secretary of State's prior consent cannot be declared void because of any failure on his part or that of the relevant council to comply with the new consultation provisions. These provisions are essential, as without such a guarantee—and it is well precedented—it is unlikely that any private body would be willing to enter into such a transaction which some time thereafter might be overturnable strictly in law because of some minor technical flaw — for example, in the dissemination of papers.

However, this protection for private bodies where transactions have taken place in good faith with the Secretary of State's prior consent does not mean that councils will be able to ignore the new statutory requirements to consult their tenants, and, as I have stressed, the Secretary of State will himself ensure that this is done properly in every case. Furthermore, it will still be open to tenants who feel aggrieved to take their grievance to the courts for redress.

As for precedents, similar provisions are to be found, for example, in section 17 of the New Towns Act 1981, section 128 of the Local Government Act 1972 and, somewhat surprisingly, in section 23(1) of the infamous Community Land Act 1975. I remember that Act as the cause of my first ever political campaign in my constituency, and we all wore stickers declaring, "Stop the land grab". That was our reaction to the Community Land Act 1975. Given the circumstances of this well-precedented power, I hope that, following my assurances, the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey will not feel it necessary to press his amendments.

The provisions that have come from another place will put on a statutory footing the general principles which it has already been Government policy to apply throughout by administrative means. On no occasion has consent been given in any way other than entirely in conformity with the general principles to which I am referring. We are simply putting into law what we have already been doing because people have been concerned. I wanted to react to that concern, and I did so in Committee.

There has been a lot of debate in the other place about the need for ballots and public inquiries. These are possible means of consultation in particular cases — Thamesmead, for example, in which my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), then on the Front Bench, played such a formidable part to bring about change.

But not all disposals will be of that kind. They will vary. There could be a ballot or a public inquiry, but these could be quite inappropriate in cases involving one, two, three or four tenanted properties. The tenants must always be given full details in writing, and I pledge that they will get that. They can object to the proposals simply by writing to the Secretary of State. In other instances, the council itself might well wish to hold meetings with the tenants affected to clarify its proposals and, for example, to provide a questionnaire on which tenants could give a number of opinions. In my view, the requirement for a particular form of consultation in all places at all times is a bit inflexible.

We shall be looking very closely at the reaction of councils whose tenants seek opportunities to begin to manage their own affairs. I shall be looking closely at the attitudes of councils towards approaches by prospective co-operatives, management co-operatives and so on, in the ever changing tapestry of new forms of housing tenure, particularly in our cities.

These amendments give us what the House wants and certainly what the Committee wanted — a basic requirement for consultation by the local authority with provision for the Secretary of State to ask for further consultation where he considers it necessary in the form he considers it necessary. The Secretary of State can insist on proper consultation, but he can be flexible about how it is carried out. I think that that is the right approach.

Mr. Rooker: I am grateful to the Minister for going out of his way to explain some of the points involved. He referred to groups of tenants going to the local authority. I may have misunderstood, but I believe that that relates to another clause in the Bill — clause 7, which was inserted in Committee. We are now discussing the operation of old clauses 4 and 6 relating to disposal of ownership and sub-contracting of management. I would not want to confuse the two issues. The other is a new right for tenants to demand and seek co-operatives and to get a response from the local authority.

We are grateful for the amendments. That is absolutely clear because they arose from pressure on the Government in Committee. The Minister wrote to me as long ago as 23 April to say that it was not possible to put the amendments in the Bill on Report. There was a good reason for that — the Bill was railroaded and bulldozed through the House. Following consideration in Committee, it came back on Report within a week or a fortnight. Then, for no reason that I have been able to discover, it spent three months in the other place, although nothing happened between April and July.

When the Minister wrote to me on 23 April saying that there would be proposals for consultation for tenants, he listed some of the principles to be used. He went on to say:

"You will see that this arrangement will give tenants an effective right of veto where the majority are opposed to a disposal of tenanted property or to a management agreement."

I put that sentence on the record during the Report stage. It is an important point. Nobody says that the same system has to be used throughout the country; there are many ways in which it can be implemented.

Subsection (5) of Lords amendment No. 27 says:

"The Secretary of State shall not give his approval if it appears to him that a majority of the tenants of the houses to which the agreement relates do not wish the proposal to proceed".

The Secretary of State must find out about that. It would not be acceptable to have a show of hands at a public meeting. As long as a detailed proposal is put to the tenants and fully explained to them, I cannot see what is wrong with a ballot.

One of the Minister's civil servants, an assistant secretary, Jenny Williams, attended a seminar——

Mr. John Patten: She is a talented person.

Mr. Rooker: I have no doubt that she is talented. That seminar was held at the Housing Centre Trust in April this year and her speech was reported in the July-August edition of Housing Review. However, I read the article only today. Now I know why I am getting so much "stick", because of the way in which my name has been used to excuse certain Government policies. In discussing aspects of the Government's policy, she said:

"Ministers have promised to consider making statutory provision for tenants to be consulted individually on such proposals".

That refers to the proposals to sub-contract management and dispose of sites.

I hope that tenants will be consulted individually by means of a ballot. I do not assume that it will be consultation à la Langbaurgh. A system of individual counselling would be unacceptable as a means of obtaining a decision. After the proposals have been discussed and the details examined, I do not see why a ballot of the tenants cannot take place. In the other place, the Government spokesman repeated again and again that a majority of the tenants would have to be in favour and that it would have to be clearly shown that they were in favour of the proposal. On 7 October, the Minister used the phrase

"It really is a veto by tenants."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 7 October 1986; Vol. 144, c. 199.]

"Veto" is an extremely powerful word. Everybody understands what it means, One need only look at Northern Ireland, with which the Minister is more familiar than I. The people of Northern Ireland understand what that word means. It means that something can be stopped. Tenants must know that they have a collective right, by majority vote, to challenge anything with which they do not agree.

Mr. Cartwright: The hon. Gentleman is aware that an example of a major housing development leaving the public sector in recent years is Thamesmead, most of which is in my constituency. In that case, there was a clear vote by everyone concerned. During the campaign, all points of view were expressed. At the end of it, everybody who was living in the development had an opportunity to vote for the kind of future that they wanted for the area. Is not that the kind of model at which we should be looking?

Mr. Rooker: Yes, it is. I understand that the tenants of the former Cantrell Farm at Knowsley voted on that disposal and that a ballot showed that about 1,000 to six were in favour of the change.

Doubts have been raised, though not by me. I understand what is meant by a veto and I am prepared to accept the Minister's letter on that point. I am also prepared to accept the spirit of the amendment. It represents a substantial advance on the Bill's original proposals. It is not for me to defend the Government's Bill, but I flatly refuse to tell lies about it, although other people have told lies. The Minister must make it absolutely clear that it is a veto, as I understand the meaning of that word and as the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) and every other reasonable person understands it. On that basis, we welcome the amendments.

The Minister said that the wording of paragraph 7 was taken from a precedent littered throughout our legislation, but I presume that it relates only to procedural mistakes and not if a local authority deliberately misled the Secretary of State, causing him to believe that requirements had been met when that was not the case. This system must not be fudged. Deliberate deception must not be allowed to carry the day. Paragraph 7 is drafted in extremely wide terms. If there is a precedent for it in other legislation, there is obviously a reason for it, but I should like the Minister to confirm that those words have indeed been used in previous legislation.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Many misleading statements have been made about the Housing and Planning Bill. That is the only point that was made by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) with which I agree.

A leaflet issued by the Campaign Against Sales of Estates says:

"If the Housing and Planning Bill becomes law, it will mean no security, no consultation, no right to stay in your home, tenants could be evicted and their estates sold . . .no right of appeal if tenants don't agree with the plans to sell their estates. . .selling estates means fewer homes."

I am in favour of all three amendments, so to me that leaflet, entitled

is completely unhelpful. Bearing in mind what my hon. Friend has done to give powers to tenants, it is a disgrace that the leaflet was allowed to be circulated. It was certainly audacious to address the questionnaire to "Mr. John Patten" and to give his address as the House of Commons, despite the fact that the Minister for Housing and Construction is at the Department of the Environment, Marsham street, London SW1.

There have also been headlines in The Leicester Mercury such as

"Give us a veto over house sales"

and

"Sales veto claim is misleading."

Another heading is

"Tenant has right to be consulted"

and

"Tenants will not be thrown out of homes".

There has been great concern in Leicester. A few days ago, the direct labour organisation put an "info" leaflet through people's doors saying:

"Councils pressed to sell off housing estates. Leicester on hit list . . .What's Leicester City Council's policy? Leicester City Council is totally against the Bill."

This Bill will do a great deal to help my constituents, in particular Mr. Bill Cooper and the Charnwood Tenants Association, who feel bitterly let down by a council that does not want the estates to be improved.

Amendments Nos. 17 and 169 demonstrate that despite what Leicester city council says the new power will not depend upon the whim of the Secretary of State. The authority will first have to seek his approval and he will have to take certain factors into account before making his decision. In other words, there will be proper consultation before there is any exercise of the right to sell. Account will have to be taken of the effect of the scheme on the extent and character of the housing accommodation in the area and the extent to which the scheme provides for housing to be offered for sale or rent. Most important of all, there will have to be proper consultation with the existing tenants, and people living there will have an absolute say about their future.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr said that there had been lies about the Bill. The council in Leicester had said that there would be no consultation and that the Secretary of State would be able to act without consulting tenants. If approval is given, it will be only after the most careful consideration. There is a power to require further consultation in paragraph 4 of the new schedule, Lords amendment No. 169. My right hon. Friend's consent will be withheld if the majority of tenants are opposed to disposal. No consent will be forthcoming unless it appears to the Secretary of State that the majority of tenants in the dwellings to which the application relates wish the disposal to proceed. That is quite clear. Council tenants will be secure tenants and if the majority do not want their housing estate to be sold, that will be the end of the matter, so my constituents in Leicester, East will be OK.

It will be incumbent on councils to consult, as is only right. Leicester city council is opposed to any privatisation and to any private funds coming into the city. That is a tragedy, because the only way to improve the housing stock is in partnership with the private sector. The Liecester Tenants Federation, which comprises 36 tenants' organisations and is led by Mr. Don Connolly, says clearly that the veto that tenants need must be spelt out clearly. The federation says:

"We do not know of any tenants who want their homes sold".

The federation is not properly representing my constituents in council property because some of those tenants would like their homes to be sold. If the majority agree, we shall have a sale. Otherwise, as my hon. Friend the Minister has made clear, those houses cannot be sold.

It is important to note that each tenant will be individually informed. I wish that Conservative Members would stress that fact and nail the lies that are being put about. It is clear from the Bill that notice in writing will be given. It is also clear that a tenant will have 28 days to send any objection to the Secretary of State. Those are clear reasons for supporting the amendments, which will ensure that tenants who want proper consultation have the final say. The Minister has made it clear in a helpful letter to me that there is no possibility of an immediate handover of a council estate to a private developer. The veto exists and the management and ownership of an estate can be delegated or transferred only with the approval of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Rooker: May I query the hon. Gentleman's choice of words? As I understand it—if I am wrong, I have been wrong since day one—nothing in the Bill requires a local authority to dispose of its estates.

Mr. Bruinvells: That is correct.

Mr. Rooker: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman agrees with me because he was giving the impression that local authorities might be forced to dispose of estates. That is not the case.

Mr. Bruinvels: I am delighted to confirm that. I know that many of my constituents would like to have their houses sold to private landlords, but that will not be possible unless the majority agree and even then the council's authority will be required. As I said earlier, Leicester city council has already said that it opposes the Bill and I assume that it will not support the measure when it becomes law. All that I seek is the assurance that my hon. Friend the Minister has already given, which is that there will be much more consultation with tenants and that if they choose to have their properties sold their homes will be properly maintained and additional resources will be brought in. If they do not choose, their right to consultation and a veto will be there from day one.

These are good amendments. Ministers should be congratulated on taking up some of the amendments that were suggested in Committee. I look forward to seeing the Bill become law, because it will ensure that all tenants in Leicester, East and elsewhere, are given proper rights, can live in decent, properly managed property and are given free consultation, with tenants' and residents' associations being in the forefront in helping to maintain a decent quality of life on each estate.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I also welcome the Government amendents, which have been produced as a result of the pressure exerted by Opposition Members in Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) and Labour Members argued from the start that is was necessary to have proper consultation.

The Government amendments were published on 26 September and I should say to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) that, although I have never seen or heard of the document that he quoted, if it was published before 26 September it is fair to note that at that time there was no statutory provision for consultation. Up to that time, worries that there would be no adequate consultation were sufficiently well founded for people to campaign for such consultation.

The reason for my two probing amendments was to examine subsection (7) of new section 27A and paragraph 6 of the proposed new schedule. The Minister said that those provisions were precedented and a letter from his Department to Lady David set out the precedents.

However, are not the proposed provisions unnecessarily cautious? If there were legal arguments, it might be suggested that if there had been defects in any of the procedures, including the consultation, there would be no going back on the decision. I understand that unscrambling legal eggs, transferring management of estates and so on, is extremely complex, but I have a number of questions for the Minister and we must have answers if the proper anxieties about whether the reference to "veto" means that there really will be a veto are to be allayed. These are not unfounded anxieties. Shelter has taken counsel's advice, which is that the Government's proposals would allow the veto to be watered down.

Is it correct that consent could be given if a local authority had wittingly or unwittingly misled the Secretary of State about the reasons for the failure to comply or if there had been some neglect—not necessarily culpable—within the Department, either by Ministers or officials? It is suggested that any tenant's challenge to the Secretary of State's decision to give consent would not make any disposal void by invalidating the consent, whatever the basis of the challenge and however serious the substance of the argument.

Is it correct that there will be no other remedy open to a tenant if something has gone wrong? He will not be able to get damages for a wrong, negligent or technically deficient decision and would have suffered the loss of a secure tenancy or a change of management against his wish. That might be important if there had been a close vote, perhaps 51 to 49.

Have the Minister and his officials examined alternative wording to make it expressly clear that the Secretary of State will be concerned only about technical rather than substantial deficiencies in the procedure? The legal advice to Shelter suggested that wording such as "a failure . . . to comply with such requirements as were unnecessary in all the circumstances to be complied with", followed by a specific list of technical deficiencies, would be clearer.

7 pm

Perhaps the Minister's officials will be able to advise him whether there are differences with the precedents. I accept that the formula has been used before because I have come across it before during my three and a half years as a Member. which seems all too short a period. Section 17 of the New Towns Act 1982 has more limited scope because it does not affect people specifically. As it is related to the disposal of land, it affects them only indirectly. The Minister will remember that the Community Land Act 1975 is also about disposals of land. However, it includes an alternative remedy, that of prosecution and fine, in the event of a technical breach. Under the Local Government Act 1972, no secure tenants were affected.

My last question is whether the Minister accepts that all of the precedents for the formula were introduced in different circumstances and do not affect directly the rights of secure tenants to make it better or appropriate now to accept the amendments that I have brought before the House, or at least to think again about the drafting of the measure.

I am prepared to take the Minister's word on these matters. I was not a member of the Committee which considered the Bill, but I am aware of the debates in Committee and the pressure which was put on the Minister. I have read also the reports of the debates in another place. If the Government accept the consultation process, and accept also, to use the words of the hon. Members for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) and for Leicester, East, that veto means veto, we cannot have a clause that suggests that veto does not mean veto.

I ask for the Minister's considered response to my argument. There is legal opinion and professional opinion that at present the veto is not secure. The Minister must be clear on this issue because many people outside this place are worried about the security of the Government's policy on a matter of great importance to many who are presently council tenants. I refer to the future disposal of management of their estates.

Mr. John Patten: I must respond to the issues raised by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), who made a telling contribution, and by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). To take up the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Perry Barr, I have read twice what I regard as the key phrase in my speech which is: "If the Secretary of State concludes as a result of this consultation that the majority of tenants are opposed to the proposal, he will not be able to give consent, and the scheme will not proceed." I do not want to get into Gertrude Steinish stuff about a veto is a veto is a veto, but I cannot be any clearer in spelling out that which is contained in that part of my speech.

I have been reminded by a note which has been placed in front of me—which after due graphological analysis I divine to have been written by the same Mrs. Williams to whom the hon. Member for Perry Barr referred—that tenants will be consulted individually in writing. I hope that that writing will be slightly clearer than Mrs. Williams's. The note continues:

"See 27(1)(a) etc. as predicted at the seminar."

That means that the Secretary of State will have all the information that she or he needs to determine whether the majority of tenants are opposed to the scheme. If the majority object, the scheme cannot go ahead. I do not think that I can be any clearer than that. I am putting the matter in different ways so that there is a choice of words which can be plucked from my speeches and used, I hope, in the publicity material delivered by the direct labour organisation, at huge expense to ratepayers in Leicester, including the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East. I want to see one of the little red leaflets go through every door. I trust that they will state, first, what I have said this afternoon, followed by an apology for unnecessarily frightening or scaring tenants about their prospects in my hon. Friend's constituency and, secondly, draw to the attention of tenants the fact that in another part of the Bill tenants in Leicester, East, as I know my hon. Friend wants, will have a full opportunity to form up to Leicester city council, that amazingly interesting body, and tell it that they wish to have the opportunity to manage their own affairs.

That is what the Bill does; that is the opportunity that the Bill provides for tenants; and I note that thus far Leicester city council has suppressed at every turn that information. If the council wants to give me the space in its little pamphlet, I shall happily write free of charge within a very short time an explanatory article on the new rights that tenants will have as well as the protection which the hon. Member for Perry Barr and my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East want tenants to have in future. Incidentally, I have a lot of money on my hon. Friend retaining his seat at the next general election, including a number of side bets.

I have tried to explain that the provisions that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey seeks to amend provide that the transfer of ownership or management to a private body that takes place with the Secretary of State's prior consent cannot be declared void because of any failure on his part. In reaching that decision, we took into account many of the points to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. In this Bill we must seek to be free and fair in our attitude to all parties, and we must make sure that all the parties understand their obligations. I refer to the council, the tenants and any third party that is involved. We have picked the words as drafted extremely carefully and, following the care with which the provisions are drafted, I cannot imagine any tenant finding herself or himself in the position to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. Secondly, we have considered the wording extremely carefully and we believe that it is clear. It is aimed only at technical difficulties of the sort that I mentioned in my introductory remarks.

I have given every undertaking that I possibly can both in Committee and on the Floor of the House this evening. I hope that the Bill will proceed unamended.

EXTENSION OF ASSURED TENANCIES SCHEME TO CASES WHERE WORKS HAVE BEEN CARRIED OUT

Lords amendment: No. 36, in page 24, leave out lines 35 to 37 and insert—

"Certification of fitness for purposes of s. 56B

56C.—(1) An approved body having an interest in a dwelling-house which it proposes to let on an assured tenancy may—

(a) apply in writing to the local housing authority for a certificate that the dwelling-house is fit for human habitation, or

(b) submit to the local housing authority a list of works which it proposes to carry out to the dwelling-house with a request in writing for the authority's opinion whether the dwelling-house would, after the execution of the works, be fit for human habitation; and the authority shall as soon as may be after receiving the application or request, and upon payment of such reasonable fee, as they may determine, take the matter into consideration.

(2) If the authority are of opinion that the dwelling-house is fit for human habitation, they shall give the approved body a certificate to that effect.

(3) If the authority are of opinion that the dwelling-house will be fit for human habitation after the execution of the proposed works, they shall inform the approved body that they are of that opinion.

(4) In any other case, the authority shall give the approved body a list of the works which in their opinion are required to make the dwelling-house fit for human habitation.

(5) Where the authority have responded in accordance with subsection (3) or (4) and the works in question have been executed to their satisfaction, they shall, if the approved body applies in writing, and upon payment of such reasonable fee as the authority may determine, give the body a certificate that the dwelling-house is fit for human habitation.

(6) For the purpose of determining whether the condition in section 56B(1)(b) was satisfied in any case (fitness of dwelling-house on relevant date), but not for any other purpose, a certificate given under this section is conclusive evidence that the dwelling-house was fit for human habitation on the date on which the certificate was given.

(7) In this section 'the local housing authority' has the same meaning as in the Housing Act 1985.

Fitness for human habitation

56D. In determining for any of the purposes of section 56B or 56C whether a dwelling-house is, or would be, fit for human habitation, regard shall be had to its condition in respect of the following matters—repair, stability,

freedom from damp
internal arrangement, natural lighting, ventilation,
water supply,
drainage and sanitary conveniences, facilities for the preparation and cooking of food and disposal of waste water; and the dwelling-house shall be deemed to be unfit only if it is, or would be, so far defective in one or more of those matters as to be not reasonably suitable for occupation in that condition.".

(3) In section 57 of the Housing Act 1980 (effect of interest of landlord ceasing to belong to approved body), in subsections (1) and (2) for "section 56(3)(a)" substitute "section 56(1)(b)"."

Mr. John Patten: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 37 and 39.

Mr. Rooker: The phrase "fit for human habitation" appears throughout the new clauses. I understand that there is no change in the fitness standards as enumerated in 56D. Does "fit for human habitation" mean the same

Mr. John Patten: Good heavens, I am searching for words here. We have not altered the standard—that is absolutely correct. However, I must elaborate on this point because it is extremely important and I may have to return to it for some little time.

We have not altered the standard. When our proposals to extend the assured tenancy scheme were first introduced in Committee, the standard chosen was the fitness standard to which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) referred. I believe that my memory serves me right and that it is contained in section 604 of the Housing Act 1985. The Opposition did not object to that then, as far as I can recall from the debates. Although the standard is now stated in great detail in the Bill, it remains, effectively, the same as the standard which appeared before us in Committee.

Section 604 of the Housing Act 1985 refers to fitness for human habitation as:

"repair, stability, freedom from damp, internal arrangement, natural lighting, ventilation, water supply, drainage and sanitary conveniences, facilities for the preparation and cooking of food and for the disposal of waste water."

That relates only to the fitness standard, which is not the same as "in good repair". We intend to deal with the important issue of good repair, after due consultation with local authorities, by the application of a prescribed amount. We have consulted about the proposition; on that the prescribed amount should be £5,000 in London and £4,000 in the rest of England and Wales. I emphasise that that consultation is an extremely important exercise, which will lead to tests of fitness and also to places being in good repair before they are let under the approved tenancy scheme. I have already written to the hon. Member for Perry Barr explaining why we propose those levels and the basis on which we have decided to consult.

I should reiterate—and the words are beginning to come back to me now—that there is no objective test of fitness for human habitation. In the Housing Act 1985, we tried to be as objective as possible. Nor is there an objective test for what is "good repair". There is an element of subjectivity. We tried to achieve a reasonable level through the application of the prescribed amounts, on which I intend to consult.

Mr. Rooker: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is not the place to discuss the Minister's consultation on prescribed amounts, although I repeat what I said in Committee, that the Minister has set these amounts at too low a level. Explicit in the assured tenancy scheme is the fact that the landlord is out to get the market rent.

My hon. Friends and I have discussed what is "fit for human habitation". It is about the lowest of the low. A house fit for human habitation may lack basic amenities; it is still fit without hot or cold water. It still meets the fitness standards — crazy though that may seem. It would be difficult for landlords to obtain a market rent under assured tenancies if they operated at the lowest possible level.

I ask only whether there is a difference between "fitness for human habitation" and "in good repair". The difference is the wrong way. Landlords participating within the scheme—which has the Opposition's support with the caveats which I established in Committee—had better beware of that.

Mr. Patten: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for tossing me a challenge to try to describe the difference between "fit for human habitation" and "in good repair". He should be reassured by two things. First, no landlord could let tenancies successfully under the assured tenancy scheme with the rentals he would seek to attract if the property was unfit for human habitation and/or not in good repair. Secondly, before any landlord was able to let such property, he would have to seek registration from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. If at any stage it was clear that he was not providing accommodation of a suitable standard, that registration could be withdrawn. Registration is debatable in the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 37 to 39 agreed to.

New Clause

HOUSING THE HOMELESS

Lords amendment: No. 40, before clause 10, insert the following new clause—

".—(1) The Housing Act 1985 shall be amended in accordance with the following provisions.

(2) In section 58 (definition of homelessness) after subsection (2) there shall be inserted the following subsections—

"(2A) A person shall not be treated as having accommodation unless it is accommodation which it would be reasonable for him to continue to occupy.

(2B) Regard may be had, in determining whether it would be reasonable for a person to continue to occupy accommodation, to the general circumstances prevailing in relation to housing in the district of the local housing authority to whom he has applied for accommodation or for assistance in obtaining accommodation.".

(3) For section 69(1) (provisions supplementary to ss. 63, 65 and 68) there shall be substituted the following subsection—

"(1) A local housing authority may perform any duty under section 65 or 68 (duties to persons found to be homeless) to secure that accommodation becomes available for the occupation of a person—

(a) by making available suitable accommodation held by them under Part II (provision of housing) or any enactment, or

(b) by securing that he obtains suitable accommodation from some other person, or

(c) by giving him such advice and assistance as will secure that he obtains suitable accommodation from some other person, and in determining whether accommodation is suitable they shall have regard to Part IX (slum clearance), X (overcrowding) and XI (houses in multiple occupation) of this Act.".".

7.15 pm

Mr. Squire: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

I have been a member of the board of Shelter for the past four years, although I stress that, should anyone be in doubt, I have not had a pecuniary interest. That interest allows me some insight into aspects of housing problems.

The law at present defines someone as homeless if he does not have accommodation. If someone is homeless and fulfils certain other conditions, the local authority has a duty to secure accommodation for that person. The Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 says nothing about the standards or appropriateness of accommodation. The code of guidance issued by the Secretary of State to guide the local authorities in their interpretation of the law makes it clear that the accommodation to be secured for homeless people should be permanent housing of a decent standard.

Until the so-called Pulhoffer judgment, a succession of legal cases favoured reading "reasonable" or "appropriate" with "accommodation" in both the intial definition of homelessness and the definition of the local authority's duty to the homeless. The major thrust of the law was clearly that Parliament was determined that families in real and genuine housing need should be helped by their local authority.

In February of this year, the House of Lords judgment in Regina v. London Borough of Hillingdon—Ex parte Pulhoffer considerably changed the interpretation that had previously been placed upon that responsibility. In the Pulhoffer case it was decided that as the legislation did not include the words "reasonable" or "appropriate", they should not be read into it. Accommodation could be statutorily overcrowded, unfit or entirely unsuitable for some other reason, but it did not thereby cease to be accommodation. Lord Brightman said that there were no rules.

We are in a Diogenes barrel. As an erstwhile judge decided, a veritable pigsty would have counted as relevant, proper and reasonable accommodation.

Shelter and other housing groups were very concerned about that, and their concern increased when evidence started to come in that several local authorities—I must be fair and say that it was not the overwhelming majority—were apparently changing their policies to give effect to the judgment and thus reducing the opportunity for people in bad housing conditions to be properly rehoused.

Together with hon. Members from all parties, I tabled an early-day motion drawing attention to this matter, and currently it has 76 signatures. As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford), the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) and I visited the former Under-Secretary in July and expressed our concern about the matter.

Last week in another place, their Lordships saw fit, against the Government's advice, to carry an amendment drafted by Shelter. I do not wish to go into enormous detail about the amendment as it would be unfair to the House to do so. Subsections (2) and (3) tackle, in each case, the two areas which most concern us about the effects of the original Pulhoffer judgment.

It is important to stress that the amendment can in no way extend the rights of homeless persons. It simply restores the position to what it was before the judgment in the House of Lords. The housing pronouncements of my hon. Friend the Minister are attracting great interest. He may have been advised that last week I even expressed a word of congratulation during Prime Minister's Question Time. I congratulate him on the steps he is taking.

I emphasise that the ability of local authorities to meet these responsibilities, particularly in areas of high housing stress, is dependent upon some change in the Government's attitude to investment in housing. I welcome my hon. Friend's comments in that respect, particularly about the necessity to do something about the phasing out of bed and breakfast accommodation for homeless families. I look forward to his proposals in two weeks' time in that respect. Above all, I urge acceptance of the amendment and trust that the Government will accept it.

Mr. John Fraser: The amendment is a Labour victory. I do not wish to detract from anything said by the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire). I am glad that he spoke in favour of the amendment which was passed in another place. Until a few days ago, the Government resisted this amendment. Their spokesman in the other place described it as premature. I am glad that, at a late stage, they had the grace to accept it. I agree with the hon. Member for Hornchurch. The measure returns the law to what we always thought it was. First, a person is homeless if he or she lives in outrageously unsatisfactory accommodation. Secondly, a local authority will have a duty under the homeless persons legislation to provide homeless persons with not only, literally, a roof over their heads but reasonable accommodation in which they will be reasonably secure. Therefore, we welcome the late acceptance of what has been called the Pulhoffer amendment. The amendment will be passed now that it has the Government's support.

We must recognise that the homelessness problem is the rotten, inhumane consequence of the Government's housing policy. It is not a mere accident from which the Government can divorce themselves. It is the result of the Government's repressive attitude towards local authority housing construction and rented housing. The words "crisis" and "catastrophe" are often over-used but I do not think that they are over-used when applied to the problem of homelessness in the United Kingdom, particularly in London. Figures published only this morning by the Association of London Authorities gave some idea of present and future homelessness in the capital. The Association of London Authorities comprises only 16 of the 32 London boroughs, so the figures that I shall give are a gross underestimate of the extent of homelessness in the capital.

In March 1986, 3,558 homeless families had to be supplied with bed and breakfast accommodation. By August 1986, the number had increased to 4,742. The Association of London Authorities forecasts that by March 1988 the total number of homeless families in bed and breakfast accommodation will reach 9,138 in the 50 per cent. of boroughs that it represents. The association predicts that the number will increase by a further third by March 1989. Some 12,637 homeless families will be in bed and breakfast accommodation at enormous expense to the ratepayer and divorced from any kind of permanent attachment to their homes. That is a disgraceful figure. If it is projected to the whole of London, it would not be unreasonable to estimate that in 1989 20,000 families will be in bed and breakfast accommodation. If one includes single homeless people living rough or in grossly unsatisfactory accommodation, there could be about 40,000 units without any kind of permanent shelter in our capital city. That could be nothing but a disgrace and a reflection on the Government's housing policy.

The bed and breakfast homeless are only the tip of the iceberg. Indeed, the homeless figure is only the tip of the iceberg. The number of people accepted as being homeless rose from 50,000 a year in 1979 to 100,000 a year at present, and even that is an underestimate of the grave housing need in this country. We must not only look to the redefinition of the legal duties of local authorities but recognise the full extent of homelessness, especially bed and breakfast homelessness.

Last Monday, I talked to the new leader of Lambeth borough council, Councillor Linda Bellos, who told me that the cost of providing bed and breakfast accommodation for 362 families in Lambeth alone—my borough—is sufficient to underwrite the building of 1,000 new homes a year. Homelessness, especially bed and breakfast homelessness, affects ethnic minorities very harshly. I am sometimes told off for using the expression "ethnic minorities". I am told that "black" is the right word to use in some places. Ninety per cent. of the homeless in bed and breakfast accommodation are black or of Asian extraction.

More resources must be allocated to housing. At Prime Minister's Question Time last week, the Prime Minister boasted that the Government had built one million homes since she came to office. She went so far as to say that that was the largest number of homes ever built in an equal period. If that is what she meant to say, it is what Londoners would call a pork pie. If she had continued building at the rate which prevailed under the Labour Government, at least 1·5 million homes would have been built since 1979. There must be a restoration of Labour's housing resources.

The Government have to drive home to some local authorities the seriousness with which they must take their housing responsibilities to the homeless. It is not insignificant that the name of the case that we are debating is Pulhoffer v. London borough of Hillingdon, a borough which seems to believe that one should draw a cordon—I am not sure whether it is a cordon sanitaire or a cordon doctrinaire — around the pools of homelessness in London. At present—I have checked this—Hillingdon borough council is a hung council. When it was controlled by the Conservative party, it held the homeless and its housing responsibilities in such contempt that it did not even bother to send homelessness statistics, house building statistics or any other kind of housing statistics to the Department of the Environment. The Minister does not know what is going on in Hillingdon because the borough council is not prepared to provide him with information.

I am sorry to talk so much about London, but I do so because we were provided with some London figures this morning. We must treat London and the other conurbations as single strategic areas in which to deal with the problems of housing and homelessness. One cannot simply divide the capital city or other large urban areas into segments in which some local authorities discard their housing responsibilities altogether while others such as Lambeth, Southwark and Birmingham take their responsibilities seriously.

7.30 pm

I hope that as a consequence of the reversal of the decision in Pulhoffer v. London borough of Hillingdon the Minister will look carefully at the operation of policies in boroughs such as Hillingdon and elsewhere, where local authorities neglect their responsibilities to the most vulnerable in the housing market. I hope not only that there will be a change or a re-clarification in the law, but that more resources will be devoted to housing. I hope that there will be a purge by the Department of the Environment on local authorities that callously disregard their housing responsibilities, and that the Minister will take that seriously.

As I go around the country I come across housing authorities, some of which are quite small, which have never before known the problem of putting homeless families into bed and breakfast accommodation. Gravesham is one of those councils. Medway is another, where the local council demolished 400 homes, blowing them up in a sort of celebration of doctrinaire anti-housing ideology. Many local authorities, which have never before known the problem, are now having to place homeless families in bed and breakfast accommodation. The Government's policy is coming home to roost. We should regard the amendment not just as a clarification of the law, but as a challenge to reallocate resources to badly needed homes.

Mr. Cartwright: Like other hon. Members who have spoken in the debate, I welcome the Government's acceptance of the amendment carried in another place. However, I agree with the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) that it will not solve the problems of homelessness. Every day of our lives those of us who represent inner London constituencies are made all too aware of the problem.

I should like to deal with the concluding point of the hon. Member for Norwood. The London borough of Greenwich, in which I live and which I represent, has always been a rather strange London borough in that it has never been a housing stress area. Therefore, in the past we have never had the problems of bed and breakfast accommodation, and we have not had a major problem with homelessness. However, we have that problem today, and about 40 per cent. of all the vacant property in the borough goes to homeless families. If we add the problems of the break-up of relationships and the need to decant for major renovations in local authority housing, we find that virtually no families are being housed and taken off the waiting lists because of the overriding priority that must be given to genuinely homeless families. That means that our waiting list continues to be about 15,000. It also means that we must face the problem of people having absolutely no hope of being housed by the local authority. For example, there are about 200 cases of husbands and wives living apart. They can no longer look forward to the priority that they had in easier times, when they could be virtually guaranteed local authority housing. There are no longer any hard-to-let properties because the depth of the housing problem means that they are taken by people in serious need.

As other hon. Members have said, the figures are bad enough on the basis of those accepted under the legislation as being genuinely homeless. The young single homeless are a non-priority group who in the past have been regarded as a central London problem—young people attracted by the bright lights to the centre of the city. It is no longer only a central London problem. It is an unusual Friday evening if I do not see at my advice service a young person who is utterly homeless, moving around from one friend's home to another, sleeping on the floors of relatives' homes, sometimes sleeping in cars and sometimes sleeping rough.

Sometimes young people are homeless because they have fallen out with their families. The lifestyles simply do not gel and the parents have to face an awful choice—they cannot have the kid in the family because it is causing so much trouble, but they know that if they put the kid out he or she will be homeless. That is an awful decision for a parent to have to take, but I meet it all too often in my constituency. Sometimes a young person is homeless because the family has simply moved away, having decided to go back to the West Country, to the north or to Ireland or to retire away from London. That leaves 18, 19 or 20-year-olds high and dry because all their friends and their jobs are in London and they have nowhere to live. It is almost impossible to overemphasise the problem of homelessness now afflicting areas that never had difficulties in the past.

Another problem about homelessness is the lack of choice that we are forced to present to homeless families. The "one offer" situation is a heaven sent opportunity for a local authority to get rid of property at which other people turn up their noses because of its condition or its location, and it is no longer confined within one borough boundary. I am finding increasingly that homeless families are rehoused in my constituency and in my borough, miles away from their home towns—for example, people from Croydon who have no connection with my constituency. They have no friends, relations or other contacts in my constituency but because the London borough of Croydon says, "There is only one offer—we can get you housed in Greenwich and if you do not go there we shall have nothing more to do with you", they are forced to accept housing in an area that is entirely alien to them. That causes all sorts of difficulties for social and family life.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): A dilemma faces a housing authority as to whether it encourages—and in certain cases it does encourage—the break-up of a family by making it too easy for children to leave their parents, wives to leave their husbands or husbands to leave their wives. How many cases has the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) come across where the boy, the wife or the husband has been genuinely without a home?

Mr. Cartwright: I have come across far too many cases where those people genuinely have nowhere to go. If the hon. Gentleman is saying to me that it is not self-evident that break-up of relationship cases, as they are called in the trade—where husbands and wives part company, or where people who are living together in some sort of relationship part company—should have priority over people on the ordinary waiting list, I have much sympathy with that point of view.

However, that was not really the point that I was making. I was talking about the difficulties of young people in particular who are left high and dry with nowhere to live. I was making a point about young married couples starting out in life who have nowhere to live, other than a home with one lot of parents or the other. That is a dreadful way to try to start married life in 1986; having to make occasional visits to be able to sleep with each other is a singularly unpleasant way in which to begin married life. Unfortunately, that is what is happening in inner London at the moment.

In conclusion, I urge the Minister to take notice of that sort of situation. I join the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) who paid tribute to the new thinking that we have already seen from the Minister since he took on his present office. Many of his ideas are worth all-party consideration, if not support. I hope that he comes to terms with the extent of the problem of homelessness in our great cities, especially in inner London, because it is one of the most important social problems now facing us.

Mr. John Patten: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) for his concluding remarks. Tonight is not the night, and I suspect you would not allow it, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for a full-blown debate on homelessness in all its aspects. I shall not seek to make a major speech of some length on the matter, and I see Mr. Deputy Speaker nodding firmly as I say that.

I take on board the comments of the hon. Members for Woolwich and for Norwood (Mr. Fraser), and also the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) who moved acceptance of the amendment. I am grateful to him for that. In any debate on homelessness we have to recognise that other things have happened in this country since 1979 besides there having been a Conservative Government since then. Major changes have taken place in our social structure. Far more people are asking for divorces. I understand that there were 179,000 in 1985, which is a huge increase on, say, 10 years before. There is considerable all-party support for trying to do something more, if we can, to fill empty homes, whether owned publicly or privately. We could all do much on that matter. We need to do something to make sure that Hillingdon gives us statistics. I shall turn my attention to that.

When the hon. Member for Norwood spoke, I thought that he was speaking about a Labour-controlled council because councils change hands, and I believe that Hillingdon has changed hands recently. I take as my source a report that I read in The Independent, so it must be accurate and true, that about two Thursdays ago the Labour chairman of housing announced the opening of a new housing development near London airport, and said that there should be far more mixed tenure estates. Many of us on both sides of the House could have written those words. I forget whether the chairman was announcing plans or opening the development, but he said that he did not want to see any more monolithic council estates, but he wanted multi-tenure estates.

On that basis, when I approach Hillingdon, rather than a delinquent Tory authority — Heaven forfend! — I should be approaching an authority under Labour or alliance control. However, I shall look into what the hon. Member for Norwood said. I shall do all that I can to bring about what he wants if he, as a quid pro quo, offers to approach, with me, the London borough of Camden, which refuses, persistently and continually, to return the statistics that we ask for. I know that I can look for support on that.

Mr. John Fraser: If people do not make returns of business statistics, many of them are prosecuted. I have no hesitation in saying that there should be an absolute duty on local authorities to supply the information that is essential for us to make policy decisions, irrespective of political control.

Mr. Patten: We are at one on that.

I listened with interest to what my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch said about the amendment, and I congratulate him on the way in which he spoke to it. I recognise the strength of feeling that there has been on the matter. That is why we are prepared to accept the amendment, but I do so with the proviso that we shall continue our monitoring exercises of the effects of the judgment on local authorities, through our postal survey of all authorities' practices in operating the Act. Likewise, we have an invitation outstanding to all voluntary bodies to submit to us any further evidence that they consider appropriate from their contacts in the housing advice network. At the end of the day, we shall consider the results in relation to how the amendment works in practice. We shall not hesitate to return to the House with proposals for further amendments to those parts of the Act if that seems appropriate. However, we are content to accept the amendment.

MATTERS TO BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DETERMINING FAIR RENT

Lords amendment No. 47 agreed to.

New Clause

FURTHER PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO SHARED OWNERSHIP LEASES

Lords amendment: No. 48, after clause 11, insert

"The provisions of Schedule (Further provisions with respect to shared ownership leases) have effect to exclude certain shared ownership leases from the operation of the provisions of—

(a) the Rent Act 1977 and the Rent (Agriculture) Act 1976, and

(b) Part I of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 (right of long leaseholder to enfranchisement or extension of lease)."

Read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 186.

7.45 pm

Mr. John Fraser: Amendment No. 48 and the associated schedule take shared ownership leases out of the protection of the Rent Act. As I understand it, they have never had the protection of the Rent Act, so the provision is declaratory to help building societies that have doubts about whether they are affected by the Act. A private landlord cannot grant a shared ownership lease, effectively because of the operation of the Rent Act. Such leases can be granted only where the landlord could create a secure tenancy, but shared ownership leases are defined in the Housing Act 1985 as not being secure tenancies. I should like to make one query. I cannot find any reference to the determination of the major rent element under a shared ownership tenancy, under fair rent procedures. I understand that with local authorities the rental element under the shared ownership lease is determined by the local authority. That is not right, because it is far too open to abuse. Be that as it may, it has to be comparable with other rents charged by the local authority, so there is a standard of comparison.

I cannot find any reference to the fair rent being determined for a shared ownership housing association shared ownership lease. It is important to have the assurance that the tenant can look to that arrangement for two reasons — first, so that the tenant under a shared ownership lease is not overcharged the rent element and, secondly, so that there is an element in the rent on which the tenant can apply for housing benefit. Normally the rental element under the lease is eligible for housing benefit, if, for instance, the tenant has a low income or becomes unemployed. Will the Minister give me an assurance on that?

Mr. Simon Hughes: I underline and endorse the valid request that has been made by the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser).

I do not know whether the Minister can give answers immediately, but there appears to be a form of tenure that falls outside the protection that I should have thought he would accept people need so that they know that they have security of financial planning if they go into what for many of them will be a new form of shared ownership. We welcome the form of ownership, but there does not seem to be the ring fencing in the protection that they would otherwise get in rent control.

Mr. John Patten: I hope that what I shall say will reassure the hon. Members for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) and for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

Neither the Rent Act nor the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 was drafted with the possibility of shared ownership in mind. Shared ownership was not around when they were drafted. To a certain extent, that is that. The protection and the rights that those Acts confer on tenants are, for the most part, not relevant or not appropriate to shared owners. The hon. Member for Norwood, with his legal expertise on housing issues, will appreciate that, I am sure.

The measures that we have introduced in the Bill were explicitly welcomed by the National Federation of Housing Associations and the Housing Corporation. Indeed, I was subject to heavy lobbying by those bodies. They regard the moves that we are making as necessary. They will enable housing associations to expand their shared ownership activities by offering privately financed schemes in addition to publicly subsidised schemes.

Under the Bill, the shared owner has to be offered a long lease with a minimum 99-year term, so he or she does not need Rent Act security, nor is the Rent Act necessary to ensure that shared ownership rents are kept under effective control. Let me explain. With a shared ownership lease, the shared owner will know from the outset what his or her rent will be and how it will be reviewed because it will have to be set out in the lease that the prospective tenant has to decide whether to sign. There has been the closest consultation with the Housing Corporation, which wants the changes to be made so that they have more money for their activities.

Furthermore, those offering shared ownership will have every incentive to keep the rent as low as possible to make the overall cost competitive with outright owner occupation; otherwise there is no point in the building society and housing association involved going into the business at all. Unless they keep the rent low, no one will be remotely interested in shared ownership. People would be mad to go into it; they would be better to buy outright. Therefore, all the commercial pressures, even though they are within a carefully constrained and generally institutional framework with building societies and housing associations, are to keep the rents as low as possible.

With the recent availability of funding from the building societies on index-linked terms — it is those terms which will make the schemes go — the cost to the shared owner of the rented share will be low at the start and should not be much higher than it would be under a fair rent. However, it will not necessarily be exactly the same as the fair rent. Therefore, there is an inbuilt safeguard on rents, and our proposals contain other safeguards to protect the position of shared owners. It is only future shared owners who will be excluded from the Rent Acts in that way. It will be only those who decide that they cannot afford or do not wish to buy but wish to take advantage of the scheme operated by a housing association with building society finance because that suits their circumstances. Existing shared owners who have the right to have a fair rent registered will retain that right. I give that pledge to the House. Furthermore, the lease must be granted by housing associations, which are non-profit-making organisations. I am not sure what else we can do to guarantee the position of tenants because the inbuilt drive must be for the housing association, investing institutions and others to keep the rented portion at the lowest possible level; otherwise they will not be in business.

Mr. John Fraser: People want to know the criteria that will have to be followed for increasing the initial rent. If it is to be removed from the control of the rent officer, who will control it?

Mr. Patten: The timing of the rent reviews will be set out in the lease, which will be for 99 years. This is a new hybrid form of mixed tenure occupation, part-owned, part-rented. All the way through, it must be incumbent on the lending institutions and housing associations involved, which are non-profit making, to keep the rent down to a reasonable level.

Finally, there is a safeguard that the leases will have to comply with prescribed conditions which define precisely the sort of shared ownership arrangements which will be permitted to operate outside the present legislative controls. Senores priores.

Mr. Fraser: We are told that there will be regular rent reviews in the lease. However, we want to know the formula by which the rent will be increased. We understand the formula at the moment because the rent is fixed by the rent officer. However, if the rent to be paid under the shared ownership lease is linked to an index-linked mortage from a building society, that may provide the formula. The point about Rent Act protection for tenants is that in a situation of desperate housing shortage people sometimes sign documents which they may afterwards judge to be unwise. It is for the House to intervene and protect people. That is why we want to know what the formula will be.

Mr. Patten: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's intervention. It is important to get this clear. I thought that I had made it clear in Committee. I apologise for not doing so. Index linking provides a formula, and the concept of shared ownership provides an in-built safeguard because no one would wish to put the rents up to more than a reasonable level. Otherwise shared ownership would not take off. The biggest safeguard is provided by the housing associations which will be operating the schemes. I cannot imagine a housing association wishing to let anyone into a shared ownership scheme, funded from whatever source, whom they thought did not fully understand what he was doing. We are dealing with someone who is not a tenant, but only partly a tenant. We are dealing with someone who has decided to go into a scheme involving part-ownership and part-tenancy. I think that we are chasing a red herring.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I accept the points made by the Minister about the automatic control mechanisms within that sector. He knows that I and my colleagues welcome the expansion of shared ownership. We have argued for that for many years. It would be helpful, so that we can see how things develop, if, within the Department and its requests to local authorities, backed up by enforcement if necessary, we do the same sort of monitoring as the Minister wants in relation to homelessness. In that way we will be able to see the pace of growth, the proportion of rent increases and other variables as they develop and as the sector grows. It will be a new development for many people, and it is important that the House and the Government watch it carefully so that we can learn from experience.

Mr. Patten: I do not think that I can give any assurances other than that we will monitor what we do with the housing association movement. The House exists, as the hon. Member for Norwood was implying, to ensure that the undreamable does not turn out to be true. However, I cannot imagine how a combination of the Abbey National and North housing would wish, under any circumstances, to affect adversely the tenants in the rented part of shared ownership schemes. I hope that the House will accept my assurances.

Question put and agreed to.

New Clause

EXTENSION OF PERMITTED OBJECTS OF REGISTERED HOUSING ASSOCIATIONS

Lords amendment: No. 49, after clause 11, insert the following new clause—

. In section 4 of the Housing Associations Act 1985 (eligibility for registration), in subsection (3) (permissible additional purposes or objects of association), after paragraph (d) insert—

"(dd) providing services of any description for owners or occupiers of houses in arranging or carrying out works of maintenance, repair or improvement, or encouraging or facilitating the carrying out of such works;".

Read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to consider amendments (a) and (b) to the amendment.

Mr. John Fraser: I beg to move, as an amendment to the Lords amendment, in line 8, after "houses" to insert "or land on which houses are constructed".

I welcome the amendment to housing association powers introduced in the other place because many housing associations undertake other activities. They not only develop and build homes but often assist daughter associations, or, in a less sexist way, issue associations with other housing schemes. For instance, there are many charitable housing associations which are not permitted by their rules to undertake what are called improvement for sale schemes funded by the Housing Corporation and some of the banks. Therefore, they have to form a non-charitable housing association to undertake that work.

However, in practice, the charity provides many of the services to the non-charitable housing association. That is quite right, although they have to go through some convoluted exercises in order to provide their services. Instead of providing services directly, they often have to enter into staff-sharing agreements so that the charitable housing association can assist the non-charitable. In other cases a housing association, whether charitable or not, may want to provide services to the owners of property which by present rules it may not be permitted to do.

We welcome the fact that the amendment widens the powers of housing associations. However, there are two limitations to which my amendments refer. Although the Government are permitting housing associations to provide services to the owners of other houses, there are many circumstances where a housing association assists a developer who is not yet the owner of the house. It may be that one association with a great body of expertise, some architectural staff and a good deal of experience helps a smaller housing association to develop land. I should like the powers of housing associations to be extended to what seems to be a sensible ambit of their activity.

The second problem is the extent to which a charitable housing association is able to undertake non-charitable work for other people. For example, a charitable housing association has an associate non-charitable association which does improvement-for-sale work. The other association is not a house owner but may be the owner of a site. I want the charity to be able to provide services as long as the provision of those services is subsidiary to the charitable objectives of the charitable housing association and to its benefit.

I know that the Housing Corporation had to issue a long circular recently advising housing associations about what they may or may not do. To my mind, a further minor amendment to the law would make life much simpler and allow housing associations, charitable and non-charitable, to continue with the sort of work that enables them to fill gaps in their flow of work and to provide work for their staff. I hope that the Government will further expand the activities of such organisations without subverting the main objectives.

8 pm

Mr. Tracey: I do not think that I can satisfy the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser). I am not sure whether his amendments are intended to be probing amendents or whether he expects satisfaction. The new clause extends the category of permissible objectives for registered housing associations to include agency services or services designed to provide home owners or occupiers with practical help or encouragement with their home improvements or repairs.

[Mr. Tracey]

At present, housing associations are able to provide such services only by setting up separately constituted bodies, which is both restrictive and expensive. The measure will facilitate the provision of improvement and repair services to owners and occupiers and give effect to an undertaking in last year's Green Paper on home improvement policy. Individual housing associations will have to decide whether to offer such services and how to finance them.

The Housing Corporation and the National Federation of Housing Associations were consulted about the Lords amendment and are content with it. The hon. Member for Norwood attempts to push further. The amendment has attracted wide support from the voluntary sector and was welcomed by all sides when it was introduced in another place.

Amendment (a) to the Lords amendment would put a question mark over the main amendment. Someone who owned land on which a house had yet to be built would not normally wish to do maintenance, repair or improvement work. It is difficult to understand how the suggestion would work.

Amendment (b) to Lords amendment No. 49 is intended to enable charitable housing associations to provide agency services. If a housing association is a registered charity, there is no restriction on its authority to render services to the public in accordance with its charitable objective. It would, therefore, be free to provide agency services. If the hon. Gentleman wants to push further, I am afraid that we cannot satisfy him. However, we take note of what he says. Lords amendment No. 49 is needed and I hope that the House will agree to it.

Amendment to the Lords amendment negatived.

Question, That the Lords amendment be made, put and agreed to.

New Clause

DISPOSAL OF DWELLINGS IN NEW TOWNS.

Lords amendment: No. 50, insert the following new clause

"(1) Part III of the New Towns Act 1981 (transfer of new town housing to district councils) is amended as follows.

(2) After section 57 insert

Savings for other powers of disposal

57A. The provisions of this Part as to the transfer of dwellings in a new town to a district council shall not be construed as restricting—

(a) the power of the Commission under section 36 above,

(b) the power of a development corporation under section 64 below, or

(c) the power of the Development Board for Rural Wales under section 4 of the Development of Rural Wales Act 1976, to dispose of such dwellings to any person.".

(3) The following provisions (which relate to the initiation of consultations with a view to the transfer of new town housing to a district council) are repealed—section 43(3) and (4), section 49*(b)* and (c)."

Read a Second time.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I beg to move, as an amendment to the Lords amendment, in line 5, after '57A', insert, 'subject to the provisions of 57B below,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendments (b), (c) and (d) thereto.

Mr. Hughes: The amendments deal with the disposal of housing held by the new town corporations, the Housing Corporation or the Development Board for Rural Wales. At present, if there is a disposal of such housing from the new town to a local authority, consultation takes place. However, the proposed Lords amendment allows disposal to other than local councils. This is not a matter of principle but the Lords amendment allows disposal to a housing association or to a private owner. The disposal could be of a single property, a couple of properties or all the properties on an estate.

The amendments to the Lords amendment cover the same issue. We suggest that there must be consultation about the disposal of properties by new towns, as there is in relation to disposals of properties by other authorities. My amendment provides for consultation and for a majority vote by those whose properties are to be disposed of.

Some local authorities which cover the new towns — for example, Milton Keynes, Basildon and Telford — have planned their housing provision on the basis that they will receive housing transfers from a new town corporation. They believe that it is right and fair, both for them as prospective inheritors of the housing stock and for the tenants of the new town corporation, for a consultation procedure to be set out.

I hope that the Minister will recognise that the words in my amendment were drafted by his Department. The words fit the circumstances, but they come from amendments discussed in another place in relation to consultation elsewhere. I hope that the Minister will not, therefore, object in principle to the words or the drafting. I hope that he will not object to the principle involved. If people have been public sector tenants, although of a different type from those who have held local authority tenancies, they should be fully consulted about every scheme that might result in the disposal of their property's freehold.

The new town authorities which are to be wound up will want to dispose of estates, parts of them, or individual dwellings, to a range of different authorities, so different consultation procedures will be necessary. However, it cannot be beyond the wit of authorities to work out ways of ensuring that consultation works properly. I press upon the Minister the importance of consultation when it is proposed that tenants' landlords be changed. That consultation process should be the same as has been accepted in other contexts. The tenants should be consulted and the decision should be made by a majority. I hope that the amendments that I have tabled, or others to the same effect, will be accepted by the Minister in one form or another. Many people are affected, and are anxious to have a say in their future.

Mr. Warren Hawksley (The Wrekin): The Wrekin includes Telford, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). I support and welcome Lords amendment No. 50 as being a move in the right direction. However, I am unable to support the Labour or Liberal amendments, which go further than is necessary.

My constituents will be greatly affected by what is decided. In my constituency there is a housing stock of 10,000 houses which are currently owned by Telford development corporation. If all those houses were to go to the Wrekin district council, its stock would be doubled, and it could not cope with the houses it would receive. I receive many complaints about how the district council maintains its houses and about the repair services that it offers to my constituents. I receive much more favourable comments from the tenants involved in the Telford development corporation.

It is undesirable that any large holding should be built up in one area. Wrekin district council's housing stock would be doubled if it received the extra houses. The greater the choice, the better. I and many of my constituents look forward to the Government giving tenants a choice of housing associations, housing co-operatives, housing trusts or the district council following the demise of the development corporation.

I agree with the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey that the tenants should be consulted. From my discussions with the Department I gained the impression that such consultation would take place. We may disagree about whether the results of that consultation should be binding on the Government, but I hope that consultation will take place, and that the Minister will listen. The Labour amendment suggests that there will be one solution. But I hope that there will be a variety of solutions. Some estates may decide to go to housing associations, housing co-operatives or trusts.

If consultation takes place and an estate decides that it wishes to remain with the council while another decides that it wants to go with a housing corporation or housing association, I hope that the Minister will look favourably upon those decisions. But until that consultation has taken place, it would be wrong of the Government to give any such commitment. That is not the only matter which must be taken into consideration when making a final decision.

Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will deal with three questions of a local nature affecting the Telford area. When will consultation take place? I know that consultation with the corporation and the district council was planned. It was held, possibly to allow this amendment to be passed. But I hope that the Minister can give some idea of when Telford's consultative procedure with the tenants will take place. What safeguards are there — the local government legislation that has already been passed may come into this — to ensure that the Wrekin district council does not spend much taxpayers' or ratepayers' money in running a campaign to try to push the view that it wants as many houses as it can obtain? Discussion with tenants should be balanced. I am nervous, because only last week the district council had a half-page advertisement in the Shropshire Star about bussing and deregulation, suggesting that the Government were at fault. It can still get away with that. The district council seems to get away with using public money to advertise a political point. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can assure us that no public money will be used for a campaign by the Wrekin district council to try to grab the available housing stock.

Who will decide how the consultation should be worded? We all know that the way in which a public opinion poll is worded is very relevant.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Gentleman clearly has an important constituency interest. The questions in my longer amendment are meant to allay just those anxieties. Are they the type of questions that should be answered? They come from the Department's draft elsewhere in the Bill, and I believe that they should be part of the consultation. Perhaps the formula could at least be adopted, even if the amendment is not.

8.15 pm

Mr. Hawksley: I hope that there will be a fair representation of the case. If a housing association, housing co-operative, a trust or the district council could be an option, the wording of the questions should be approved by the Secretary of State, and it should be in a brief form that gives the tenants all the information that they need. They must have certain information. I accept that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) may be right to be more specific about that, but I have confidence in my hon. Friend the Minister that the question will be asked correctly. I am asking my hon. Friend for an assurance that that will happen. I hope that it will happen, because it is important that it should.

I also hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can assure the tenants of Telford development corporation that they have the option of being kept out of the clutches — as they see it — of the rather Left-wing Wrekin district council. The majority of them do not want a relationship with the district council

Mr. Hawksley: I accept that it is all comparative but there are four members of the Militant Tendency on the Wrekin district council who were suspended by the local Labour party. They were kicked out of the Labour party. They appealed to the national executive committee, and were reinstated. They could be landlords for my constituents, who are at the moment tenants of Telford development corporation. They are worried about coming under such Left-wing control. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to reassure my constituents that they will get a fair deal from the legislation.

Mr. Rooker: I jest with the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley), but at least the people of The Wrekin will have the satisfaction of knowing that Bruce Grocott will be their Member of Parliament after the next election.

I heard the hon. Gentleman dismiss my amendments and those of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), but I could not quite follow his argument. I do not understand how he could disagree with amendment (c), because all it does is to accept everything in the Government's amendment. It states:

"chosen by a secret ballot of tenants, and such ballot to include the option of the local authority, if the authority so desires."

Some authorities are not interested in receiving more houses. I am the last person in the world to force more housing on to local authorities. Consequently, I do not understand why the hon. Member for The Wrekin should dismiss the amendments, especially as the tenor of his speech seemed to support them.

[Mr. Rooker]

It is important for us to pause at this point, because we have new material which was not mooted when the Bill first went through the House. However, the Minister gave me notice on the last day of July that some changes in this direction would be made in the other place. Local authorities have three main anxieties about this legislation, in the sense that they feel that they have already made plans and are in the process of taking over the ownership of the stock.

I must make it clear at the outset that the Labour party believes that the tenants should decide, not the local authority or the development corporation. We do not disagree with the reversal of the proposals in the new towns legislation. The Labour party will give local authority tenants the right to take over the management of their housing. It naturally follows that where a development corporation is being wound down, it makes no sense to transfer without question to the local authority when we would then give the tenants the chance to transfer out. The object is to give the choice at the time of the transfer. The tenants must decide.

That said, Milton Keynes and The Wrekin are important, because at present the local authority is managing the new town development corporation housing, but it is doing so with seconded staff.

Mr. Hawksley: The Telford development corporation is still in existence, and we hope that the transfer of the housing stock to another owner will take place before the demise of the corporation.

Mr. Rooker: I am sorry, I did not say that. The management of the development corporation stock is carried out by the council on an agency basis. It does not own it and it has not been transferred. The same applies to Milton Keynes.

The case that I want to highlight — I have given the Minister notice of this — is Peterborough. Peterborough is in a different position from The Wrekin and Milton Keynes. The difficulty with Peterborough is that it is not only managing the housing stock on behalf of the new town corporation, but it is doing so with its own staff. It has an agreement, voluntarily entered into, with the housing corporation that it will be taking over. I understand that there is a date, probably towards the end of next year, when the transition will be completed.

I have had some brief discussions with the director of housing in Peterborough, and I have a note saying that its management agency arrangement is not simply to manage dwellings, but to integrate the management practices and procedures and to assimilate all housing staff into a new city council housing department. The staff are not seconded; they are city council employees. There is a single housing management account for both authorities. I did not originally take that point on board. Therefore, the Peterborough situation is different from the others.

I make it clear that I have never been to Peterborough, but I have looked at its policy statement of objectives. There are many of them, but they contain the sentence:

"The council will not provide housing that councillors and officers would not happily live in themselves."

It is the first time that I have seen such a statement, and I should like to see that enshrined in every local authority's policy objectives. I might add that I would also include the architects and builders. Looking at its statement of objectives and the way that it operates, I do not think that Peterborough would give us cause for concern on this matter.

Nevertheless, the tenants should decide, as I have told the director of housing at Peterborough. The tenants must be asked where they want to go at the time of the changeover. The fact is that Peterborough is different. I ask the Minister to address his mind to that, so that the new town development corporation there does not feel under any obligation, as a result of the changes in the Bill, to tear up its voluntary agreements and go to the private sector or somewhere else because it is not interested in the local authority. If ever there was a case for accepting amendment (c) to give the local authority a chance to put its case to the tenants, it has to be Peterborough simply because of its interaction with staff and the accounts.

I stand to be corrected on the matter of the Telford development corporation — its Member of Parliament will clearly know more than I do — but I have read somewhere that management practices are carried out on an agency basis. If that is wrong, I withdraw it completely. I confess straight away that I have not been briefed by The Wrekin.

However, what I do have — not from The Wrekin but from a bundle of papers that must have been sent from the other place — is the result of a MORI poll to which the hon. Member for The Wrekin did not refer. I am as sceptical as anybody else about opinion polls, but this relates specifically to the matter that we are discussing and to housing. Therefore, some points must be put on record.

Two polls were conducted by MORI in July and August 1986 using a random sample of 1,109 council tenants and a random sample of 309 development corporation tenants. They were asked what they felt about their housing. In an independent poll of the new town tenants of Telford, 65 per cent. said that they would prefer their homes to be taken over by the council as part of a planned wind-up of the new town corporation. The second most popular choice was a housing association, which was favoured by 10 per cent. If those 10 per cent. want a housing association, that should be an option. They do not have to be dealt with in one block, as the hon. Gentleman said. Fourteen per cent. were unable to give an answer.

If that is a proper poll, conducted by a professional polling organisation, one cannot ignore the fact that 65 per cent. is a substantial vote in favour of the local authority, although, in the final analysis, it should be put to the test by a vote of everybody.

MORI also commissioned a poll of existing Wrekin council tenants. That showed that 71 per cent. thought the council did its best with the money available — more than in other parts of the country where MORI surveys have been conducted—for example, Harlow 60 per cent. and Birmingham 47 per cent. The majority of tenants were satisfied with the council's repairs and maintenance services. That shows a relatively high degree of satisfaction. However, that does not mean that I would propose treating the tenants of the new town like chattels and dumping them on the local authority without giving them a say. That would be unacceptable and not consistent with Labour party policy. It is not what we are proposing here tonight. We are proposing that there should be genuine consultation and that the local authorities should not be squeezed out.

Central Lancashire is different. There the local authority did not want to know, and that is fine. That gave the Government another way of looking at disposals. They had to because the local authority did not want to know. Local authorities may or may not be the best landlords for particular groups of new town tenants, but it should be for the tenants to decide. It would be wrong if, as a result of the amendments, the local authority was deliberately excluded from the choice. I have criticised large-scale public landlordism as much as anybody else, and I shall continue to do so because of the bureaucracy and remoteness that brings about. At the same time, as the tenants foot the bill through their rents, they should make the decision. The Government should bear in mind, because it is not clear from the amendments, first, today's debate — the hon. Member for The Wrekin has made similar points to my own and those of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey — and, secondly, that perhaps the other place should have a chance to look at the matter again. This is a probing amendment but we wish to hear something positive from the Minister about the tenants having a choice and some say in the disposal and the ownership of their homes.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I shall be brief because I shall raise the matter tomorrow on the Adjournment.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) mentioned MORI opinion polls, and I note what he said about the position of my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley). We have had the same sort of nonsense in Basildon. The hon. Gentleman failed to mention the sums that are spent on conducting these polls and all the brainwashing in the build-up before them. Until last Thursday what was happening in Basildon was disgraceful. Last Thursday, Basildon became a hung council, so the chairman now has a casting vote. Both the Minister and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State have visited Basildon during the past year, and they will note with interest that the present chairman was the chairman of the housing committee when they visited Basildon.

We have 16,000 new town commission properties which are under discussion. It was disgraceful how, until last Thursday, the local authority tried to frighten elderly people, for example, by saying that if the properties were handed over to a housing association, the housing association would not be prepared to repair them.

None of us should be concerned about the political posturing of the local authority. As the Member of Parliament for Basildon, in view of our many problems, I am concerned about who will best manage our public sector property.

Mr. John Patten: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) and would add only that we must put the tenants' voice foremost. I entirely deplore the goings-on inside Basildon council and the attempts needlessly to frighten public sector housing tenants about their prospects. To say that X or Y would lead to repairs not being done is absurd, damaging and foolish. I condemn that utterly and hope that the council, under its new hung leadership — I do not approve of hung councils, but one changes one's mind from time to time — will have more common sense and that the people of Basildon will get what they want.

I greatly appreciated the welcome given by my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) to our amendment, and I thank him for it. He asked some specific questions and I shall try to answer them as best I can. Consultation will take place as soon as the responsible Minister has considered the form of the alternative solutions being worked out and has taken the decisions. I must reveal to the House that after recent ministerial changes the responsible Minister is me. I intend to write myself a short, sharp minute immediately I leave the Chamber, instructing myself to get on with the job of coming up with the alternatives as quickly as possible so that consultations can take place and uncertainty can be cleared up as quickly as possible.

How the questions are to be worded and who decides is something on which the Department is working. We shall work on the wording and agree the form before consultation takes place. I assure my hon. Friend that I take to heart his points about all sides of the case being made. It is critical that all sides have their voice heard, including the local authority. However, we hope that it will not exceed its normal activity in campaigning with the use of ratepayers' money. I have always thought of The Wrekin as rather a peaceful sort of place and the idea of its being stalked by Militants is a new and terrifying thought. I must tell Wrekin council that, where party politics are heavily subsidised by ratepayers, things go wrong. That happened in Thamesmead where political campaigning rebounded. People listened carefully to what was said on all sides, made up their minds and voted for the housing trust solution.

Amendment No. 50 introduces a new section into the New Towns Act 1981 and makes some repeals in that Act. It clarifies the position on the transfer of new town dwellings to bodies other than local authorities. On 25 March 1986 my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, in a written answer to my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin, announced that the Government were prepared to consider proposals from the new town corporations for the transfer of that housing to bodies other than local authorities. We wish to ensure that there is a choice between a local authority and a non-local authority for the remaining new town housing and that that choice is not restricted by any provisions in the legislation concerning transfer to local authorities. The amendments prevent any such restriction and leave the new town bodies free to consider the disposal of new town dwellings to any person. That does not rule out the mixed solutions to which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) referred. When one is dealing with 10,000 homes in which more than 20,000 people may be living, it is absurd to suggest that one blanket solution is right.

Some play was made by the Opposition in another place over the use of the word "person". It is being used in the technical, legal sense to mean an individual or a body of persons. I stress that we have not ruled out any particular form of non-part III arrangements for new town housing, such as the transfer to a housing association, or further part III schemes.

The four amendments to amendment No. 50 are in the names of the hon. Members for Perry Barr, for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and for Norwood (Mr. Fraser). I cannot commend them to the House but not merely because they are technically imperfect, which is always the problem with drafting amendments. The main objection is that they persist with a lopsided approach to the issue. Having heard hon. Members' speeches, I am sure that that was not the intent of the amendments.

The amendments as drafted impose a statutory requirement for consultation in general or ballots in particular in cases where the proposal is the transfer of new town houses to a non-council owner. They do not make a comparable provision for cases where the proposal is to transfer housing to the council — [Interruption.] I apologise if I am wrong, and I am sure that that is not the intention.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Clearly the intention of my amendment and, I think, of the amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) is that all options should be put by the present landlords to public sector and other tenants, unrestricted in number. Therefore, the conduct of the consultation is in the hands, not of the local authority or anybody in the private sector, but of the present landlords. That is both express and implicit.

Mr. Patten: There is all-party agreement, and I apologise if I have misunderstood the amendments.

Mr. Rooker: I am sorry if there has been a misunderstanding. Lords amendment No. 50 refers to the disposal of dwellings to "any person". "Any person" can mean the local authority. The amendment seeks to insert "subject to the agreement of a majority of the tenants being obtained."

I would not be in favour of the matter going to the local authority unless the majority of tenants wanted that. That is clear. The amendment is not intended to be one sided.

Mr. Patten: Because of the use of the word "person", I may have misunderstood the purpose of both amendments and their drafting. The use of the word gave rise to much debate in the other place. I have already apologised for that, but none the less the amendments are technically imperfect and cannot be accepted. If we all agree that freedom of choice for tenants is to be our motif, then for the moment amendment No. 50, which introduces a new section into the New Towns Act 1981, does exactly that.

Mr. Hawksley: The confusion may arise because we do not know whether the Government take the view that the tenant's view should be binding. That is the question that arises.

Mr. Patten: We certainly take the view that we must consult fully with the tenants. Unless a situation arises in which there are a number of potential choices and tenants go off in relatively small groups in different directions, I cannot imagine that we will do anything other than accept the overall view.

I must refer again to the MORI opinion poll. I am sure it was properly taken because MORI is a reputable polling organisation. However, it was taken only on the basis of information that was available earlier this year when tenants did not have a proper set of alternatives in front of them. When the alternatives are properly put and the arguments properly advanced, I am willing to bet that we will find that tenants may well take a different view. On the other hand, they may not, because it may well be that in a new town area people are fond of the local authority form of management and may wish to stay with it. That is a choice that they can make.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr kindly gave me notice yesterday of the issue he wished to raise about Peterborough. If the new town housing were to be transferred to owners other than the council, I recognise that that might cause problems, especially for the staff. Some council staff could be made redundant and that would be a serious prospect for them. However, there are likely to be other opportunities for such staff with the new owners of the housing. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment said in a written answer in March, the views of staff now managing new town housing will be taken into account before final decisions are reached on the future of the housing. That applies not just to Peterborough but to all other new towns.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr was right to raise the matter of agency agreements. It is an important issue and the terms of the agreement for the two councils which manage new towns housing, at Peterborough and Milton Keynes, will have to be reviewed most carefully.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister is quite right to say that amendment No. 50 commands widespread support in the House. I think he used the phrase that it leaves the choice to the tenants. I should like him to think about a future procedure which will allow him to use the authority that he has under the new towns legislation and elsewhere for a consultation process to include all the elements that have been voiced in the debate. I think that if it is correctly understood, that would have the consensus of the relative authorities. There might have been a misunderstanding because there was never any intention to create a lopsided bias. If tenants are to have a proper chance to exercise freedom of choice between future options for their landlords, they will benefit from a consultation process along the lines of the amendments proposed.

Question, That the amendment to the Lords amendment be made, put and negatived.

Lords amendments Nos. 51 and 52 agreed to.

New Clause

DETERMINATION OF PRICE FOR LEASEHOLD ENFRANCHISEMENT

Lords amendment: No. 53, insert the following new clause—

".—(1) In section 9(1A) of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 (determination of price payable for enfranchisement of higher value houses), in paragraph (a) assumptions that vendor is selling subject to existing tenancy) after "no right to acquire the freehold" insert "or an extended lease and, where the tenancy has been extended under this Part of this Act, that the tenancy will terminate on the original term date.".

(2) In section 23(5) of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 (provisions as to tenancy granted in satisfaction of tenant's rights under Part I), in paragraph (b) (provisions which apply as if the tenancy were granted by way of extension) at the beginning insert "section 9(1) and (1A) above,".

(3) The above amendments apply where the tenant's notice under section 8 of the Leasehold Reform act 1967 (notice of desire to have the freehold) was given after the passing of this Act, notwithstanding that it was given before the commencement of this section, unless the price has by commencement been determined by agreement or otherwise."

Read a Second time.

Mr. John Patten: I beg to move, as an amendment to Lords amendment No. 53, amendment (a), leave out subsection (3) and insert—

'(3) The above amendments do not apply—

(a) where the price for enfranchisement has been determined, by agreement or otherwise, before the commencement of this section; or

(b) where the notice under section 8 of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 (notice of desire to have the freehold) was given before the passing of this Act; or

(c) where notice under section 14 of that Act (notice of desire to have extended lease) was given before 5th March 1986.'.

This amendment fulfills the undertaking we gave that the Government would consider further the cut-off date after which the new valuation assumptions should apply to the enfranchisement of houses in the higher value bracket. The new clause was introduced into the Bill by my noble Friend Lord Coleraine and I am grateful to my noble Friend for his interest in the issue and for the advice that he has given me. The amendment provides that extension leases obtained by such leaseholders should be disregarded for the purposes of valuation under the Leasehold Reform Act 1967. This dealt with the consequences of the Hickman case, which revealed that long leaseholders in the higher rateable value bracket could obtain significantly advantageous terms for enfranchisement if they first obtained an extension lease. At the time of the Housing and Building Control Bill a couple of years ago it was said that if a case was brought before the courts and the outcome revealed that there was a problem we would consider amending legislation. The amendment of the noble Lord Coleraine gives us that opportunity.

Much anxiety was expressed in the Lords about how to deal with transition cases. We acknowledge that leaseholders whose cases are far advanced ought not to be deprived of the benefit of the Hickman terms. In that context we moved an amendment to subsection (3) at Third Reading in another place which excluded any case where the application for enfranchisement was made after Royal Assent. A handful of leaseholders had applied to extend their leases in the expectation of being able to benefit from the Hickman terms and in advance of the ruling in the Court of Appeal. At least two of these cases are in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) who is in the Chamber. I pay tribute to his efforts on behalf of his constituents to ensure that such leaseholders are not disadvantaged. I know that our present amendment will deal with such cases by excluding cases from the new valuation terms if the leaseholder applied for an extension as a preliminary to enfranchisement on or before the date of the Court of Appeal ruling.

Amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 53 deals adequately with the problems presented by the Hickman case and I commend this approach to the House.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister will know that his colleagues in the other place were pressed by my noble Friend Lord Ezra, who sought a later cut-off date. On behalf of my noble Friend, I am grateful to the Government for this amendment because it fulfills the undertaking that was given in the other place. Some people, including my noble Friend Lord Ezra, think that it would have been possible for the date not to be 5 March 1986 but the date of the passing of the Act. It would appear that that view is tenable and proper. It was an alternative, but the Government have not accepted it. With the reservation that we would have preferred the date to be in a few days' time rather than a few weeks ago we welcome the amendment and the willingness of the Government to move in our direction.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I thank my hon. Friend for moving amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 53, introduced in the other place by Lord Coleraine. It was detected that in its original form the amendment would have retrospective effect. That fact was brought to my attention and it was also raised by a number of eloquent speakers in the other place, who made a convincing case for an amendment to the third subsection of the original amendment. I pay tribute to Lord Skelmersdale and Baroness Hooper, who gave this matter a great deal of their personal attention. They came forward with what is a satisfactory solution for the time being. I am most grateful to them for their work on this rather recondite and certainly difficult issue.

Justice is now being done for people who were being frustrated by long delays in the process of negotiations in pursuit of their statutory rights, which were confirmed by the Hickman judgment. Although my right hon. and hon. Friends have decided that they want to change the basis of the law and accept Lord Coleraine's amendment in principle, there is no doubt that my constituents and several others in similar circumstances were perfectly within the terms of the statute when they initiated their negotiations.

This incident touches on a matter which is fortunately of only limited application in practice, but it raises questions about valuation in the wider context of the purchase of property under the legal provisions enabling leasehold enfranchisement. Here, a means of dealing with a handful of hard cases which would have been created by the original amendment has been found. I welcome amendment (a) and hope that it will be accepted.

However, there are important issues in connection with valuation still remaining to be clarified, to which the House would have to return. I refer to the valuation of mansion blocks and substantial conversions. Amendment (a) also leaves the matter open with regard to the present state of the law affecting the anomalous status of holders of long leases in the highest rateable value properties, many of which are to be found in Kensington.

I hope that my noble Friends and my right hon. and hon. Friends will direct their minds to rectifying the quite unfair discrimination which still prevents a significant number of people from enjoying the benefits of home ownership for no clearly discernible reason. I hope that I shall have other opportunities to raise this matter in the coming Session.

8.45 pm

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): I welcome Lords amendment No. 53 and the Government's amendment (a).

In 1967, when some of us were addressing this problem elsewhere, we felt that the Leasehold Reform Act 1967, while giving a right, left something to be desired in terms of establishing a price. It was firm and clear in one virtue but left ground for disputation in an important part of the transaction—how much should be paid.

[Mr. John Mark Taylor]

We do well in the new clause to return to the problems and considerations of long leaseholders. Most people agree that we should, whenever possible, facilitate the enfranchisement of long leaseholders of dwelling houses and enable them to become freeholders. Consideration for long leaseholders of flats is long overdue. We have the Nugee report, and I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to proceed with it. He knows that there can be oppression and unfairness when responsibility for management services and the ownership of the freehold reversion are in the same hands and out of reach of leaseholders. I am sure that that will be his advice.

I urge the Government to deal with those problems and hope that, as far as possible, they will feel able to implement the Nugee recommendations. Many of my constituents in Solihull own long leases on flats and would like the Government to consider these matters soon and sympathetically.

Mr. John Fraser: We welcome Government amendment (a), which removes an undesirable aspect of retrospection from Lord Coleraine's amendment. Like many other people — but we did it first — we will be pressing for leasehold enfranchisement for flats in the next Session of Parliament.

Mr. John Patten: I wonder whether there will be opportunities in the next Session for these matters to be raised. We will have to wait to see what is in the Queen's Speech.

My hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) is quite right to press me about the importance of doing something about Nugee, which received an all-party welcome in the House. We are intent on doing something about it as soon as possible. We look forward to my hon. Friend's advice. I know that, as my hon. Friend is a lawyer and an expert in local government as well as national government affairs, we shall benefit from his interest, which goes back to 1967. I welcome his support for amendment (a), just as I welcome the generalised support which it received from the hon. Members for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) and for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

I am sorry that we cannot be as accommodating of Lord Ezra as we would have liked. It is reasonable that leaseholders who sought to extend their leases many months ago as a prelude to enfranchisement, but who have been unable to complete negotiations, should have the benefit of the Hickman valuation terms. It would not be fair to freeholders, however, if leaseholders who submitted section 14 notices comparatively recently, following the considerable publicity that attended the Court of Appeal judgment on 4 March, should be able to benefit from the anomaly in the Leasehold Reform Act 1967.

Nevertheless, nobody could be more right than my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) when he said that this is a recondite subject. I have had to go up a fairly steep learning curve on this subject and I regard recondite as an understatement. When and if a Government Bill is brought forward, as we pledged, on the issues raised by Nugee, I do not doubt that my recondite studies will multiply through the night.

SIMPLIFIED PLANNING ZONES IN ENGLAND AND WALES

Lords amendment: No. 60, in page 27, line 25, leave out from "scheme" to end of line 35.

Mr. Tracey: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 61 to 71, 71A, 72 to 77, 213 and 214.

Mr. Tracey: These amendments are designed to clarify certain points in the drafting of the simplified planning zone provisions of the Bill. Amendments Nos. 63, 66 to 69, 71A and 72 to 77 are more substantive than the others in the group.

An amendment to new section 24B(6) of the Town and Country Planning Act, inserted by clause 13, was agreed by the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) was of great assistance to the Government when simplified zones were discussed in Committee. He raised the point about any unfinished development being completed, and this amendment requires that any unfinished development should be completed to the local planning authority's satisfaction within 12 months of the SPZ scheme expiring. While we accept that some arrangements are required to reduce the risk that partially completed developments might be left for several years and that extant planning permission might be prone to exploitation, we have looked at the possibility of something more flexible than a fixed period for completion and something which bites on specific developments rather than provision that applies in a blanket fashion.

These amendments, which also apply to Scotland, therefore propose that permissions given by SPZ schemes should be brought into line with ordinary planning permissions. Under section 44 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, a local planning authority which is of the opinion that a development that has begun will not be completed within a reasonable period may serve a completion notice specifying a period of not less than 12 months at the end of which the permission will cease to have effect if the development is not completed.

The period of completion will be flexible to fit each case as appropriate, thus allowing the developer a reasonable period in which to complete his project. These are more practical and flexible arrangements than those in the Bill as it stands.

Amendments Nos. 60 to 62 and 70 to 71 ensure that an SPZ scheme cannot be used to impose greater planning restrictions on an area than would normally apply — in particular, for example, nullifying freedoms given by the general development and use classes orders. These amendments ensure also that, conversely, any freedoms given by an SPZ scheme permission cannot be negated by the terms of any other type of planning permission.

Amendments Nos. 64 and 65 and 72 and 73 clarify the provisions for the coming into effect of alterations to an existing SPZ scheme. They make it clear that an alteration that withdraws or relaxes conditions or extends the permissions given by an SPZ scheme will take effect immediately if adopted by the local planning authority. However, an alteration that takes away permissions or imposes more restrictive conditions will not come into effect for 12 months.

Amendment No. 61 removes a superfluous reference in clause 13 to national parks authorities which will have no powers in relation to SPZs, and amendments Nos. 213 and 214 correct errors in the numbering of consequential provisions.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister, who said that the amendments were designed to clarify the position of simplified planning zones. He will recall that on Second Reading I was concerned about the way in which the Bill was originally drafted in that it seemed to me to leave a giant hole into which planning development without adequate controls could be placed. While the amendments inserted by the Government and the other place go some way towards allaying fears, I am not completely satisfied that they go all that far. However, I thank the Government and the Opposition for agreeing to the changes that have been made.

"consent, agreement or approval of the local planning authority".

Far from the clarification to which my hon. Friend referred, those words cause considerable unrest in Dorset and in my constituency and others like it. Notwithstanding the Bill, as amended, there seems to be some uncertainty about precisely what the Government are trying to do. There are to be simplified planning zones, but there now seems to be a clear conflict between this part of the Bill and current planning circulars which continue to push development where it is not needed — into the prosperous areas of the country — thus depriving rundown areas of the development and investment funds that they so desperately need.

All hon. Members are anxious that there should be more development in the inner cities, and we hope that the simplified planning zones will help to bring that about. However, I do not believe that they will have more than a slightly cosmetic impact on the problem unless and until the Government change their attitudes to planning. The current circulars are pushing development into areas where it is not needed — into prosperous areas — and simultaneously they are forcing environmentally unwanted housing and shopping developments into those prosperous areas where there is neither the need for the investment nor the desire for the development.

The Bill, as amended, should help to reduce the north-south disparity, but the planning laws and circulars as they now stand do not achieve that objective. Many of my constituents are perfectly willing to accept a slower rise in living standards if the environment in which they live can be protected.

In the last few days a controversial and, to me, welcome speech was made by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales about housing and planning policies. Lord Northfield — a Labour peer, notwithstanding the fact that he is chairman of a company called Consortium Developments — has been extremely rude about the Prince of Wales' speech. He said that His Royal Highness had been

"hijacked by the Loony Green Brigade."

If membership of the "Loony Green Brigade" is open to anyone who values the retention of the green fields of England above the profits of members of the House Builders Federation, I should not only be willing to apply for membership of the brigade but I might even be willing to allow my name to go forward to serve as an officer in the brigade.

There is that discrepancy between the current circulars and the object of this part of the Bill. The Government are being urged by not only Government opponents but by Government supporters seriously to look at the circulars that are being sent to local authorities so that the words of amendment No. 62—can mean something in practice. At the moment they are virtually meaningless in my constituency. If the local planning authority should decide that it does not wish developments to take place because they are unpopular and not needed, there have been far too many occasions in the last few years when the Department of the Environment has overturned its planning refusals.

"requiring the consent, agreement or approval of the local planning authority"—

I look forward to the Minister's success in clarifying the amendments. I hope that he will be bold and brave and that in due course he will take the next step and clarify the circulars so that planning law moves in the same direction as the Bill.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister go a little further to allay the fears expressed in another place where the Opposition pushed an amendment on this matter to a Division?

Great anxiety was expressed by their Lordships and on behalf of the Council for the Protection of Rural England about issues that were raised in Committee in this House concerning the control of development in a simplified planning zone scheme which is begun, in effect, in name only. Examples were given of developers coming on site in a simplified planning zone, which will not have as many planning restraints as other areas, digging a trench, counting that as the beginning of a development and being able to benefit from the less restrictive planning regime, even though it will have ended before the development is completed.

Amendment No. 63 says:

"The provisions of section 44(2) to (6) of this Act . . . apply to planning permission under a simplified planning zone scheme".

Those provisions provide for the termination of planning permission if the completion of development is unreasonably delayed, but I hope that the Minister will go further and say that he and his colleagues will not condone any abuse of the advantages of simplified planning zones and that there will be monitoring to ensure that there is no abuse.

Developers in simplified planning zones must develop as the Act intends and not abuse their advantages and gain from increased land values. Throughout the south-east there has been a massive escalation in land values and we must provide all possible protection against abuse. I hope that the Minister will make it clear that his Department will not condone abuse but will help local authorities to prevent any abuse.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): Like other hon. Members, I regard simplified planning zones as an exciting concept, though it is appropriate for some urban areas and not for others, most of which are set out as exceptions in new section 24C. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), I do not believe that the exceptions go far enough, because agricultural land that is not in a green belt or conservation area would not be excepted, as I should wish.

The amendments are important in planning terms. Amendment No. 62, dealing with conditions and limitations on planning permission, amendment No. 65, which excludes some land from simplified planning zones, and several others are an important step in distinguishing between one part of our environmental heritage and the rest of it. They say that we must have extremely fine equipment to distinguish between the developments that will be allowed in our inner cities and in other areas. That is an important principle which will have to be applied much more widely.

As the Minister knows, there is great worry about overdevelopment in the south of England and some anxiety that the restriction on simplified planning zones is insufficient. My hon. Friend confirmed last week that the Government are not trying to drive forward overdevelopment in the south. I judge the amendments by the extent to which they reflect the guidelines set out by my hon. Friend in his speech last week, and I ask him whether the rules for planning that we have will cater for simplified planning zones and bring them satisfactorily within the rules.

The circular, "Land For Housing", which my hon. Friend the Minister will know well, does not mention SPZs, and one would not expect it to do so, but it makes some distinctions between different types of land. I refer to the circular because it is the main instrument which officials in county councils use as their guidelines for the type of development that they will seek and that they expect the Government will allow. The circular is being used, and I and my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch and many others divine it to be the root cause of the overdevelopment that we are experiencing. I believe that the circular is out of date and that it will have to be amended to cater for SPZs.

Secondly, the circular will have to do more to comply with the spirit of the amendments, which I am delighted to see before the House. We must have planning rules which distinguish much more finely in the future than in the past between different types of land—urban land and rural land—and can be applied firmly to back up the distinctions. Those rules must ensure that we do not suffer from the overdevelopment that is now going on in the south of England. In common with others, I look forward to what my hon. Friend the Minister has to say in reply.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I do not wish to detain the House unduly, because in a real sense, as my hon. Friend the Minister was kind enough to acknowledge, I was the instigator of the amendments before us when the Bill was being considered in Committee. I understand fully the remarks of my hon. Friends the Members for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) and for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker). My reasoning is that the Government's intention is to try to circumvent to an intelligent and practical degree the necessary long-windedness of planning applications to encourage development, especially in some derelict urban areas. I do not think it is the intention to use the device of simplified planning zones to encourage development in the green field sites, which my hon. Friends have explained so eloquently is a cause of their concern.

If we had tried to define an urban area in Committee, we would have found it difficult to differentiate between that and what could be conceived as a rural area. There are certainly some rural derelict areas where the SPZ concept might be as favourably imposed as in urban areas. Therefore, I have to return to what I believe to be a possible loophole in the provision that we are considering, which I warmly welcome and recommend. Under the 1968 legislation a time limit was imposed on any planning permissions granted by local planning authorities under the town and country planning legislation.

The purpose of the SPZ concept, however, was to circumvent planning requirements in certain areas for a specified period. It was possible that a potential developer might come along with no intention of developing, but seeing an opportunity to obtain planning permission in a different way and so not be held to a time limit in which to execute the permission. As I understood the Bill as it was conceived, it provided that there was no time limit once planning permission was deemed to have been granted under the SPZ concept, and I moved amendments in Committee which were favourably received by my hon. Friend the Minister. In that context, I believe that the Minister and the Government have things exactly right.

Amendment No. 63 meets the wishes, or allays the anxieties, that I have expressed. I can only say to my hon. Friends the Members for Christchurch and for Dorset, North that I do not believe that their suspicions or worries will be in any way realised when the Bill becomes an Act.

Mr. Adley: We all listen with great respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman), because there can be few hon. Members who know more about these matters than he. However, I would like to give him one illustration of the reasons for concern. Clause 24C (d) refers to "land identified in the development plan for the district as part of the green belt"

There are always arguments between developers and local authorities about what is or is not green belt and whether or not a local authority, having identified an area as green belt before it has been enshrined in statute, is entitled to say that that is green belt as identified in this particular subsection.

I make that point, because my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) and I are concerned about this matter. We are worried that in future local authorities might get ideas above their station—if I may put it that way—about an area that they want to see developed around some of the——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is making an intervention, not a speech.

Mr. Adley: I would like my hon. Friend to comment on that last point.

Mr. Chapman: I do not know the geography or environment of my hon. Friend's constituency in the way that I can claim to know my own. There are different interpretations of green belt. I would say that there is no such thing as established green belt around my hon. Friend's constituency. It is not established green belt as laid down by statute in the same way as the metropolitan green belt is laid down in statute.

The Bill, if enacted,—and I hope that it will be—will in no way prejudice my hon. Friend from making representations to the Minister, or, through his local planning authority, to bring to this House what he believes to be the dispute about the way that the Act is working. I say that with sincerity and a certain amount of logic. In matters relating to town and country planning the House cannot dot every "i" and cross every "t". It is a matter of the way in which planning law is interpreted, not least by local planning authorities. If my hon. Friend felt that this whole issue was being abused by the Government, or by a future Government, he would be in the vanguard and would have a great deal of sympathy and support from hon. Members on both sides of the House.

I apologise for intervening at such length. I had intended that my remarks should be much shorter. As Back Benchers, we tend to complain when we think that the Government are getting it wrong. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister for taking heed of what was said in Committee. As far as I can judge the issue—and I cannot state that I am right—he has got it just right and that should allay the fears that hon. Members on both sides expressed in Committee.

Mr. Tracey: I thought once or twice this evening that we were having a general planning and housing debate. There is nothing wrong with that in other circumstances. Indeed, my hon. Friends the Members for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) and I had a similar debate about 10 days ago; it was a fine debate. However, we are discussing simplified planning zones and the Lords amendment to the Bill.

Before I deal with what has been said by my hon. Friends the Members for Christchurch and for Dorset, North, I want to deal with the points raised by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who was concerned about the monitoring of the way in which the scheme was working out. In the first place, it will be for the local planning authority to monitor any of the abuses to which he rightly drew our attention by way of example. It will then be for the local planning authority to make any completion notice which it thinks fit and to submit it to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Every care will be taken when considering such a completion notice. My right hon. Friend will confirm such a notice when he believes that it is right and proper to do so to prevent the kind of abuse that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey mentioned.

The remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) in Standing Committee were useful and informative. My hon. Friend the Minister of State and I are grateful to him for paying us compliments. He said that we have moved in the right direction and have got it right. It is always nice for Ministers to be told that they have got something right.

My hon. Friends the Members for Christchurch and for Dorset, North pointed to the best possible use of simplified planning zones in the more industrial areas rather than green fields. I accept what they said. Indeed, similar proposals were put to us several times during the passage of the Bill, both in this House and in another place. I understand their deeply held concern that simplified planning zones should not be set up in areas where no development stimulus is needed or wanted. The Government recognised that concern by accepting an amendment proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet to prevent simplified planning zones from being set up in truly defined sensitive areas such as national parks, green belts, conservation areas, sites of special scientific interest and areas of outstanding natural beauty. The Minister of State and I were happy to agree with the amendment.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have power to make an order preventing simplified planning zones from being set up where they are obviously not suitable. He will be prepared to use that power where necessary. I make that clear to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North.

It would be too restrictive for the Bill to provide that SPZs may never be set up outside a closely defined industrial area. There may be occasions on which an SPZ scheme providing, perhaps, for mixed development would be appropriate. I hope that my hon. Friends will accept that the procedures for adopting SPZs are thorough and will ensure that attention is drawn to any unsuitable proposals which can be modified or, if necessary, stopped. That is certainly the intention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. Adley: I am grateful for the remarks of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. It is important that the Secretary of State should have these powers and be prepared to use them. There is a town not a thousand miles from the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North where there seems to be an inordinate number of developers, estate agents and similar people on the local authority. We are concerned about such areas.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES AUTHORITIES

Lords amendment. No. 78, in page 34, line 36, at end insert—

"(3) For the purposes of this section any land to which this subsection applies but which is not operational land of statutory undertakers authorised to carry on a harbour undertaking shall be treated as if it were such operational land.

(4) Subsection (3) above applies—

(a) to a wharf; and

(b) to harbour land,

as defined in the Harbours Act 1964.

(5) Any question whether subsection (3) above applies to land shall be determined by the Secretary of State and the Minister who is the appropriate Minister in relation to operational land of statutory undertakers who are authorised to carry on harbour undertakings."

Mr. Tracey: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendments Nos. 79 to 133 and 215 to 220.

9.30 pm

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): Members of the Committee will recall that I moved some amendments in Committee to which the Minister gave a favourable response. On Report, he gave an undertaking that amendments reflecting the comments that had been made in Committee would be moved in the other place.

I commend and thank my hon. Friend the Minister for the diligent way in which he dealt with the concerns expressed in Committee on behalf of people who would have been involved in the hazardous substances arrangements. The amendments that have been moved and that I hope will be accepted satisfy the anxieties that were expressed. They will enable the companies involved to proceed much more satisfactorily, and I believe that the Bill will be greatly improved as a result of the amendments.

Mr. Tracey: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) for the way in which he pursued the matter in Committee. Since then we have discussed it in detail with the Confederation of British Industry, the local authority associations, the Royal Town Planning Institute, and the British Ports Association. We arrived at what I believe is an acceptable solution.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 79 to 134 agreed to.

Clause 28

LISTED BUILDINGS AND CONSERVATION AREAS

Lords amendment: No. 135, in page 74, line 16, at end insert—

"(aa) the scope of the exception for urgent works to a listed building;"

Mr. Tracey: I beg to move, that this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendments Nos. 137, 145, 147 to 149, 232, 234 to 240, 243 and 244.

Mr. Tracey: This group of amendments does not need much explanation. Amendments Nos. 135, 137, 145 and 147 to 149 are simply additions or drafting amendments to the list of items in clauses 28 and 36, which are the subject of amendments to schedule 7, parts I and II.

Amendment No. 232 replaces the amendment tabled in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) with a revised version that keeps the good points of my hon. Friend's amendment but removes the parts that were unacceptable to us snd strengthens the subjection generally. There are some occasions when demolition is the only way of making a building safe quickly, and we considered that it was wrong to remove the defence given by section 55(6) entirely if demolition has taken place. We trust that the new wording will reduce the opportunities for abuse of the defence. Amendment No. 240 is a similar amendment to the Scottish provisions.

In addition, in England and Wales, through amendment No. 234, we have taken a power to require authorities to consider using their repairs powers before seeking a dangerous structures notice or order and we made it clear that such orders or notices do not override listed building control.

Amendment No. 238 and the consequential amendment No. 239 fulfil a promise given to the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission for England that there would be a statutory requirement to consult it before a direction is made leaving decisions on listed building consent cases to authorities to decide. Amendments 235, 236, 237 243, and 244 are technical amendments adding section numbers of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 and the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1972 to the lists of sections which may be applied to unlisted buildings in conservation areas.

Mr. Chapman: It would be ungenerous of me if I did not thank my hon. Friend the Minister once again for being sympathetic and for considering the criticisms I made of the Bill in Committee. He has examined those parts of what I said that he felt he could accept and those which, on balance, he felt he could not accept. It would be extremely pettifogging and carping of me to insist that my original amendments should be carried. My hon. Friend has got it right and it is purely a matter of detail if we disagree on the exact interpretation of some of the details.

Question put and agreed to.

New Clause

AREAS WHICH MAY BE DESIGNATED URBAN DEVELOPMENT AREAS

Lords amendment: No. 143, after clause 33 insert the following new clause—

" . In section 134 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 (power to designate urban development areas), omit subsection (2) (which restricts the power to land in metropolitan districts and certain land in or adjacent to inner London)."

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

I apologise for my debut being at the eleventh hour. However, as the House will know, last month I proposed a major new initiative to bring prosperity back to some of our northern cities by setting up four new urban development corporations. I do not want to debate that at length now because the House will be able to debate each proposal on the relevant order as it comes forward. I am sure that the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), whom I congratulate on his re-election to the shadow Cabinet and retention of his portfolio, will welcome this initiative, especially after what he said two weeks' ago at the conference of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities. He said:

"Blighted and derelict land has disfigured many urban centres for decades, prevented from development by cumbersome and often secretive planning and decision-making mechanisms."

I entirely agree.

The amendment was moved in another place as soon as the Government had decided to seek to set up four further urban development corporations. One of these is proposed for Teesside. Under the legislation as it now stands, an urban development corporation in England may be set up only in a metropolitan county or in inner London. An urban development corporation may be set up anywhere in Scotland or Wales.

Teesside is within the non-metropolitan county of Cleveland. The amendment removes the English restrictions so that an urban development corporation can be set up anywhere in the kingdom where it is justified. This would give England equality of treatment with Scotland and Wales. That was the Government's intention in the 1980 Act. The restriction for England was inserted when the legislation went through the House.

Although the scope of the amendment is narrow—whether I should be empowered to lay an order proposing the setting-up of an urban development corporation in a non-metropolitan area—whether there should be such a corporation will of course be for Parliament to decide. This is not the time or place to prejudge that question for any particular area. But I would not expect anyone to argue that the problems of Teesside are in any way less significant than those in metropolitan areas. It is clearly nonsense that this important means of tackling areas of major urban dereliction should not be available in Teesside. In due course I shall propose a Teesside UDC to the House, and the House will then have the opportunity to debate the principle.

Mr. Rooker: As the Secretary of State said, this is not an appropriate time or place for a debate on urban development corporations. They can be useful instruments, but they are not useful if their prime purpose is deliberately to bypass or ignore local authorities and the needs and wishes of the people. Our sincere wish and hope is that that will not happen. So far, there is no indication that it will, but we could not support the proposal if it did.

In certain areas, regeneration will not take place without a comprehensive strategy and a concentration of resources. It is ludicrous that, if an area falls outside a metropolitan area, based upon a map drawn years ago, it cannot benefit from a concentration of resources.

We are not interested in any diminution of democratic authority or control. In due course all the powers granted to UDCs will return to local authorities. We do not put a time limit or make a claim about that, but it will happen. It would be ludicrous to oppose the extension of this legislation, because of the identification of the tragic dereliction on Teesside. We shall have a wider debate on the issue at a more appropriate time. I do not enter a caveat on the proposal, nor do I welcome it. I just wanted to make a brief statement explaining that we understand the need to concentrate resources and to work out a comprehensive strategy.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I appreciate that the Government now recognise that the need for urban renewal and regeneration goes beyond the traditional confines of the inner cities. One of the most important statements by the Archbishop of Canterbury in his recent report was that the outer urban areas often experience greater deprivation than the inner urban areas. There are many such areas in this part of the country and elsewhere. Strategies for urban renewal and regeneration should apply anywhere.

I am the only hon. Member in the House at present who represents a constituency within one of the two existing urban development corporation areas. The history of the last five years shows that the UDCs bring both advantages and disadvantages. There is inadequate co-ordination in south London, and Southwark in particular. I hope that the experience of those five years will be learnt as the Secretary of State formulates his plans for the four new UDC areas. We shall have an opportunity to debate the urban development corporations. We look forward to that opportunity and welcome it.

Two principles are more strongly argued and upheld in the proposals than before. First, the new urban development corporations are to act in partnership with the local authorities as well as with the private sector to bring in additional money. So far the urban development corporations have often seemed to act over the head of, and not in partnership with, local authorities. Secondly, consultation with the people who live there should be started from the beginning. One problem with the London Docklands Development Corporation was that at the beginning there was an inadequate framework of consultation with local people to enable the existing communities to be reinforced, upheld, strengthened and supported. I hope that the proposals will change that, and that the Secretary of State will respond to the anxieties that have been born out of the experience of our two development corporations. A strategy is now needed to do much more for urban regeneration and renewal of our devastated economy.

9.45 pm

Mr. Robert B. Jones: I rise briefly to support the Government in this move. It has long been an anomaly that all areas needing urban regeneration were thought to be in the metropolitan counties or in London. Cleveland is certainly ripe for this initiative. I was once a parliamentary candidate in Cleveland and I have retained my affection and links with the area. I wish to place on record my tribute to the leader of the Conservatives on Stockton council, Councillor Laurie Wild, who has done much to campaign for this measure. I hope that when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State places the appropriate order before the House, new prosperity will come to that area.

Mr. Ridley: I wish to respond briefly to the points which have been made. I thank the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) for welcoming the proposal. It is a major proposal. It involves considerable expense, and so its importance must not be underestimated.

I wish to reply to the hon. Members for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) and for Southwark and Bermondsey who made almost the same points about the proposal. My reply is that there are representatives of local authorities on the London Docklands Development Corporation and on the Merseyside Development Corporation. That could be taken as a precedent, but local authority members should not dominate the board of any new urban development corporation. Every encouragement will be given to local authorities that wish to co-operate with a UDC. But, as the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said, some local authorities have appeared to try to frustrate this sort of development and in that case we shall push on. We are determined that nothing shall the stop the redevelopment of these areas. If a local authority wants to help, it will be very welcome, but if it does not the work must still be done.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey talks about the people. This amendment is about Teesside, and the area we have in mind does not have one inhabitant. It is completely derelict on both sides of the river. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West will know it well. If anybody argued that anyone should be stopped from developing that area, he would be off his head.

We really do mean business in establishing the development corporations and in putting money into them. We shall make a determined effort to bring back the sort of conditions under which people want to build houses, factories, shops, leisure centres—every sort of development—and to give every chance for economic recovery in those areas.

I confess to a slight prejudice in this matter, coming myself from the north-east. This is the only way, as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey acknowledges, to concentrate and co-ordinate the efforts of all Government and local government departments, with the necessary resources to achieve the rejuvenation that the House wants to see.

Question put and agreed to.

Schedule 8

LOCAL PLANS AND UNITARY DEVELOPMENT PLANS

Lords amendment: No. 245, in page 146, leave out lines 23 to 29 and insert—

"(5) A local planning authority may prepare a local plan for a part of their area (an "action area") which they have selected for the commencement during a prescribed period of comprehensive treatment, by development, redevelopment or improvement of the whole or part of the area selected, or partly by one method and partly by another; and a local plan prepared for such an action area shall indicate the nature of the treatment selected for the area."

Mr. Tracey: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 246, 261 to 263 and 265.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the effect of amendment No. 245 be to allow local authorities, not merely to produce plans for the whole of that authority—this was altered in recent legislation—but to allow them to proceed with parts of their authority in turn, if they are not ready or do not wish to provide plans for the whole area? There used to be area or district statutory plans. That was changed and the change affected London boroughs which had to make only a borough-wide local plan. Will they be able to return to having plans covering areas smaller than the whole borough or district as a result of the proposal? What effect will the amendment have on borough or district councils?

Mr. Tracey: This is a drafting amendment and proposes the substitution in new section 11(5) of the 1971 legislation of a revised text, dealing with local plans for action areas. That is more faithful to the present provisions of the 1971 legislation. I hope that that answers the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I hope that at some stage the Minister will elaborate on how the matter relates to other statutory planning functions of local authorities.

Mr. Tracey: I shall be happy to write to the hon. Gentleman to clarify any of those points.

Question put and agreed to.

Domestic Violence

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Ryder.]

9.58 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): In January 1986 the working party established by the Metropolitan police into domestic violence against women in their own homes reported to Scotland Yard. That working party, which had seven serving police officers headed by a chief inspector and three outside members, produced an illuminating, interesting and positive report. The report has not yet been published or implemented. I have received a copy of it, and with that in mind I have requested this debate. It reveals the staggering scale of the problem.

The report says that the statistics about the number of incidents of violence against women by their husbands or partners in their own homes in the metropolis are inadequate and inaccurate. It estimates that something like 28,000 calls a year about incidents of domestic violence are made to police stations in London. It records that those calls probably represent only a quarter to a third of the overall number of incidents that occur. That is because many women are understandably reluctant to call outside help, let alone police help, in such difficult and dangerous circumstances.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Ryder.]

Mr. Smith: Looking at the statistics in the report, we can only conclude that there must be something like 100,000 incidents of domestic violence in London each year. That is a staggering problem and the House and the Metropolitan police should be worried about it. A working party was established, it took a great deal of evidence from outside organisations, and it produced a remarkable report. I commend the Metropolitan police for having established that working party. I also commend the working party for producing a report couched in remarkably progressive language. It puts forward a series of sensible and important recommendations. However, that report has remained on desks in Scotland Yard and presumably in the Home Office—because, of course, the Home Secretary is the police authority for the metropolis—for the past 10 months. Why is it that with a problem of such importance and when so many women throughout London are at risk no action has been taken since January?

The report contains some urgent recommendations, many of which could have been implemented immediately. One must ask why the delay has occurred. Has the delay been at Scotland Yard or at the Home Office? Is Scotland Yard, as it has been quoted in some newspapers in the last few days as saying, waiting for some national policy directive from the Home Office? Has the delay occurred because no one has understood and appreciated the importance of the issue that is under discussion?

Can the Minister tell us exactly how the delay has occurred and whether it will be possible for the recommendations in the report to be implemented as rapidly as the Home Office and Scotland Yard between them can manage?

What needs to be done? First, attitudes need to change. The report is a damning indictment of the attitude of many police officers in the metropolis towards domestic violence. It is quite clear from passages in the report that many serving police officers see violence against a woman in her own home as less worthy of their attention and less important than, for example, violence on the street. That cannot be the case. Violence is violence whether it happens within the confines of one's own home or on the streets of London. The police response in each case must be one of concern for the victim and a desire to prevent any further occurrence of such violence.

The report contains some staggering comments and I shall read one or two of them because they are illuminating. The report says:

"What is of importance is the persistent trend to under-report to police coupled with the fact that many of those who had reported to police find them unhelpful."

It quotes an article which says:

"The Police emerged as the least helpful of all the main agencies to which women turned for help before going to the refuge . . . Except in cases of very severe injury, the helpfulness of the police reflected neither the severity of the injuries, nor the frequency with which the woman had been assaulted in the past."

Under the training section, the report says:

"Knowledge of the law and police procedure is somewhat vague as far as many District officers are concerned, to say nothing of the lack of empathy expressed towards victims of domestic violence during their encounters with the police."

Further on, the report says:

"There seems to be generally a sense of frustration when the Police are called to incidents of domestic violence, particularly if there has to be more than one call to the same home. There appears to be little understanding of the predicament of the woman living in violent or potentially violent situations."

There are many other examples of such criticism, but just one more, which is perhaps the most revealing paragraph in the report, will suffice. It says:

"On being questioned, many Police Officers felt that Domestic Violence should not be part of their work at all. Any situation of that kind was seen as being (generally) just a waste of time. (Another view of this kind of work was that it was no help whatsoever when applying for other posts or promotion)."

It is quite clear from the report, which, it should be remembered, has been prepared by the police, that police attitudes to domestic violence fall far short of the seriousness with which the problem ought to be addressed.

The first and major question that we have to ask the Home Office and Scotland Yard is, "Will you please ensure by all means possible that serving police officers throughout the force treat violence against women in their own home with the seriousness that it deserves?" Changing the attitudes that are revealed by the report is crucial. It is a task of the utmost priority for the Home Office.

Secondly, and allied to changing attitudes, there is the need to change the training programme and the procedures for new recruits and existing officers in the Metropolitan police. It is by training that the police can become able to deal sensitively and appropriately with such difficult and often delicate situations as arise when there is domestic violence.

The third aim should be to change the keeping of records. Throughout the report, there is criticism of how current record keeping practices are ignored and inadequate. There must be proper record keeping so that we can all know exactly the extent of the problem and the success or failure of the police in assisting the victims of domestic violence.

Fourthly, a simple proposal in the report reveals that, at the moment, police mileage allowance regulations forbid a police vehicle being used to transport a woman who has just been the victim of an assault in her home to a safe refuge. A police car in London cannot be used to take her to safety. Surely that is nonsense. The police could improve matters overnight by changing the regulations so that cars can be used for that purpose. The report says that that has already been done in Cleveland. That bit of good practice should be used here as of tomorrow. I hope that the Minister will be able to give a commitment to that effect.

Fifthly, we must ensure that police officers know about all the other referral agencies that are available to help victims of domestic violence. It is surely right and proper that the widest possible range of advice and counselling should be available in such difficult circumstances, and the police — because they are often the first agency to be called to the scene — must be able to refer to other suitable, proper and good agencies.

The final recommendation that I draw to the Home Secretary's attention is the recommendation that as third parties to a dispute the police should be more prepared to prosecute the violent man. The report quotes extensively from Canadian experience in Ontario where this has been attempted and been found to be very successful indeed. Frequently it is difficult for a woman in such circumstances to bring her own prosecution. Often there is a need to try to heal the relationship as well as to attempt to prevent any recurrence of the violence. In those circumstances it is surely helpful that any prosecution aimed at preventing a further occurrence should come not from the woman herself but from the police.

That is now possible under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. The police have the power to bring that sort of prosecution. Evidence from Canada suggests that it could be very successful in reducing the level of violence and in helping to resolve the problem when it occurs.

Mr. John Whitfield (Dewsbury): Except in the most extreme case, are not the matters to which the hon. Gentleman has referred in his excellent speech matters for the social services rather than the concern of our hard-pressed police forces?

Mr. Smith: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman fails to recognise the severity of the problem in many cases. He also fails to understand that in many of these instances the police are the first line of call because they are a 24-hour service, and very few other agencies are. Therefore, it is surely important for the police to have the knowledge of how to deal with these instances and occurrences.

What is more, I am sure the hon Gentleman would agree that when violence is occasioned, it is a crime. The police are supposed to fight crime as well as to deter it. Where violence occurs against a women in her home, it is still violence, just as it is if it occurs outside the home.

Of course, other agencies must be involved, and ultimately we are talking not just about police involvement, but about social services involvement, voluntary agency involvement and probably probation involvement. However, the police are part and parcel of that multi-agency approach which will be needed. Where violence is occasioned to a person, the police can and must be involved. Sadly, the hon. Gentleman failed to acknowledge that extremely important point.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Surely it is worth noting that especially in the last two or thee years the police have become involved in areas where hitherto they have not been involved — for example, on the rugby field. There was also a recent incident on the football field. Previously such violence went unnoticed, or at least it was not tackled by the police, yet increasingly they are now moving into such areas. If they can do that, surely they should move into the area that my hon. Friend is describing so well.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We cannot have one standard of law, justice and violence prevention for inside the home or on the football field and another for outside. This is something about which many women have been concerned for a long time. The traditional male attitude is that there is a privacy to the home and there are rights connected with marriage that somehow protect the man when being violent towards his wife or partner. That attitude must be changed. Violence towards one's partner is just as bad and reprehensible as violence to a stranger in the street.

The Ontario experience shows that when the police decide to prosecute it assists in reducing violence and preventing further cases of assault. The report recommends that a pilot project should be established in one London district. I hope that the Home Office and Scotland Yard will carefully consider the implementation of that recommendation as soon as possible.

I have drawn those six basic recommendations from the Metropolitan police's report. I cannot stress too stongly that this is the Metropolitan police's own report which was published in January 1986. I shall add three other recommendations to those of the Metropolitan police. First, there ought to be — certainly for London — a 24-hour telephone line made available for women. They should be able to phone in with any account of violence, rape or difficulty that they have experienced. That line should be specifically for women, and it should be handled by women at the other end of the line. That would increase dramatically women's confidence in reporting incidents of this kind to the police. That must be for the better.

Secondly, I hope that the Home Office will commit itself to increasing the proportion of women officers within the Metropolitan police force. At the moment, 10 per cent. of the Metropolitan police are women. Of 26 commanders, only two are women. The standing, culture and nature of the Metropolitan police would be greatly improved if there were more women officers. I hope that the Home Office has it in mind to increase the proportion of women who form part of the Metropolitan police.

Thirdly, a greater number of safe refuges is also needed for women who are subjected to violence. That involves money and resources. It means setting up refuges and ensuring that they are properly run and staffed and that space is made available in them for women who have been subjected to violence. I hope that the Government are committed to assisting that process.

This report has lain on the table for far too long. The problem is massive and urgent. Many women fear the threat of violence and they risk violence and assault within their homes. All of us ought to be concerned about preventing and deterring violence and we ought to try to assist in preventing it. The report offers a way of doing so. I hope that the Home Office and Scotland Yard will tonight commit themselves to taking immediate steps to provide help in a much more rapid and sensitive way than I fear has happened since this report was published.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I am very grateful to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) for having adopted this subject for the Adjournment debate. He has argued his points in a remarkably cogent, lucid and persuasive manner. If some of his hon. Friends did likewise, they would carry more weight in this place.

The hon. Gentleman is right to focus on violence to women. For a whole variety of reasons, this country is more conscious than it has been in the past that this is a major problem and that not all of us have responded in entirely the way that one would have wished. However, I am afraid that I shall have to disappoint the hon. Gentleman to some extent. I shall not give the authoritative commitment that he has invited me to give.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the report prepared by the Metropolitan police. I shall start by making a number of preliminary remarks about that report. First, as the hon. Gentleman knows, the report was made by the Metropolitan police; it is not a Home Office document. I do not accept that there has been any delay by the Home Office in any regard.

Secondly, I think that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the fact that the Metropolitan police commissioned the report and invited outsiders to serve on the working group demonstrates the force's willingness to look at its practices and procedures with a critical eye. The Metropolitan police are willing to introduce changes when they are necessary.

Thirdly, the implementation of the report is a matter for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, who will, doubtless, wish to consider the report in the context of the Home Office circular that was issued last month. Because this is a matter for the commissioner, it would be wrong for me to seek, at least at this stage, to express a positive view on any recommendation. However, I was pleased to hear the positive declaration of intent made today by Detective Superintendent Street on "The World at One" programme on which the hon. Gentleman also appeared. I welcome the positive statement by the superintendent that he regards the recommendations as "relevant and necessary" and that the Metropolitan police intend to put them into practice. That seemed to me to be a positive way forward and I support it.

After those preliminary remarks, I wish to consider what the police are doing about domestic violence and what more they should be doing. All of us who have practised law, as I think the hon. Gentleman has——

Mr. Chris Smith indicated dissent.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman has not done so. I thought that he had. I am sure that he agrees that domestic violence is one of the most difficult problems that the police have to deal with.

It is right and necessary that hon. Members and Ministers should assert the basic proposition that an act of violence committed by one spouse against another is as much an offence as is an act of violence committed against a stranger. I do not wish any hon. Member to try to argue that violence against a spouse should be regarded as less serious than violence against a stranger.

Indeed, in many cases, especially those involving families with children or when there are continuing offences, the violence shown by one spouse to another is more serious than violence shown to a stranger. There are special reasons why that is so. In many cases, a wife depends on her husband for her home and income and for the home and income of her children. She has no escape. Frequently, when a spouse summons the police it is a cry for help at the end of a long period of provocation.

The Government recognised those facts and have introduced two substantive changes in the law this year to improve the position. The hon. Gentleman will know well that on 1 January the Police and Criminal Evidence Act came into force. In this context there are two provisions in the Act that are of special importance. First, we have enhanced the powers of arrest so that the police can arrest to prevent future and prospective violence. This is a great improvement on what was previously the position. Secondly, and perhaps equally as important, the Act provides that a spouse is not merely a competent witness but a compellable witness in a trial. The Government have, by their legislative programme, accepted many of the points that the hon. Gentleman has made and have changed the law so as to accommodate them.

The law itself cannot provide a complete answer to the problem and it is necessary for us all to face and recognise the difficulties that confront police officers. It often happens that police are called to homes by worried neighbours or distraught wives, and when they arrive at the scene the friction dies down and the police are perceived as being outsiders, to be treated with a degree of suspicion, if not hostility. There are a variety of reasons for this. Sometimes the victim may call the police as a sort of warning to her spouse. The noisy dispute which alerts neighbours may in reality be no more than that, a noisy dispute. Even when a spouse has been the subject of assault, quite frequently the desire for reconciliation is much stronger than the desire to have the man prosecuted. Therefore, we must recognise and accept the special problems that confront police officers in these circumstances.

When a police officer attends a scene it is often not clear to him whether an act of violence has occurred or whether one is likely to occur. A wife in tears and a broken chair may suggest violence, but it may suggest also a row in which the man broke his own property. I make the point to try to stress the evidential difficulties which face these officers and not to undermine the hon. Gentleman's arguments or those which I have advanced already.

Nor is it helpful to speak in terms of cases that the police might bring. Throughout the criminal law there is a range of cases that the police might bring, but for reasons of good public policy it is often desirable to proceed with no more than a caution. Frequently a caution is a sufficient response. We must be clear, however, that the safety of the spouse and that of her children must be the paramount consideration. At all times, and whenever the police attend the scene of an incident of this sort, they must be alert to the possibility of prospective violence.

It was on that basis that we responded to the recommendations of the Women's National Commission, which, as the hon. Gentleman will know, was chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame Peggy Fenner) and produced a most distinguished report. In response to the recommendations, the Government issued a circular on 15 October, a copy of which is now to be found in the Library. There are a number of matters I wish to mention because they go a long way to meet the hon. Gentleman's concern. First, we have asked the police to give priority in cases of domestic violence to the overriding need to ensure the safety of victims and to reduce the risk of further violence. This can be done by arresting the offender if necessary or desirable under the enhanced powers of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. We have asked chief police officers to consider providing practical help to victims by putting them in touch with local authority support agencies. We have recommended that substantial changes should be made in the practice of recording no crime. Incidents should be recorded as no crime only if there is positive evidence of fabrication or withdrawal. Insufficient evidence itself is not a reason for showing no crime.

In summary, the hon. Gentleman has raised an important matter. We recognise that it is important and I hope and believe that what we have done is part of a process whereby this problem and area of difficulty will be tackled and accordingly the life of victims will be a great deal better.

That so much of the Lords Messages [29th October and 3rd November] as relates to the Aberystwyth Harbour Bill, the British Railways (No. 2) Bill the London Docklands Railway (City Extension) Bill and the Pontypridd Markets Fairs and Town Hall Bill be now considered.

Ordered,

That the Promoters of the Aberystwyth Harbour Bill, the British Railways (No. 2) Bill, the London Docklands Railway (City Extension) Bill and the Pontypridd Markets Fairs and Town Hall Bill shall have leave to suspend proceedings thereon in order to proceed with the Bills in the next Session of Parliament, provided that in the case of each Bill the agents for the Bill give notice to the Clerks in the Private Bill Office of their intention to suspend further proceedings not later than the day before the close of the present Session and that all fees due on the Bill up to that date be paid;

Ordered,

That on the fifth day on which the House sits in the next Session the Bills shall be presented to the House;

Ordered,

That there shall be deposited with each Bill a declaration signed by the Agents for the Bill, stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill at the last stage of its proceedings in this House in the present Session;

Ordered,

That each Bill shall be laid upon the Table of the House by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office on the next meeting of the House after the day on which the Bill has been presented and, when so laid, shall be read the first, second and third time and shall be recorded in the Journal of this House as having been so read;

Ordered,

That no further fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which fees have already been incurred during the present Session;

Ordered,

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House. — /The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means/.

Message to the Lords to acquaint them therewith.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

Strategic Defence Initiative

1. Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of Defence what recent discussions he has had with representatives of the Government of the United States concerning the strategic defence initiative; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Younger): I have had a number of discussions on SDI with representatives of the United States Government in recent weeks, including at the NATO nuclear planning group meeting at Gleneagles. The detail of those discussions is confidential, but I refer the hon. Gentleman to the NPG communiqué, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Clay: Is it not the case that the Reykjavik summit demonstrated that the illusion of SDI, far from enhancing the possibility of nuclear disarmament, is the main stumbling block? In the light of that, should not the Secretary of State have a word with the Prime Minister and ask her to tell President Reagan that we believe that the only reason why America wants British involvement is to rip off commercial research and development by British firms? Will the Secretary of State come clean about the anti-tactical ballistic missile initiative and make an honest statement? Finally, will he tell President Reagan to withdraw this proposal and grasp the offer made by Mikhail Gorbachev at Reykjavik?

Mr. Younger: Nothing that happened at Reykjavik alters the fact that the Soviet Union has been engaged in research into strategic defence matters for a long time, and that its efforts at Reykjavik were aimed at trying to prevent the United States from doing the same while carrying on doing it itself, which seems wholly unreasonable.

Sir Antony Buck: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if we can get away from the doctrine of MAD — mutually assured destruction — that would be of great advantage to the world, not just the East, but the West as well? Do we not want to get away from that and substitute something effective, which will work to ensure peace for the future?

Mr. Younger: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend, and that is why the Government put such a high priority on encouraging our allies in the United States to negotiate as strongly as they can for reductions, in arms provided that they are balanced reductions, including all types of armaments, so that security in the West can be maintained.

Mr. Beith: Do the Government believe that SDI can create an impenetrable nuclear shield which will make nuclear weapons unnecessary? How will that help Europe?

Mr. Younger: The purpose of the SDI programme is to establish whether such techniques can produce such an effect and, if so, whether they can be deployed to be an extra protection for the West. British participation is based on the fact that it is research into that possibility and no further.

Mr. Wilkinson: Was not the President of the United States in a sense set up by the Soviets at Reykjavik? Does my right hon. Friend agree that for General-Secretary Gorbachev to make the abandonment of SDI a precondition for arms control progress was a dangerous step on his part, as the whole world was looking forward to an early sumit in the United States, with an agenda settled at Reykjavik and agreed by both sides?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is correct to suggest that had President Reagan agreed to the one condition that the Soviet Union and Mr. Gorbachev tried to lay down at Reykjavik he would have given away the right of the West to research into those matters while leaving the Soviet Union free to continue to do so. My hon. Friend is right in thinking that that would be a dangerous mistake and we should be grateful to President Reagan for not agreeing to it.

Mr. Mason: In the wake of the Reykjavik conference and the briefing that the Prime Minister received from Mr. Gorbachev's special emissary — a report which the Secretary of State for Defence must have read—to what extent was the SDI barrier responsible for the breakdown of the talks? If the SDI is so important, what are the prospects of any arms reductions between East and West and further talks?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's point. At present it is not clear whether the Soviet Union is mainly worried about the precise definition of research and getting a tighter limit upon that, or whether it will be so completely opposed to the SDI programme in any conceivable circumstances that that will be a stopping point to any progress. I hope that that is not the case, but it is one matter that must be explored at Geneva.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Will my right hon. Friend spell out the new projects on which British scientisits are engaged in this area and what advantages are likely to accrue to Britain as a result? Is it not sensible that Britain should be involved in anti-missile defence? Will that give us some chance of playing a part in the decision whether the project could be implemented in the next century?

Mr. Younger: I cannot give precise details of each project in which British firms are involved. At present about $17 million worth of business is coming to British firms as part of the SDI programme. My hon. Friend is right to suggest that such research, in which British firms are participating, is trying only to establish whether such techniques will be important for the defensive shield of the West in future.

Mr. Denzil Davies: In an earlier answer the right hon. Gentleman said that it was the British Government's view that arms should be reduced. As President Reagan offered at Reykjavik to get rid of all strategic nuclear weaponry within 10 years, will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the British Government were consulted on that offer and whether they approve of and agree with it?

Mr. Younger: The British Government were closely, effectively and constantly consulted in the preparations for the Reykjavik summit. I could not possibly have expected any closer consultation than there was. During the two days of the summit, the discussions naturally had to be conducted between those who were present, not others who were then in America or in Europe. It has always been the British Government's objective to achieve reductions in arms. If, in due course, taking into account all factors, including conventional and chemical weapons, we could approach a period of big reductions or even zero weapons, we would be prepared to take part in that process. But we are not prepared to accept only one part of it on its own.

2. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any British officials or scientists were present at the recent American testing of SDI equipment in the Nevada desert.

Mr. Younger: I assume that the hon. Gentleman is referring to the nuclear test that was carried out in the Nevada desert on 16 October and which has been confirmed publicly by the United States Department of Energy. No British officials or scientists were present.

Mr. Hughes: Is it true that the SDI scuppered the Reykjavik disarmament talks and that further star wars tests mean further nuclear tests to determine the feasibility of the X-ray system? When will the Government realise that if they want disarmament and a comprehensive test ban treaty, the sooner they get off the Reagan bandwagon the better?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. There has been no suggestion that that nuclear test was related to the strategic defence initiative. The Americans have made it clear that they abide by the anti-ballistic missile treaty and, therefore, no nuclear tests in space would be permitted as part of the research into the SDI programme. The hon. Gentleman's question falls on both parts. As for the ending of the Reykjavik summit, the reason why agreement was almost achieved but was not reached was the insistence of the Soviet Union that the Americans should abandon their SDI research, while leaving the Soviet Union free to do its own. That was an extraordinarily bad bargain, which President Reagan was right to refuse.

Mr. Marlow: If Britain were to adopt the defence policy, or lack of policy, which has been sold to the Labour party by Mrs. Ruddock and Mrs. Kinnock, would we not find that, with no Americans in Europe and with no nuclear weapons in Western Europe, the only way that we could defend ourselves would be with our own SDI?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend may well be right on that point. If the British Government had followed the policies advocated by the CND, the Labour party and others, we should be left now with the Soviet Union not being prepared to negotiate on any aspect of cruise missiles and we should have the SS20s pointed towards us in western Europe, with nothing to counter them. It seems to me that this episode is a complete demolition of the whole theory upon which the CND is based.

Mr. Douglas: The Secretary of State has twice alluded to Soviet breaches of treaty obligations. Have the Soviets in any way breached the ABM treaty, and has this matter been raised by the United States with the Soviet Union?

Mr. Younger: On a point of correction, I do not think that I have suggested at any time this afternoon that the Soviet Union has breached the ABM treaty, and I make no such suggestion now. I understand that both sides are prepared to keep within the ABM treaty, but that there is some dispute as to the precise definition of what it involves.

Rolls-Royce plc

3. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the total value of all contracts recently placed by his Department with Rolls-Royce plc, both in terms of money and estimated man hours.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Archie Hamilton): The total value of contracts placed by the Ministry of Defence with Rolls-Royce plc in the first six months of the current financial year amounts to £100 million. However, much of our business with the company, such as RB199 engines for Tornado, is contracted for internationally. We expect our total business this year with the company to amount to about £500 million. It is not possible, I am afraid, to provide a reliable estimate of the man hours involved, though clearly Ministry of Defence business with Rolls-Royce plc sustains a substantial number of jobs.

Mr. Stern: I congratulate my hon. Friend both on the answer and on the fact that he has delivered it. In view of the substantial business from his Department to Rolls-Royce plc this year, on top of the substantial orders that it already holds on behalf of his Department, does he agree that the work force of Rolls-Royce plc need have no fears whatsoever as to their future employment, whether in state or private hands?

Mr. Hamilton: Those employees of Rolls-Royce plc whom I have met relish the idea of privatisation. They foresee themselves as shareholders and coming out from under Government control.

Mr. Park: If Rolls-Royce plc is to continue to gain contracts, does the Minister agree that it will be necessary for it to maintain and even to expand its research and development? Will Government support be forthcoming for research and development if Rolls-Royce plc is privatised?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes. Government support will continue to be forthcoming for research and development in Rolls-Royce plc, whatever the ownership.

Mr. Robert Atkins: I congratulate my hon. Friend on taking up his post as Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement. Will he confirm that the order for the Rolls-Royce RB199 engines for Tornado will include the follow-on order, the attrition order for the Royal Air Force, which was reduced by the sale of Tornados to Saudi Arabia? Will he assure me that it is included in that particular order? What is more, if it is not included in that order, I assure my hon. Friend that he will be under even greater pressure than he is now.

Mr. Younger: I thank my hon. Friend for his question. I assure him that we anticipate that the combination of our orders for the RB199, together with those from the Saudis, will take sales through into the mid-1990s.

Mr. Nellist: Is the Minister aware that at my meeting with the trade union representatives at Rolls-Royce, Parkside—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Give the hon. Member a chance.

Mr. Nellist: Is the Minister aware that at my meeting yesterday with the trade union representatives at Rolls-Royce, Parkside, in Coventry I was told that the proportion of workers opposed to privatisation was about 80 to 85 per cent.? Given the Prime Minister's oft-stated premise that defence is of the highest national priority, would not the privatisation of Rolls-Royce mean that money from the Defence Department would result not only in £500 million being spent on engines but in money being spent on the propping up and subsidisation of shareholders' dividends? How does that equate with the Prime Minister's statement that defence is a national priority?

Mr. Hamilton: We are convinced that the privatisation of Rolls-Royce will give the Ministry of Defence better value for money. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the national interest, but many defence suppliers are already in the private sector, and they play an equally important role.

Arms Sales (Register)

4. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to set up a register of arms sales.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No, Sir.

Mr. Hughes: Is it not inconsistent of the Government to deny the public any opportunity of seeing in the House or outside, the applications made for arms sales, let alone knowing the criteria on which those arms exports are made, when only two years ago the Government's representative at the United Nations study on conventional arms argued for an international arms register? That was blocked by the Soviet Union. However, our allies, the United States, have a public debate in Congress before deciding major arms sales. Should the Government not be consistent both with their allies and with their other more private activities?

Mr. Hamilton: The Government consider that they have a great safeguard in that any defence equipment needs an Export of Goods (Control) Order before it can be shipped. We are satisfied that that provides the safeguard that the hon. Gentleman seeks.

Mr. Whitfield: I welcome my hon. Friend's reply to that question. Is he aware that it is official Labour party policy, with which the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) presumably agrees, to disband the Defence Export Services Organisation as part of trying to bring the sales of all arms under closer political control? Is not such a policy wholy repugnant to the many thousands of people who work in the defence and arms industries in Britain, and to our allies in NATO, including Turkey, which, according to that policy, is classed, for some extraordinary reason, as a repressive nation?

Mr. Hamilton: It is remarkable that it is Labour party policy to disband the Defence Export Services Organisation, especially as it was set up by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey). Indeed, that was one of his better acts as Secretary of State for Defence. When it comes to defence export sales, we are talking about 120,000 jobs in Britain being at stake. We should not dismiss that lightly.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I welcome the Minister to the Dispatch Box. On the question of arms sales by British contractors, has he seen the file and appendices that I submitted during the recess to the Minister of State for Defence Procurement on excess profits being made on defence contracts by Thorn EMI and Dowty-Rotol, and Aish and company? Has the hon. Gentleman examined that document, and when may I expect a ministerial reply setting out acceptance of the need to compensate whistleblowers on excess profits where they are being made?

Mr. Hamilton: I am aware of that document, and I know that it is being investigated. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman can expect a reply before very long.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will my hon. Friend reconsider his position? If we had an arms sales register, we could constantly remind the British people of the enormous contribution by the defence industries to our overall export drive. In particular, we could remind them of the record £5,000 million deal—the biggest export deal ever — which was secured by British Aerospace, this Government and our Prime Minister.

Mr. Hamilton: I have some sympathy with my hon. Friend, but many of the deals are confidential as between the supplier and the recipient and some countries would not want all the deals that we make with them to be made public.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the Minister consider widening the suggestion? It would help taxpayers to know just how many contracts go to privatised firms which are not only not British, but do not provide jobs in any form in this country?

Mr. Hamilton: It remains an objective of the Ministry of Defence to get the best value for money. We cannot restrict ourselves to British suppliers if we are to do that.

NATO Bases

5. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence what controls Her Majesty's Government have over North Atlantic Treaty Organisation bases in the United Kingdom.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Stanley): All bases in the United Kingdom that are used by other NATO allies remain in British ownership and their use is subject to the agreement of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Minister publish a list of designated NATO bases in this country and the rules under which they are used by other armed forces? In the event of the United States or any other NATO country wishing to use a base to bomb another country without the approval of the British Government, would the British Government be able to stop it if they wished?

Mr. Stanley: We publish in Hansard, in response to questions by hon. Members, details of bases that are occupied by the United States forces in this country. As was made quite clear, there can be no question of nuclear weapons being fired from British soil without the consent of the British Prime Minister. We have made it clear also, following the events in relation to Libya, that there are no circumstances in which American aircraft based in this country may be used without our consent in military operations planned by the United States.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson: Has my right hon. Friend yet received a report on the ambush of a military convoy from a British base in the early hours of this morning? Is he aware that it will cause great concern among people in this country that such an event can take place? Will my right hon. Friend assure us that he is satisfied that similar incidents can be prevented in future? Have the perpetrators been apprehended?

Mr. Stanley: I have received a report on the events to which my hon. Friend referred. I understand that some arrests were made. I think my hon. Friend will recognise that the police and service men involved showed immense patience and restraint. I assure my hon. Friend that in very different international circumstances from those today we would have to take a different attitude towards the protection of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Did the Minister's original response also relate to United Kingdom territorial waters? Have there been any accidents with United States nuclear submarines in the past 12 months?

Mr. Stanley: My previous answer also related to nuclear weapons fired from within British territorial waters.

Sir Anthony Grant: Is my right hon. Friend aware that many of us would like Her Majesty's Government to have more control over the security surrounding NATO bases than was shown by half-baked local authorities such as Cambridgeshire, whose failure to enforce the law against the mob of CND and other odd-balls is as infuriating to the residents as it is dangerous to the security of the nation?

Mr. Stanley: I sympathise with my hon. Friend's point. He will be aware that, thanks to his and the Government's efforts, security at Greenham Common and at Molesworth is very much better today than it was some time ago.

Independent Nuclear Deterrent

6. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the maintenance of the independent nuclear deterrent.

Mr. Younger: The independent strategic nuclear deterrent will remain vital to our security and to the security of our NATO partners for a long time to come. That is why we took the decision in 1980 to purchase the Trident system, which will provide an effective and credible deterrent well into the 21st century.

Mr. Leigh: Whatever may or may not have been the options in the past, is it not a fact that if, like the leader of the Social Democratic party, one professes a belief in the maintenance of the independent nuclear deterrent, one can see no viable alternative to Trident capable of providing a successor to Polaris in time? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the electorate will take a dim view of any electoral alliance which not only cannot agree whether there should be a successor or what that successor should be but, furthermore, rejects the only viable alternative? That sort of policy is intellectual dishonesty of the highest order.

Mr. Younger: I agree with my hon. Friend. There is no doubt that any political party asking for support from the electorate must have a credible defence policy. It is clear that there is no way of replacing the Polaris system, which will be credible to any potential aggressor from the mid-1990s onwards, other than with the Trident system. I hope that all concerned will now come to terms with that fact and support it.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: In what conceivable circumstances can our so-called independent nuclear deterrent be used?

Mr. Younger: We have made it clear that the possession of our independent nuclear deterrent should be available as a last-resort response in any future circumstance in which such a response by this country is needed. If that protection were abandoned, this country would be at the mercy of a vastly superior conventional attack. The hon. Gentleman and his party are backing a very dangerous defence policy in abandoning that protection.

Mr. Sayeed: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the difficulties of the zero-zero option is that it does not include those Third World powers that have already developed or are developing atomic and nuclear weapons? Does my right hon. Friend agree that, to defend ourselves from that potential danger, we need to maintain an independent nuclear deterrent?

Mr. Younger: We have made it perfectly clear that none of our weapons—whether nuclear or non-nuclear—will ever be used as a first-strike weapon and that, therefore, this country's adoption of the independent nuclear deterrent is a safeguard available to a British Government to use against any threat in the future. The necessity to have that response has been agreed policy between all Governments since the war, Labour as well as Conservative. I hope that that will be the case in future.

Mr. Wallace: If, in the next five to six years, the Soviet Union and the United States were able to agree a 50 per cent. reduction in strategic nuclear missiles, will it be the policy of the Conservative party, if re-elected to office, to deploy a missile system which represents an eightfold increase in the present Polaris system, or are there circumstances in which the Government would be prepared to negotiate away Trident, and if so, what are they?

Mr. Younger: If the United States and the Soviet Union were to agree on such a thing, it would be more than the Liberal party has been able to do with its defence policy. If there were large reductions in strategic weapons of the size suggested by the hon. Gentleman—50 per cent. or so—the Government would be perfectly prepared to go along with the search for such reductions, but if it were anything further, we would require conventional and other weapons systems which are a threat to us to be taken into account.

Mr. Hickmet: Does my right hon. Friend agree that to abandon Britain's nuclear deterrent and to expel American nuclear bases from this country would not only lead to the break-up of NATO and undermine our relationships with the United States but, in effect, would pose the greatest threat to peace in Europe since the war?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is correct. There is no doubt that the destabilising effect of the possibilities described by my hon. Friend would be a grave danger to world peace and put us in greater danger than we are at the moment. It is only the certainty felt by any aggressor who thought of attacking this country that that would be the response, which it could not contemplate, that has kept us safe for more than 40 years. If the policy is allowed to continue, it will keep the peace for very many years into the future.

Mr. McNamara: On the basis of the answers just given by the Secretary of State, are we now to assume that it is the Government's policy that in no circumstances will they be prepared to see the United Kingdom give up its deterrent and that, therefore, we will maintain a deterrent, no matter what the United States does, while there are strong conventional forces in the USSR? In fact, it is now a deterrent not against nuclear blackmail but against conventional forces.

Mr. Younger: We have always made it perfectly clear that in present circumstances we consider that the possession of an independent deterrent by this country is essential to our security. As I have said, that has been the view of Labour as well as Conservative Governments. That point should be pondered by the hon. Gentleman. We have always made it clear that if there were large reductions in strategic systems and no development of any new weapons as a threat to us we would be prepared to consider whether we would contribute to further reductions thereafter.

Sir Antony Buck: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the basic reasons behind the decision at which he has arrived and which he has made openly are the same as those behind the decision made by the Labour party—without telling the House of Commons—to go for Chevaline and update the deterrent? Are not the arguments precisely the same, except that we are deciding openly and making the announcement frankly to the whole country?

Mr. Younger: My hon. and learned Friend may well be right, although, of course, I am not privy to the inner secrets of previous Labour Governments. I certainly agree with my hon. and learned Friend and the implication of his comments, which is that if the Labour party thinks that it is safe to embark upon a policy of abandoning the nuclear deterrent and throwing out our American allies with their NATO nuclear bases in this country, it is taking an extremely dangerous step which will make war more likely, not less so.

Amphibious Ships

7. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the replacement of the Royal Navy's amphibious ships.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Good progress is being made in our examination of the way ahead for our amphibious capacity and my right hon. Friend will make an announcement before the end of the year.

Mr. Dixon: Will the Minister ensure that there is no further slippage in the placement of these orders? Will he also ensure that none of these are sacrificed to pay for the Trident programme?

Mr. Hamilton: At present we are not talking about orders, but are considering the whole question of replacing our present capacity.

Mr. Soames: I warmly welcome my hon. Friend to the foothills of immortality. Does he agree that it is self-evidently true that we can no longer retain a 50-ship fleet? What steps are his Department taking to rethink the tasks and deployment of a future greatly reduced Royal Navy?

Mr. Hamilton: We do not anticipate that the Royal Navy will be reduced to the extent to which my hon. Friend refers. I have every confidence that we shall be able to maintain a 50-ship fleet.

Mr. O'Neill: I welcome the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement to his new responsibility. Can he be more specific as to what his colleague will be telling us by the end of the year? Will it be just another piece of delaying tactics about ordering? Will we enter the year 1987-88 before we hear anything positive about amphibious craft orders, or will there be further delaying tactics while we have to pay the price of Trident?

Mr. Hamilton: I thank he hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks. I cannot anticipate the statement, but when it comes it will be quite definitive about what we intend to do. It will not be a delaying tactic.

Road Accidents (Leicestershire)

8. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many road accidents have occurred in the county of Leicestershire involving military vehicles during the last 12 months.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Roger Freeman): My Department maintains statistics centrally on road traffic accidents involving military vehicles by parent unit and not by county. The information by county could be provided only by checking with every unit in the country.

Mr. Janner: In that case, will the Minister tell the House how many accidents have occurred in the country during the past year involving military vehicles, and in how many of those cases the vehicles were carrying nuclear weapons?

Mr. Freeman: As regards the latter part of the hon. and learned Gentleman's question, for security reasons we cannot depart from the principles followed for many years by successive Labour and Conservative Governments and release information on the arrangements governing the movement of nuclear weapons. As regards the information he requested about accidents involving military vehicles, the answer is that in the year ended 31 March 1986 there were five fatalities involving military vehicles.

Mr. Lilley: Is my hon. Friend aware that a few days ago a military convoy allegedly carrying nuclear weapons heading in the direction of Leicestershire passed through St. Albans, thereby breaching the lorry ban zone covering that city? In view of the fact that our noble Friend in another place has previously apologised for a similar incursion into the lorry ban zone, will he investigate the incident and seek to ensure that it does not occur again?

Mr. Freeman: As I have already said, and as I hope my hon. Friend will appreciate, we do not comment on the movement of nuclear weapons. As regards any infringement of road traffic regulations, I would be glad to look into any allegation concerning military convoys or military vehicles and write to my hon. Friend.

F111 Aircraft (Low Flying)

9. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints his Department has received concerning low-flying F111 aircraft during the past year.

Mr. Freeman: Records are not maintained in the precise form requested, but 88 complaints and inquiries were received in the Ministry of Defence between November 1985 and October 1986 relating to aircraft from stations in Great Britain where United States Air Force F111s are based.

Mr. Thomas: Bearing in mind the number of such complaints, will the Minister tell us what contribution the United Kingdom Government are making to the NATO working party on aircraft noise in modern society? Will he assure the House that the Government will not prevent the development within NATO of the kinds of standards the West Germans insist on, which apply to West German aircraft and aircraft operating over West Germany?

Mr. Freeman: The regulations governing low-flying in Germany are different from those that apply in this country. As the hon. Gentleman will know, the German Government restrict low flying to specific areas. Since 1979, following an initiative by the then Labour Government, which we have followed ever since, we do not restrict low-flying aircraft to any specific areas. We allow them to fly anywhere in the country, with the exception of built-up areas, civil air traffic control zones and over most hospitals.

Mr. Baldry: Does my hon. Friend agree that the people of this country would rather have the occasional low-flying plane, knowing that every such plane is a friend and is intent upon the proper defence of this country, than no effective allied deterrent in the sky?

Mr. Freeman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is absolutely right. There is a great need for low-flying training in the Royal Air Force and the United States Air Force, because the perceived threat involves the training of our pilots and American pilots in the techniques of low flying.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: Is the Minister aware that every time a fighter aircraft crashes killing the crew, such as the German fighter that crashed in Northumberland only last week, it instils great fear in the countryside community of this country? Could we do more of the low-flying training of our pilots, which is obviously necessary, in much more sparsely populated areas of countries overseas?

Mr. Freeman: Our aircraft are required in Britain and western Europe. Therefore, we are severely constrained as to where the aircraft can train regularly. There has been only one civilian fatality—one too many—in the past 10 years involving low-flying aircraft.

Work Force Dispersal

10. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to disperse the civilian work force of his Department from the south to the north of England.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As the House is aware, we are constantly searching for opportunities to secure a more even spread of defence employment across the regions. However, all proposals will need to stand on their economic and operational merits.

Mr. Holt: I add my congratulations to those of others to my hon. Friend at the Dispatch Box. However, having heard his answer, I must ask for how much longer the melting pot is going to be melted before somebody recognises that there is a north of England, especially south Teesside. Langbaurgh especially comes to mind. We would like defence work in that area.

Mr. Hamilton: We are well aware that there is a north of England and that there is a Scotland as well. In 1979 we announced that 1,400 jobs would be transferred to Glasgow, and 1,330 of those have gone and have resulted in 1,000 jobs being recruited locally. We are very mindful of the needs of the north-east, and the representations made by my hon. Friend will be taken into account.

Mr. Dormand: Is the Minister aware that nothing exposes the Government's hypocrisy concerning unemployment in the north more than their failure to transfer Civil Service jobs to the region? Is the Minister aware that since 1979, when the Government came to power, not a single Civil Service job has been transferred, in spite of the recommendations of the Hardman report? Will he set an example by acceding to the request of his hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) and transferring defence jobs to the region?

Mr. Hamilton: We are well aware of the needs of the north-east and we are looking all the time at what jobs can be moved. I hope that we will be able to do something to satisfy the hon. Gentleman before long.

Sir John Farr: Is my hon. Friend aware that a sensible compromise would be to centralise all the facilities in the midlands, especially in Leicester, where we have the Army pay and records office? Many millions of pounds could be saved annually by centralising that facility.

Mr. Hamilton: We shall certainly take my hon. Friend's representations to heart, but I would prefer to write to him about that.

Mr. McNamara: Will the Minister say how many jobs have been lost in the north in Army bases and elsewhere as a result of the MOD privatising many jobs?

Mr. Hamilton: When privatisation takes place it normally results in a certain number of jobs being replaced by others, so although they are lost in the Civil Service, they are not lost to the area.

Civilian Manpower

11. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many non-British civilians are employed by his Department.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are 168,000 civil servants employed by the Ministry of Defence in the United Kingdom and about 30,000 locally engaged civilians overseas. Information is not held centrally as to how many are non-British and it would be prohibitively expensive to collect it.

Candidates for the Civil Service must meet certain nationality and residence rules in order to be eligible for consideration for a post and each case is individually examined at the time of application.

Mr. Yeo: Bearing in mind the great cost of unemployment to British taxpayers, albeit a cost which arises in a Department different from that in which my hon. Friend has recently and happily assumed responsibilities, can he assure the House that the most careful consideration is given, whenever a non-British citizen is appointed, to the alternative of appointing a British citizen, from whatever part of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Hamilton: The qualifications for appointments within the United Kingdom are that people should have been in this country for a long time, so it is only in exceptional circumstances that foreigners are employed.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 November.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty The Queen.

Mr. Foulkes: Has the Prime Minister seen today the report of the serious concern expressed in Europe and the United States of America, as well as throughout Latin America, at the unilateral announcement of a Falklands fisheries zone? As it is in our interests to get an internationally accepted agreement on fisheries and to do nothing to undermine democracy in Argentina, will she think again about this hasty and ill-considered decision?

The Prime Minister: The decision was absolutely right. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, we have been trying through the Food and Agriculture Organisation to secure a multilateral agreement on fisheries with Argentina. We first took an initiative in April 1985, but it was delayed by Argentina. Eventually Argentina signed bilateral agreements which purported to regulate fishing in waters over which the Falklands are entitled to exercise jurisdiction. Faced with that, we took our action. It was correct and, indeed, necessary to exercise jurisdiction over those waters.

Mr. Fallon: Is my right hon. Friend aware that most parents will regard the teachers' pay award of 16 per cent. as reasonable, generous and fair? Will she reassure the House that the Government will protect children from any further disruption of their schooling?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that the offer made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is, as he said, fair, reasonable and, indeed, generous. Indeed, with the latest offer it would mean that Scottish teachers had had about a 30 per cent. increase in pay over the past two and a half years. Many parents would wish to have a similar increase, and they have every right to expect that their children will be properly and fully educated.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister condemn the manic efforts of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to suborn the BBC by his smears and menaces, or is he acting under her orders?

The Prime Minister: The matter raised with the BBC is a straightforward one of whether the BBC is honouring the terms of its charter and its licence and agreement which it signed after the charter some time in 1981. A complaint has been made to the BBC. It is not for us to discuss it, it is now for the BBC to reply.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister is incredible. Is she trying to say that her creature — which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster most definitely is — is acting in a straightforward fashion? Is this not the most tortuous attempt to try to intimidate the BBC because it is not manipulating the news in the way that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster would like?

The Prime Minister: It may be that the right hon. Gentleman has read the submission, but from what he has said it does not seem that he has. If he has, he will have seen that it refers to the terms and conditions under which the BBC broadcasts, and a complaint has been made. It seems to me a matter of fact for the governors to consider. It is only they who can decide and reply to that complaint. It was a fairly measured complaint, which the right hon. Gentleman will see if he reads the submission.

Mr. Kinnock: I have read the submission. It is not a complaint, which is right; it is coercion, which is entirely wrong.

The Prime Minister: It is a matter for the governors, and only the governors, to see whether the charter, and the licence and the agreement have been honoured. It is not for us to have an argument on this matter. A complaint has been made and it is for the governors to reply.

Q2. Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 November 1986.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hirst: May I remind my right hon. Friend that the people of Scotland are anxiously awaiting confirmation that the Queen's Speech next week will contain proposals for legislation to reform the thoroughly discredited and unfair rating system in Scotland? Can she reassure me that they will not be disappointed?

The Prime Minister: I know how anxiously Scotland awaits this legislation and I gladly give my hon. Friend the reassurance he requires.

Dr. Owen: In view of her earlier reply, can the right hon. Lady tell the House whether the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was complaining to the BBC, or was his complaint made solely in his role as chairman of the Conservative party? If so, how are the two roles distinguished? Surely the real issue is that the board of governors are responsible for the BBC and it is they who should now reply to the Conservative party, and the Government should distance themselves from Mr. Tebbit's other role, in which he does not act as a member of the Government?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is correct — my right hon. Friend was acting as chairman of the Conservative party.

I have experience and know that if, on that basis, I refuse to answer all questions, rather a lot of noise ensues in the House.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: Is my right hon. Friend aware that it is reported that teachers in Norwich are on strike today? Does she agree that this action by the teachers' unions is destroying support for the teachers' case and lowering the regard in which the teaching profession is held by right-thinking people in Britain?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I think that such action is utterly disgraceful and shows no regard whatsoever for the children who are in the care of the teachers. I believe that the offer that has been made is a very generous one and that most teachers would wish to accept it. I agree very much with my hon. Friend that if teachers wish to have their professional standards restored — that is our purpose — they should accept the offer and return to giving a full education to all our children.

Q3. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 November 1986.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Lofthouse: Is the Prime Minister aware that the Jarrow marchers arrived in London today to protest about unemployment and to defend their right to work? Is she also aware that these marchers have now been on the march for four weeks? With regard to last week's statement, does she really think that the marchers should lose their benefit because they are not available for employment?

The Prime Minister: Yes, of course I am aware of the march. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, unemployment benefit is paid to those who are genuinely available for work.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The right hon. Lady is cruel.

The Prime Minister: The statement that has been made is the response to the criticisms made by the Public Accounts Committee of the existing arrangements. The new questionnaire applies the law——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Heartless.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister is giving an answer.

The Prime Minister: The new questionnaire applies the law as the Labour Government reaffirmed it in the Social Security Act 1975, which said:

"a day shall not be treated in relation to any person—

(i) as a day of unemployment unless on that day he is capable of work and he is, or is deemed in accordance with regulations to be available to be employed in employed earner's employment".

— [Interruption.] — Of course Opposition Members make a noise. They do not like the facts read out.

Mr. Couchman: During her busy day yesterday, did my right hon. Friend have a chance to read the report in The Daily Telegraph about the extraordinary happenings on Manchester city council? Does she agree that a council which behaves in that thoroughly intolerable way deserves the sort of support——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister can answer questions only on matters for which she has responsibility.

Q4. Mr. Eastham asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Eastham: Is the Prime Minister aware that two weeks ago the Employment Select Committee visited Japan, a country to which the Prime Minister would possibly refer as being very successful, where we were advised that inflation is now standing at zero, but in spite of that they paid a 4·7 per cent. wage increase this year? Is the Prime Minister aware that when we met the industrialists they advised us that they were borrowing money from the banks for industrial development at 4½ per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The same rules must apply. The Prime Minister can answer questions only on matters for which she is responsible.

Q5. Mr. McNamara asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. McNamara rose—

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Eastham: On a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take points of order afterwards.

Mr. Eastham rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall deal with that afterwards.

Mr. McNamara: The Prime Minister will recall that when the decision was taken on the dual track to have cruise and Pershing in this country it was on the ground that it would force the Russians to the table and make them take out the SS20s. Now that the Russians under Secretary-General Gorbachev, and the Americans under President Reagan, have agreed that the SS20s and cruise and Pershings should go, why is she running to the United States to see President Reagan and saying that she did not really mean it and, please, can she keep those weapons here?

The Prime Minister: The matter of the intermediate nuclear forces has to be negotiated, as the hon. Member knows, in Geneva. That is the only place where agreement can be reached. Her Majesty's Government welcome the progress made on INF at Reykjavik. It is consistent with the long-standing Alliance position that INF must be dealt with on a global basis. A zero-zero solution in Europe with some long-range intermediate nuclear forces in Asia is acceptable provided that the disparity is not to great. It is also the well-known Alliance position that the problem of the short-range intermediate nuclear forces must also be addressed because they were put in the satellite countries in response to cruise and Pershing, which themselves were in response to the SS20. The whole thing must be thoroughly and properly worked out.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will my right hon. Friend, during her very busy day, have a word with the Secretary of State for Defence about the Royal Air Force's need for an advanced early warning system? Will she accept that if that order is not placed with GEC Avionics and British Aerospace it will be a dreadful blow for Britain's manufacturing industry, a further blow for unemployment and a kick in the teeth for British technology?

The Prime Minister: Of course one would wish orders to go to Britain. They have to be won on merit, and the important thing is whether the services which that aircraft and early warning system provide are acceptable on the ground of competence to the Royal Air Force and all the forces who use it.

Q7. Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dobson: Will the Prime Minister tell the House whether, in the course of her busy involvement in the pressurising of the BBC by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, she found time to read the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the standards of conduct in public life?

The Prime Minister: I have, I believe, sufficiently answered the hon. Gentleman's question.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. To forestall any possible points of order, I should tell the House that I stopped the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) from asking a question about what went on in the Manchester city council — [Interruption.] The Prime Minister is not responsible. I must apply the rules equally to both sides of the House.

Mr. Eastham rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman will do me the courtesy of reading in Hansard what he said, I think he will see that had he framed his question in a rather different way it would have been in order.

Mr. Eastham rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. From all that I heard, he was saying about Japan very much the same kind of thing as the hon. Member for Gillingham was saying about Manchester.

Mr. Eastham rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There has been a tendency in recent days for the Prime Minister to be asked questions on matters for which she is not responsible. I think we ought to get back to the traditional rules.

Mr. Shore: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. All questions to the Prime Minister are prefaced, to a greater of lesser extent, by paving material in order to put the question, and my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) was precisely paving the way to ask a question about Britain's economic performance compared with that of Japan, which the Prime Minister, as First Lord of the Treasury, is perfectly capable of answering, and for which she is responsible.

Mr. Eastham rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me forestall all this. I shall read carefully what the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) said, and, indeed, what the hon.

Member for Gillingham said, although my recollection is that in prefacing his question the hon. Member said "Did the Prime Minister, in the course of her busy day yesterday consider . . . " Allow me to reflect on the matter. I am simply telling the House that I must apply the same rules to both sides and that we should get back to the position of asking the Prime Minister about matters for which she has direct responsibility.

Mr. Eastham: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dickens: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) has sought to do no more and no less than to encourage the BBC to be impartial——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That seems the sort of question that might well be asked of a Minister, but not of me.

Mr. Dickens rose——

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask for your guidance on the rights of Back Benchers in the House. It arises specifically from the next item, a private notice question about unemployment, an issue which any Opposition Member can and does raise any day of the week. I put in an application this morning to ask you about——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that if he put in an application to me for a private notice question he must not raise the matter in the House.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I am asking for legitimate guidance from you, Mr. Speaker in the Chair. Why is it that an issue of great importance to the integrity of Britain, about whether someone is sent abroad in a crate, whether to Israel or to Nigeria, is not allowed while a private notice question about unemployment, which can be asked at any time, is in order? Why are Back Benchers ignored while matters coming from the Front Bench are allowed?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a very unworthy statement by the hon. Gentleman, who well knows that I treat the Front Benches and the Back Benches with an equal and even hand. The hon. Gentleman has not even heard the private notice question.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Answer the question.

Mr. Dickens rose——

Mr. Speaker: I cannot answer a question about the chairman of the Conservative party. That is what the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) asked about.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Yes, but I did not.

Mr. Eastham rose——

Mr. Skinner rose——

Sir Kenneth Lewis rose——

Mr. Speaker: I will call Mr. Eastham first.

Mr. Eastham: On a point of order Mr. Speaker. May I seek clarification? I asked the Prime Minister to make some comparisons between the Japanese economy and the disastrous British economy, but you ruled me out of order and did not give me an opportunity to pose my question. What is the reason for such conduct?

Mr. Speaker: I have explained that to the hon. Gentleman. I have said that I will read carefully in Hansard what he said. I did not hear him preface his remarks with, "In the course of her busy day" or anything like that. May I say to the House that if, on any day, I feel that I have been unfair to any hon. Member, I have ways of putting that straight, and I always do so.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, have you noticed that there are 139 questions down today to the Prime Minister? My right hon. Friend is in great demand to answer questions on every subject under the sun, and she does it very well. May I ask my right hon. Friend to consider, instead of answering questions for a quarter of an hour twice a week, answering them for half a day in order to get rid of the backlog.

Mr. Faulds: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: We have a busy day ahead of us, but I will take it.

Mr. Faulds: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This, oddly enough, is a genuine point of order. You made some comments a little earlier drawing to the attention of the House the fact that questions to the Prime Minister should have some relevance to her responsibilities. Of course, this House does not expect any longer any real answers from the Prime Minister. Would it not test the subtlety of Members of the House if you were to reinstitute the former requirement, which I think has been abandoned under your Speakership, that the questions should be prefaced by some relevance to her activities on the day on which the question is put? That old practice has increasingly been abandoned and it would be healthy for the skills of the House and a sensible return to old practice if there were a requirement to preface the question by considering today whatever the relevance of the question is.

Mr. Speaker: That is exactly the point that I was seeking to make. The hon. Gentleman makes it clearly for me and I thank him.

Mr. Adley: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I try to be helpful over this matter of Prime Minister's questions? The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) made a fair point about paving questions, and we all know that occasionally some of us become a little long-winded in putting our paving questions. In these days of modern technology, might not a device be put to work to help you, Mr. Speaker, of the sort that is used at Wimbledon that causes bells to ring? If Members cannot get their paving questions out in the first 100 words, a bell would ring and you, Mr. Speaker, would tell them to sit down.

Mr. James Callaghan: I was wondering, Mr. Speaker, whether, to help us phrase our questions correctly, you could advise us how to distinguish between the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster requesting the BBC to act impartially and fairly and the chairman of the Conservative party sending a bullying letter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. As the right hon. Gentleman knows from his long experience, I am in no way responsible to the chairmen of political parties. I am responsible, however, for Ministers in this place when they come to the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Dickens rose——

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. Member wishes to raise a point of order I shall take it, but it must be a point of order and not a spoof.

Mr. Dickens: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry that I misled you earlier, but I was going on to say, had I been given the chance to do so, that earlier this afternoon the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), with great venom, referred to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster by his ordinary name in making a cheap point about broadcasting. Surely we are to return to the niceties of this place.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I judged that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) was referring to the Minister in his capacity as chairman of a party and not as a Member of the House.

Unemployment Benefit (Claimant Advisers)

3.42 pm

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East) (by private notice) asked the Paymaster General what targets for reductions in the number of benefit recipients are being laid down for claimant advisers in his Department.

The Paymaster General and Minister for Employment (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): None, Sir.

Mr. Prescott: I hope that the Paymaster General is aware that that is an unsatisfactory answer in the light of his statement to the House last Tuesday, when he clearly informed the House that the cost of 1,500 new officers could be paid for by a 2 per cent. reduction in claimants, thereby indicating that the Department has already done its homework on how many claimants have to be removed from benefit to pay for the new officers. Will he confirm that his intention in appointing 850 claimant advisers is to make new appointments, and will he confirm also that these appointments will be in addition to the 1,500 civil servants who are to administer directly the new work availability test?

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that the 850 benefit advisers will be involved in checking on the unemployed who are to be subjected to the new work test? Will he tell the House why, when he was forced into the House last Tuesday to admit the existence of the new work test for the unemployed, he failed to announce an experiment for the disabled and the over-50s, and apparently failed also to tell the House that a new category of staff was already being appointed? Why has he refused to be open with the House about all the new measures that are directed towards the unemployed? Why does he insist on new measures against the unemployed when the country knows that the problem is the availability of work for the unemployed and not the availability of the unemployed for work?

Mr. Clarke: I shall deal first with the hon. Gentleman's point about my statement last week. I was asked questions last week by the hon. Gentleman and others about a new form that we have been trying out for some months without complaint, which we were introducing nationally to test availability for work. One of the hon. Gentleman's allegations was that the huge cost of taking on the extra staff for that purpose would not be justified by any savings made. What I said, as he has just reminded the House, is that if less than 2 per cent. of the register were to be saved by finding those who are not entitled to unemployment benefit, the cost would be covered. I did not imply that any target had been set down. It was an answer to an erroneous point and bad arithmetic on the hon. Gentleman's part.

As to the new hare that the Opposition have put up — the transfer of what were previously the unemployment review officers to our Department, where the posts are being filled by new claimant advisers — that move was announced to the House on 23 July in an answer by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, which is to be found in the Official Report for that day at column 305. When these unemployment review officers were in the Department of Health and Social Security, as my right hon. Friend said, they were responsible both for giving advice and help to unemployed people on finding work, and for preventing abuse. They always have been, and that is what they were during the last Administration as well as during the present Administration.

We are now appointing claimant advisers, who will have two functions. The first is to give advice and help to unemployed claimants to help them take up employment or training opportunities and the second is to ensure that unemployed claimants are available for work. That is all that this is about.

This latest and rather absurd allegation has arisen out of this morning's press report, and stems from a trade union official who was relying on the minutes of a meeting that apparently took place in Luton. It is said that at that meeting, one of our middle-ranking officers, who had only the minutes to go by, expressed the matter in a way that has no ministerial authority or approval. They are fulfilling a double purpose — the first to give advice to unemployed people on how to find work or how to get other benefits, and the second to check on availability for work, because this Administration have not given up their responsibility, any more than the last Administration did, for making sure that benefits are not paid to those who are not entitled to them.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that one of the consequences of the new Restart programme has been that a large number of people who have been unemployed for a long time have been amazed to discover the opportunities open to them? Will he take it from me that many people are extremely glad that we are getting back into personal contact with people who have been unemployed for a long time, and that personal advice to enable them to find their way back through the jungle of benefits and job opportunities is welcome?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The difficulty is that our opponents do not wish to accept that. If I appear somewhat breathless it is because I have just come to the House, having flown back here to answer this question, from a visit to Manchester. I was in one of our offices this morning, where I came across a Restart interview between an official and a young man who had come to the jobcentre for the first time for a long time. At random, I went up to him and spoke to him, and he was studying the details of a job that he thought that he might be able to do. All the staff in the office were pleased with the work they were doing with Restart and job clubs. The people whom I met felt that something was being done to help them. I felt like referring them all to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who is not only seeking to discredit our statistics—that is fair game — but running the risk of undermining the public perception of what we are doing to help long-term unemployed people. He and the Opposition should be ashamed of themselves.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): If the work of a claimant adviser causes somebody who had previously been denied unemployment benefit to start receiving it, will that be regarded as just as effective as getting somebody off the register who had previously been receiving benefit?

Mr. Clarke: Well, it would, but it is unlikely to happen because — [Laughter.] It is no good hon. Members laughing. I was offered an easy point, which I shall not take. The people affected will usually be those who come to the benefit office and are receiving unemployment benefit. The whole point of the instructions that we have given to every grade of our staff is to help people where they can. We are now in a position to steer far more unemployed people back into work or training than we could before. We are putting a great deal of effort, at considerable public expense, into doing that. If at the same time our officials discover that there are some people claiming unemployment benefit who were never entitled to claim it, the average member of the public would think that we were mad if we told our officers to ignore that and to carry on giving the benefit because the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East will complain if we do not.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that he will receive widespread support from Conservative Members for the entire Restart programme, as it is the best initiative taken by his Department in recent years? Will he make every effort to ignore the rather trite and ignorant criticism from Opposition Front Bench Members, as they are clearly basing their criticism on title-tattle and one report from a particular DHSS office?

Mr. Clarke: Although I am a sensitive soul, I will take my hon. Friend's advice and allow the criticism to bounce off me. What worries me is the effect that it will have on the unemployed and the staff in our offices. Before the recess, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East spent all his time trying to persuade young school leavers not to go on the youth training scheme which he described as a skivvy scheme.

Mr. Prescott: It is a skivvy scheme.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is now trying to persuade the long-term unemployed not to go to our offices as they will be fiddled out of their benefits. He is doing much harm to positive programmes. Fortunately, those at whom the programmes are aimed seem to appreciate them more.

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): Will the Paymaster General take into account the experiences of some hon. Members who have had the pilot projects working in their constituencies during the past few weeks? They have discovered considerable bitterness among many of the unemployed, who consider that they have been hounded in pursuit of this questionnaire.

More particularly, will the Paymaster General give an assurance that those individuals who have been advised, because of their unavailability to work for health reasons, to come off unemployment benefit and seek an alternative benefit, will not be in any way disadvantaged for the time that it takes to prove that they are unavailable to work for health reasons? We have heard nothing about that.

Mr. Clarke: I am surprised by the hon. Gentleman's first point. As I said earlier, we have been piloting availability testing for months in, among other places, the city of Nottingham next door to my constituency. We have been piloting it near the hon. Gentleman's constituency. We informed Members of Parliament when we began the testing. It has gone on for months without my receiving a murmur of complaint from anyone. I do not know whether the hon. Member raised the matter with my Department, but he has not previously mentioned his anxiety to me. It was not until the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) made a great hoohah last weekend that we suddenly discovered that the Opposition considered that there was something wrong with the testing.

I shall consider the hon. Gentleman's second point. Of course, if people are entitled to sickness benefit, they should be referred to the DHSS and receive it. That enables me to underline the main point, that no one who needs benefit will fail to get it. We are not taking people off supplementary benefit or sickness benefit. No one in Britain is left to starve with no income. We are simply responding to an all-party Committee which considers that we should stop paying unemployment benefit to people who do not appear to qualify for it and responding to the public desire that we should not pay benefit to people who do not qualify for it and that we should give positive help to the unemployed. That has been the main point of all the programmes.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Is it not time that we stopped mincing words on this subject? Is it not the case that up to 25 per cent. of those who have been called for a first Restart interview have miraculously disappeared from the benefit office and the unemployment figures? Is it not the case that over 800,000 people claim to be unemployed and are drawing benefit in the prosperous south-east of England — a figure twice as high as that for the whole nation 15 years ago? Is it not the case that the vast majority of British people support my right hon. and learned Friend's actions, and that the more that idiot on the Front Bench opposite goes on banging the Table——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the Minister answers, I should say that we do not have idiots in this House. [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes we do."] Well I say that we do not.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not know what is the appropriate word, but I certainly withdraw that.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend went a little over the top with his figure — I will check it — but certainly a proportion of those to whom we write do not reply and will not come in. There is also a proportion of people who stop claiming the moment they hear from us. Although I would not put it in quite the same way as my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), if one talks to the average man and woman in the street one discovers that they do not believe that no one is claiming unemployment benefit who is not entitled to it. They tend to say that many such people are doing so. When, while carrying out these other policies, we encounter such people, either because they do not come in at all or they tell our office staff that they do not want jobs, we stop paying benefit. But it is absolutely absurd to say that stopping benefits in such circumstances, which is what the staff are supposed to do as part of their duties, is fiddling the figures.

Mr. Prescott: Of course, it is fiddling the figures.

Mr. Clarke: That also distorts the main aim of the policies, which is to find the people who are genuinely unemployed and give them more positive help than the system has given them for years.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I thank the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) for giving the true Tory view on this subject. Does the Minister not realise how nauseating it is that a Government who have been mainly responsible for bringing back mass unemployment should give the impression that many of the unemployed do not wish to work? Is the Minister aware, for example, that when, not so long ago, a factory in Wolverhampton, near my constituency, had a few vacancies, over 500 people started to queue up for them from midnight onwards? That shows that the unemployed want to work and that this Government are denying them the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Clarke: I entirely accept that there are excessive numbers of genuinely unemployed people in this country. That is why we introduced the Restart programme and all the other measures that have been described. It is not the case that I have suggested that the majority of them are not genuinely unemployed. If, however, in the course of carrying out this positive work, cases are encountered where it is quite obvious from what people say that they are not entitled to the benefit that they are drawing, is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that the officials should be instructed by me and by my fellow Ministers to carry on paying out benefit? If so, he had better go and tell that to the Public Accounts Committee. The hon. Gentleman would certainly have a job accounting for that instruction to his electorate.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a private notice question.

Detective Superintendent Lundy

3.56 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the allegation of serious corruption in the Metropolitan police."

It is specific, because I have an official Metropolitan police report, signed by Deputy Assistant Commissioner Steventon, Scotland Yard's most senior anti-corruption officer, that says:

"it is my belief that Mr. Lundy"— that is, Detective Superintendent Lundy—

"is a corrupt officer who has long exploited his association with Garner"— that is, Roy Garner. Deputy Sssistant Commissioner Steventon goes on to suggest that he believes that Detective Superintendent Lundy should be removed from specialist duty. Elsewhere in the report Deputy Assistant Commissioner Steventon says that grave doubts must be expressed as to the integrity of Mr. Lundy.

Since then, Detective Superintendent Anthony Lundy, Scotland Yard's most senior operational detective, has not only been approved for promotion but has also been appointed to head the new, elite special operations task force that is investigating the international laundering of £26 million of Brinks-Mat robbery money. This is equally relevant and important, because the report goes on to say that some of the evidence has been deduced from the silver bullion robbery and the Hatton Garden robbery; in respect of both of these cases the report suggests that Garner was not the informant that he was claimed to be and that he was merely exploiting the information that he had received from Lundy. The report continues:

"The position is further complicated in the case of the Silver Bullion Robbery in that both Garner and Lundy were closely associated with Leonard Gibson one of the principals convicted of the crime. Photographs have appeared in the press and on television showing all three with other criminals at social functions."

The matter is clearly extremely important, because corruption in the police force anywhere must obviously be a serious matter. It is true that the information contained in the "World in Action" programme was partly available before, in the "Brass Tacks" programme which the BBC chose not to broadcast, but no legal action has been taken against the "World in Action" programme.

More information has become available. Even today, I have received information about the names of the two officers who are alleged to have threatened either the careers or the lives of other senior police officers. I do not wish to name those officers at the moment, because first I want to check them out with other sources.

The matter is urgent, because the suggestion, as made in the "World in Action" programme last night and elsewhere, is that the offences may be continuing. It has been suggested to me that a serious drugs offence has already been partly started but that is is not being dealt with in the way in which it ought to be dealt with.

It has been very difficult to get this matter debated. In January 1986, I wrote to the Minister of State, Home Office, who in his reply to me simply said that he did not consider that it was for him to look at these issues. Since then I have given the Home Secretary the opportunity to take up the matter, but without success.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I must ask the House to adjourn to discuss this matter, if only to protect the many police officers and members of the public who have approached me and asked me to make sure that it is brought to light and dealt with as an urgent and important matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"corruption at new Scotland Yard".

I listened with great care to the hon. Gentleman, but as he knows, my only duty is to decide whether this issue should have precedence over the business set down for consideration today or tomorrow. I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10, and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

BBC (Libel Action)

4.1 pm

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will know that bogus points of order are not entirely unknown in this Chamber. Normally we tolerate them, because often they add to the gaiety of nations and augment the public stock of harmless pleasure. But that is not always so. You will know, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) is the king of the bogus point of order, and that he has recently——

Hon. Members: You can't say that.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman can say it, but it is a bit provocative.

Mr. Hamilton: You will know, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Member for Workington is not the king of the bogus point of order.

Recently, through early-day motions and points of order, the hon. Gentleman has raised matters on the Floor of the House that attach to parliamentary privilege. He has used that means to utter various libels against me and my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth), which were recently accepted by the BBC in a statement in open court as being totally without foundation. But as a result, of course, the newspapers have been able to pick them up, and with the use of qualified privilege have been able to repeat them. The BBC has thus with impunity, and on the basis of documents selectively leaked to friendly journalists by it, been able to try to refight through the newspapers the battle that it lost in court. All that is done without the protection afforded to litigants by the law of evidence. This has become trial by media on the back of what we might charitably call an extension of parliamentary privilege.

My point of order for you, Mr. Speaker, is to ask you whether there is no way in which you can protect the good name of the House and prevent the privileges of free speech in the House being used to impugn the integrity of its Members, under the cloak of parliamentary privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for having given me notice that he intended to raise a point of order. As the House knows, an hon. Member cannot reflect on the conduct of another hon. Member, except on the basis of a substantive motion which admits of a distinctive vote of the House. I can say only that in making his allegations, the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) followed that course. What he has done is, in House of Commons terms, in order.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I personally have no cause to question the commitment of the hon. Members identified in my early-day motions to democratic principles. I personally know the hon. Members for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) and, in particular, for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton). Any suggestions that motions that I have tabled are to be interpreted as criticisms of their integrity or of their support for democratic arrangements are totally fallacious. References to incidents in Berlin are not intended to imply a connection with anti-democratic views. I have heard it said that what happened in Berlin may well have been a caper that went wrong, thus nearly causing a diplomatic incident. I do not know — and we shall never know because the BBC settled out of court and halted the trial.

But I do know that great emphasis is being placed on the importance of the conflicting statements allegedly made by the hon. Member for Tatton. I think that the variations in his statements are unimportant, as they were made at different times, in different circumstances and under very different conditions. The activities of the hon. Members for Tatton, for Gainsborough and Horncastle and others are not important. They have never been the central issue in this affair.

The issue that concerns me is the reaction of Conservative Central Office to the revelations in the "Panorama" programme, and the heavy-handed and ruthless actions that Central Office took to deal with allegations of political extremism which it believed were potentially highly damaging to the Conservative party, and were therefore to be taken very seriously. That is the central question in this whole matter.

Central Office set about an elaborate attempt to interfere directly with potential witnesses. Attempts were made to manage and rig statements by Mr. David Mitchell. I repeat what I have said previously, but additionally I am able to say today that there is a tape in existence that confirms the nature of the conspiracy to hide the truth, and which identifies persons. Today I have sent a transcript of that tape to the Attorney-General. I have to inform you, Mr. Speaker, that it is but one of two tapes. I await a transcript of the second tape.

My reason for tabling early-day motions 1226, 1227 and 1238 is that they identify a person whom I know was nobbled by Central Office. It is unfortunate that, in the tabling of the early-day motions references had to be made to matters raised in the courts. That is where the hon. Member for Tatton and his hon. Friends have unfortunately had to be drawn into this matter by me. Nevertheless, it may have to happen again and again as further information will have to be brought into the public domain if I am to be able to prove interference with witnesses.

Hon. Members may ask why, after so much time, this should be important. It is important because the decision taken to nobble witnesses in the "Panorama" trial is linked directly with the decision of the Conservative party to squeeze and undermine the BBC's confidence and morale. It is the nobbling of witnesses that in part contributed to the withdrawal by the BBC and to the settlement out of court. BBC journalists today are looking over their shoulders in fear——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going into great detail. Will he come to a conclusion, as he has raised a point of order in answer to the remarks made by the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton)?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I accept what you have said, Mr. Speaker.

The attacks of the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) are disorienting the BBC's attempts at objective reporting. I and my many hon. Friends are deeply concerned that the great tradition of a totally free and independent BBC that is respected in every part of the world, is being eroded by crude intimidation from senior Conservatives. The whole nation should now rally in support of the BBC's independence.

Finally, this whole campaign to reveal interference with witnesses will continue while the right hon. Member for Chingford insists on destroying the BBC's independence. It is most unfortunate that the hon. Members for Tatton, for Gainsborough and Horncastle, and others should be drawn into this affair in this way.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will know that my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) and I have been steadfast in our care throughout these legal proceedings not to abuse our position in the House in order to advance our case — a case which you will know put us at risk to the extent of £750,000.

I seek a ruling from you, Mr. Speaker, that you will not allow the abuse of privilege in the House. If that is not to be the case, we shall use the privilege that is afforded to us perhaps to reveal other things — [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]—that may not have emerged so far.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Do it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) will have heard the measured reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton). When such early-day motions are put on the Order Paper, the greatest care is taken to ensure that they are in order and, indeed, they will not be on the Order Paper unless they are. What the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) did was, as I said, in House of Commons terms, in order, but every hon. Member must measure carefully and take responsibility for what he does in making accusations in motions about hon. Members, or in accusing others outside the House.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Does not your ruling demonstrate a point that many of us have tried to raise with you? We recognise that you have no powers, but for weeks or even months on end we cannot directly question the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Even when it is his turn to answer questions, it is for only five minutes. It demonstrates that when Parliament has been frustrated in this way there is no opportunity to question the Minister, or to debate the bullying and intimidation carried out against——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not for me to decide the length of questions to Ministers. If the hon. Member feels strongly about the matter, he may take it up through the usual channels, because it is through the usual channels that the allocation of Question Time is arranged.

BILL PRESENTED

SOCIAL SECURITY (LIMITATION OF BENEFIT)

Mr. Ralph Howell, supported by Sir William Clark, Dame Jill Knight, Sir Paul Hawkins, Sir John Biggs-Davison, Sir Geoffrey Finsberg, Mr. Geoffrey Rippon, Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson, Mr. John Townend, Mr. Tony Favell, Mr. John Watts, and Mr. Tom Sackville, presented a Bill to establish a limit for the weekly payments of benefits under the Social Security Acts subject to certain conditions: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Thursday 6 November and to be printed. [Bill 230.]

Organ Donor Cards

4.10 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to enable potential adult organ donors to specify the uses to which their organs may be put.

The House is aware that, since the inception of the National Health Service in 1948, it has been recognised that a doctor may choose to work in the private sector, in the private and National Health Service sector or solely in the National Health Service. Many doctors refuse to treat private patients because, they argue, their principles would be jeopardised if monetary considerations played any part in medical judgments. I admire their principles. In medical matters, more than in any other, there should be no market-place concept of supply and demand.

The principles that have operated for almost 40 years should be extended. Organ transplant donors should have the right to prescribe the use to which their vital organs should be put. If a doctor can say that he will not treat patients in private beds, donors should have the right to say that their kidneys, livers, hearts, eyes and lungs cannot be given to patients occupying private beds.

The Bill's aim is simple. I merely wish the donor card to identify the donor's wishes. Any doctor who leaves the National Health Service to work in one of the hospitals so loved by richer people compromises his medical ethics. He demonstrates that he will go where the money is. Such doctors are moving to a situation in which a compromise of high moral principle is possible. If National Health Service patients are in direct competition with private patients for transplant organs, such doctors might also allow financial considerations to modify clinical ones.

Of course, not everyone will agree with my diagnosis of private doctors. Donors who disagree can specify that their organs go to patients in private beds or to any patients who require organ donations. However, a number of people require that their transplanted organs go solely to National Health Service patients. It is impossible for many people to avoid being exploited during their lifetime, but it is possible, in this limited case, to ensure that they will not be exploited after death.

Should a private patient for whom a transplant has been perfectly matched need the organ of a donor who has stated that a part of his body should go only to a National Health Service patient, the solution is simple. All he needs to do is to become a National Health Service patient. of course, the private doctor would lose money, but he might save a life.

My Bill urges that the reverse side of the donor card should present three choices. At present, as the House will be aware, it reads:

"I request that after my death
(a) my kidneys, eyes, heart, liver, pancreas be used for transplantation."

My Bill will offer three choices of the patients who may be given the transplants: first, patients treated wholly in private beds, secondly, patients treated wholly in National Health Service beds, and thirdly, all patients.

My Bill is simple. It gives a right to the donor to decide whether to donate his organs to patients in private beds, all patients, or patients in National Health Service beds.

Question put and agreed to.

[Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse]

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse, Mr. Roy Mason, Mr. Kevin Barron, Mr. Dennis Skinner, Mr. Derek Fatchett, Mr. Peter Hardy, Mr. Frank Dobson, Mr. Allen McKay, Mr. Walter Harrison, Mr. William O'Brien, Mr. Alec Woodall and Mr. A. E. P. Duffy.

Organ Donor Cards

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse accordingly presented a Bill to enable potential adult organ donors to specify the uses to which their organs may be put: And the same was read the First time, and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday next and to be printed. [Bill 228.]

Orders of the Day

Public Order Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 1

Riot

Lords amendments: No. 1, in page 2, line 9, leave out "life" and insert
"a term not exceeding 10 years".

4.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

As hon. Members will know, 10 years was the maximum sentence recommended for riot by the Law Commission. The Government accepted that recommendation in the White Paper. We did so in the knowledge that the recommendation was in line with current sentencing practice, but last November a sentence of life imprisonment was handed down to a football hooligan for riot. That sentence was taken to appeal. The Government thought it right to preserve the position pending the appeal. Therefore, the maximum sentence of life was laid down in the Bill. The Court of Appeal has stated its views. The Government listened to the views expressed by the Opposition and in the other place. We have always approached this matter with an open mind. We therefore accept the amendment from the other place, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) on assuming the office of Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department. We worked with him — or against him, if he cares to look at it that way — during the record sittings in Committee on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill. Although we had our differences, we came to have considerable regard for him. We welcome him to his present position. We hope that he will maintain in his present position all the views on Home Office legislation that he expressed from below the Gangway. That can only lead to a massive improvement in the Government's legislation.

We are glad that the Government accepted this amendment in the House of Lords, and we support it in this place. We regard it as a possible noxious absurdity that sentence legislation should be effected by a sentence handed down by the courts. It is for Parliament to set sentences and for the courts to administer them, not the other way around.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I join the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) in congratulating the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) on his ministerial appointment. I, too, am glad that the Government accept that the sentence for the offence of riot should be limited to a maximum of 10 years. This raises an issue of importance and principle — maximum sentences — which has been debated many times in many places. In this small part of the legislation the Government have accepted the principle that the maximum sentence should be a realistic maximum related to the conduct of the offence. I hope that the Government will recognise the need to make other maximum sentences a realistic reflection of the worst manifestation of the offence envisaged, rather than continue the practice whereby maximum sentences are enacted at an unrealistically high level.

Mr. Warren Hawksley (The Wrekin): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) on his promotion. I remember his strictures to be brief when he was a Whip and we dared to speak in Committee.

On Second Reading I commended the sentence of life imprisonment imposed by Judge Michael Argyle on the Chelsea football fan. In Committee I spoke in favour of retaining the sentence of life imprisonment. At that stage the Minister said that he would wait to see what happened on appeal before deciding whether to accept an amendment tabled by the Opposition.

I am concerned with whether the sentence of life imprisonment for riot, which was imposed last year by a judge, should be retained. When that sentence was announced many people were surprised and shocked, but I believe that the public at large thought that it was fair. They believed that it was necessary as a deterrent to ensure that similar acts did not take place. If I remember correctly, even the official Opposition were quiet in their condemnation. Public support for the sentence was almost uniform. It is wrong for the Conservative Government, who believe in law and order, and who have been elected twice on a strong law and order policy, to reduce a sentence which a judge felt was appropriate as recently as last year.

I shall not divide the House on the amendment, but I would support any hon. Member who felt inclined to do so because I believe that this is a sentence which should be available and which the House proposes unwisely to reduce.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): I support the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) about the reduction from life imprisonment to 10 years as the sentence for riot. I believe that the culpability and participation of some people involved in incidents such as the Handsworth riots, in which sections of the town were burnt down, people died and extensive looting occurred, are such that they merit a sentence longer than 10 years.

On Second Reading I had to declare an interest because I was involved in defending the man who was subsequently described as the "fat man" in the Chelsea riot case. Having read the papers, I fully support the view of the Court of Appeal in that case that the sentence of life imprisonment was longer than was merited on the facts. But there are situations in which the sentence of life imprisonment for the offence of riot is appropriate. I shall not divide the House because of my views, but I lay down a marker: there may come a time in the not too distant future when we shall regret the decision to reduce the sentence to 10 years. To a large extent we are devaluing the sentences imposed on those who commit other offences described in the Bill. There will be a temptation when charges are laid in serious cases for judges to impose lesser sentences rather than consider them as more serious offences. Perhaps in years to come we shall look back at this debate and live to regret our decision.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 11

ADVANCE NOTICE OF PUBLIC PROCESSIONS

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 7, line 14, leave out subsection (4) and insert—

"(4) Notice must be delivered to a police station—

(a) in the police area in which it is proposed the procession will start, or

(b) where it is proposed the procession will start in Scotland and cross into England, in the first police area in England on the proposed route."

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 3 to 5.

Mr. Hogg: I thank the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) and my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) for their kind words. We all served on the Standing Committee on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, which had 59 sittings.

Mr. Alex Carlile: The hon. Gentleman has a badge to prove it.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. and learned Gentleman says that I have a badge to prove it. I do not think that I was given one, but I know that the right hon. Member for Gorton has one to prove it. After 59 sittings, we had subjected the Bill to careful and detailed scrutiny. It was a pleasure to work with hon. Members, and I look forward to doing so again.

It might be helpful if I summarise what the group of amendments will do. Amendment No. 2 is designed to provide that where a public procession of which notice is required under clause 11 is to pass through more than one police force area, notice need be given only in the area in which it starts. Paragraph (b) of the amendment provides for marches that start in Scotland. In such cases notice must be given in the first police force area in England through which the march is intended to go.

Amendment No. 3 is a more technical amendment. It is intended to ensure consistency in phraseology throughout.

Amendment No. 4 establishes a requirement that banning orders made under clause 13 and not made in writing should be recorded in writing as soon as practicable thereafter. The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that banning orders, or a record of them, will always be available in writing.

Amendment No. 5 does no more than make explicit what was always implicit.

Mr. Kaufman: We particularly welcome the principle amendment in the group, because we were concerned about the burdens imposed on those organising marches delivering a large number of notices. We therefore welcome the measure and support the Government's acceptance of this group of amendments.

Question put and agreed to.

Subsequent Lords amendments agreed to.

New Clause

MEANING OF "RACIAL HATRED"

Lords amendment. No. 6, before clause 17, insert the following new clause

". In this Part "racial hatred" means hatred against a group of persons in Great Britain defined by reference to colour, race, nationality (including citizenship) or ethnic or national origins."

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 7 to 26, 30, 31, 34 and 35.

Mr. Hogg: I am afraid that I shall have to take a little longer to explain what this group of amendments seeks to achieve than I took in considering the previous group.

My hon. Friend the then Minister of State undertook in Committee to consider bringing forward an amendment to extend part III of the Bill to broadcasting, films, videos, sound recordings and other media. That is essentially the purpose of all these new clauses and amendments. It proved difficult to make the framework of part III accommodate these other media and to ensure that consistency was maintained between the offences as they affect the various forms of communication in question. For that reason, it has been necessary to rewrite part III in its entirety. I apologise for that, but it was necessary if we were to achieve the undertakings that we gave.

The result is that these amendments are very different in form to clauses 17 to 24 as they stood when the Bill was last before the House. Despite appearances, what the amendments seek to achieve is relatively simple. They retain the existing provisions of part III, but they make appropriate changes and additions to bring other media within the scope of the Bill.

4.30 pm

We decided that, as part III will include other media, it should be comprehensive. There are existing statutory offences, such as incitement to racial hatred in section 5 of the Theatres Act 1968 and section 27 of the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984. We thought it more appropriate to bring those offences into part III, which is what we have sought to do in the new clauses.

It might be helpful if I explain briefly each of the new clauses. The first new clause—which will be clause 17 if accepted — defines "racial hatred." Although the wording is slightly different from that which formerly appeared, there is no change in the substantive meaning. In making the amendments, it seemed appropriate that the definition of "racial hatred", which is at the centre of part III, should appear at the commencement of part III rather than be tucked away in some interpretation clause at the end of that part.

The second new clause—which would be clause 18 if accepted—is broadly equivalent to the former clause 19, which dealt with the use of threatening, abusive or insulting words or gestures intended or likely to stir up racial hatred. The two changes in the wording will clarify the activities to which the offence will apply.

First, the new clause refers to the use of words or behaviour—and I stress "behaviour". That is to ensure that forms of behaviour are caught that would not necessarily be caught by the phrase "words or gestures", but which in themselves may well be threatening, abusive or insulting and capable of stirring up racial hatred. In so far as any change has been made, it has been to extend the scope of the offence.

The second significant change is that the new clause refers to the display of written material. That will catch, for example, banners and placards. It was always our intention that such activities should be caught, but we felt it right to put the position wholly beyond doubt.

The third new clause, which would be clause 19 if accepted, is equivalent to the former clause 17. The wording is slightly different, but, in effect, we are dealing with the same animal.

The fourth new clause is new to part III, but its substance is not new. Here, of course, I am referring to what will be clause 20 if it is accepted. The clause replaces section 5 of the Theatres Act 1968 and brings it into line with the other provisions of part III. It was originally intended to achieve that by way of an amendment to the Theatres Act 1968 which formerly appeared in section 2(3). However, we decided that it was more logical to incorporate the relevant provisions within the body of part III.

The fifth new clause, which will be clause 21 if accepted, is entirely new. It is intended to deal with the distribution, showing or playing of visual or sound recordings, including videos, films and sound tapes. This clause is framed in parallel terms to that dealing with the publication or distribution of written material. The offences are similar. Under the third new clause—which will be clause 19 if accepted—it is not an offence to write offensive material. The offence consists of its publication or distribution to the public or a section of it. Individuals are free to write what they like. It is only when there may be public order consequences that the criminal law comes into play. Similarly, under the fifth new clause, it is an offence to distribute, show or play to the public or a section of the public a threatening, abusive or insulting recording with the intention or likelihood of stirring up racial hatred. It will not be an offence merely to make an offensive recording.

The sixth new clause — which, if accepted, will be clause 22 — deals with broadcasting and cable programmes. The provisions are adopted from those which appear in schedule 2, amending the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984 which deals with cable programmes only. The new clause brings within the scope of part III all forms of broadcasting and cable service, except transmissions of BBC and Independent Broadcasting Authority programmes.

The seventh new clause—clause 23, if accepted—is broadly equivalent to former clause 18 in making it an offence in certain circumstances to possess racially inflammatory material. Material changes have been made to take account not only of the inclusion of other media in part III but of the specific inclusion within the second new clause of written material such as placards.

I do not need to say very much in detail on the other new clauses. They reproduce those clauses in part III, as we last considered it, which deal with entry, search, forfeiture, procedure, punishment, offences by corporations and the interpretation of part III. There has been some rearrangement and certain changes to take account of other media, but no changes of substance. Amendments Nos. 19 to 26, revising the existing part III, and the amendments to schedules 2 and 3 are consequential.

This has been a fairly swift scamper through a fairly complex part of the Bill. I hope that what I have said makes the position clear to right hon. and hon. Members.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I should like to give a broad welcome to the amendments that the Minister has just introduced. We all agree that racism or encouraging racial hatred must be evil. We have had statutes in regard to these matters for the past 10 years, since the Race Relations Act 1976 amended the Public Order Act 1936.

Difficulties at that time and since have been reflected in a reluctance to prosecute, and sometimes there have been failed prosecutions. I very much hope that the net effect of the Bill, including the specific new amendments from the other place which the Minister has described, will result in legislation being more effective.

Hon. Members will be aware that some of the other changes that the Minister did not describe in detail were made in Committee. I refer to those changes as well as to those that the Minister has just described. I hope that the net effect of the changes will result in successful prosecutions where material causes great offence. For example, some nasty items were in circulation during the Fulham by-election. At the time it was judged that a prosecution was not desirable because it would not be effective — or at least, there was a reluctance to prosecute.

More recently, there have been items which again have given many people cause for concern. For example, when visas were introduced at Heathrow airport, one of our daily papers might have been liable for prosecution had the new arrangements been in force. In one newspaper there was also a cartoon, which has been described as the "Arab pigs" cartoon. I hope that that sort of material would now be liable for prosecution under the new arrangements.

I am especially pleased that the Government have accepted many of the Labour party's suggestions. Indeed, I am sure that the Minister will agree that many of the suggestions he has described derive much of their strength from the arguments put forward by the Opposition in Committee. I particularly welcome the fact that the offences will now be arrestable. I welcome the amendment which means that this legislation will not merely be confined to public places and I welcome the fact that the provisions cover videos, tapes, cable and theatres. Although it comes a little later, I also welcome the extension of this part of the Bill to cover football supporters travelling to and from football grounds.

I must mention two difficulties which, on my interpretation, will still remain. The incitement to racial hatred has further consequences than simply that offence. It encourages some of the extreme elements in our society to indulge in racial harassment and attacks. I had hoped that the Government would find some way of making that an offence in the legislation. Alas, that was not to be.

My second concern is that some of the material which would now be liable for prosecution under the Bill will still escape because it is imported. I referred some such material to the Home Office not long ago. The material came from the United States from an organisation called New Order. The Minister of State, in a letter to me, said: "the Attorney General has now looked at these papers and . . . takes the view that the material is extremely offensive and would merit prosecution if publication or distribution within this country could be proved."

I fear that there is still a danger, despite the tightening up in the arrangements, that some such material can come in by post. However, I am not able to make any suggestion to the Government on this matter. Unless such material can easily be identified from the outside of the envelope, I do not think that we can do much about it. I would not suggest that mail coming into this country should be looked at to see whether it contains such items.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I accept my hon. Friend's last point. However, is he aware that I have received such literature in the post, supposedly posted in the United States? I have not been able to check. I sent the details to the Home Secretary, and he replied along the lines indicated by my hon. Friend. Does he agree that some further action is necessary to try to curb this race hate material, which is deeply offensive to so many people in our country?

Mr. Dubs: I understand my hon. Friend's point. Such material is deeply offensive, and I hope that we can find some way of dealing with it. The best way would be to tackle it at source, but that means in other countries.

Some other material which came into this country some years ago — I believe it was printed in Spain — came through an anonymous post box in Dublin. Again, despite all our efforts, it has proved impossible to pin down anybody in this country as being a prime distributor of that type of material. I mention that because if there were more material coming in in that way, it would, to a certain extent, negate the improvements that we are discussing.

Despite my reservations, I welcome the new provisions. We agree that racism is a scourge. It causes fear and humiliation to people who are attacked. I very much hope that this new measure will be effective. Of course, I would not be so optimistic as to say that it will eliminate all the material that it is designed to eliminate. However, I hope that it will significantly lessen the likelihood of material of that sort being produced and published and prevent racist slogans being used. I hope that it will make our society a little healthier than it is at present.

Mr. Hind: I welcome these amendments, as I am sure most hon. Members will, especially Conservative Members. Some of us who were here for the debate about visas find it ironic that the party which was constantly accused in that debate of being racist should be the party which brings forward a major change in our race relations legislation by codifying our existing legislation in part III of the Bill and extending the legislation to videos, films and sound recordings.

Perhaps this part of the Bill, now a weapon in the hands of the police to help stamp out unpleasant racist attitudes in our community, will be reciprocated by many of those who are stimulating the opposition to the police in our communities, especially those who are encouraging the more divisive elements in our ethnic communities to reject the attitudes of the police. I am thinking particularly of Mr. Bernie Grant who, following the Tottenham riot, deliberately stimulated anti-police feeling. I am also thinking of the attitude of many Labour councils which keep the police out of schools because they are regarded as racist and against our ethnic communities.

I hope that we will see an end to some of the ridiculous directives from some local education authorities, especially the Inner London education authority, where black coffee is now to be treated as coffee without milk and Blackheath is to be known only as the heath. Perhaps this policy will encourage the community to recognise that we need a colour-blind policy, under which everybody is treated equally and the divisions and differences between our various communities are not rammed down the throat of the adult population and schoolchildren. Perhaps it will lead to change. I commend these thoughts to the House and wholeheartedly support this progressive piece of legislation.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I should like to join other hon. Members by broadly welcoming these new clauses. It is very rare that we can look at a piece of legislation and say that it simplifies the law. In this case we can see provisions which simplify the law by providing a comprehensive code, all of which is to be found in one short statute and in one place, to deal with the incitement of racial hatred.

The incitement of racial hatred is hateful and insidious. We all condemn direct personal violence: such violence is easily perceived, whereas the incitement of racial hatred is difficult to perceive. Its particular insidiousness is the way in which an emotive appeal can be achieved, especially among young people, many of whom may not fully understand the form, force or purpose of the incitement. I hope that those who produce publications and videos and who demonstrate in an attempt to stir up racial hatred will recognise that this is a powerful new piece of legislation in our armoury, which all of us wish to use to create an anti-racist and even-handed society.

I thought that the speech of the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) was a little unhelpful. He failed to realise that the provisions in these new clauses are indeed even-handed. They apply equally to those who are white and may wish to stir up racial hatred against those who are black, as to those who come from a non-white ethnic group and who wish to stir up racial hatred against white people. It seems right and proper when we legislate that such even-handedness should be apparent from the beginning in these statutory provisions.

The use of the word "behaviour" in Lords amendment No. 7 is infinitely preferable to "gestures" which appeared formerly. I am still a little worried about how far these provisions will cover the use of certain emblems which may be used for racial purposes. One always tends to cite the swastika as an example, but other emblems with racist intent are used by various groups. I hope that the Minister will reassure us that the provisions in the new clauses will be sufficient to deal with at least those emblems which are readily identifiable as racist.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): While I also welcome the amendments as a major step forward in protecting minorities from discrimination, I wonder whether there is an anomaly in one of the amendments which may have been overlooked, or whether I am misinterpreting what I am reading.

Lords amendment No. 7(2) states:

"An offence under this section may be committed in a public or a private place, except that no offence is committed where the words or behaviour are used, or the written material is displayed, by a person inside a dwelling and are not heard or seen except by other persons in that or another dwelling."

In clause 8 "dwelling" means

"any structure or part of a structure occupied as a person's home or as other living accommodation (whether the occupation is separate or shared with others)."

Does that mean that material which is threatening, abusive or insulting may be displayed in a hotel foyer or in a lodging house? Those quotations would appear to mean that they are dwellings and so exceptions to the amendment.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I, too, support these amendments. In doing so, it is important that the whole House believes that this is not merely cosmetic legislation. It would be a tragedy if the Government were securing these laws merely to give themselves a cloak of respectability without any determination that they should be used effectively against all those who seek to encourage or further racial hatred, regardless of their colour.

It is also important that the Government, in particular the Home Office, should be at pains to ensure that the conditions in which racial hatred flourishes are not furthered by Ministers. I have a letter from Anne Owers, general secretary of the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants, which states:

"On 21 October, there was an arson attempt at JCWI's office. Two people broke in with the sole aim of starting a fire. Fortunately, the Fire Service was alerted in time to prevent serious damage.

The arson attempt followed racist letters threatening violence to JCWI and members of our staff. It is clearly a result of JCWI's uncompromising public stand against racist immigration and nationality laws, and in particular our recent opposition to visas for people from the Indian subcontinent and West Africa. We believe that the government's decision to impose visas only on people from those countries, and the inflammatory media coverage over the last few weeks, have encouraged and legitimised racist attitudes. Attacks on black people and those who support them are an inevitable result.

JCWI was lucky. If the fire had not been noticed in time, we would have lost more than our building. We would have lost our unique records, detailing British immigration and nationality law, practice and policy over the last nineteen years. There could have been serious injury to staff members. We have to improve the security of our building."

Earlier, I spoke about the responsibility of the Government, particularly Home Office Ministers, to exercise responsibility and restraint in discussing matters relating to race. Therefore, I was deeply disturbed by the Home Secretary's speech on Friday night, which was widely reported. The Daily Express's version was:

"Home Secretary Douglas Hurd yesterday brought immigration to the forefront of the next General Election with a blistering attack on Labour's race policy.

He said their policies were wrong and stupid. And he accused leader Neil Kinnock and Shadow Home Secretary Gerald Kaufman of speaking with 'forked tongues'.

Then he lashed Left-wing councils by accusing them of racial witchhunts that divide communities . . .

He said there was a limit to the number of newcomers that any society can absorb without coming under strain.

'We have tightened the rules preventing the admission of those who are likely to become a burden on public funds. We shall further ensure that our immigration controls remain in good repair.

There is wide support for our system of immigration control, which is firm and fair. It would be a great boon if it could be accepted by all political parties.

The rules apply to all regardless of race, they do not seek to block people already settled here from being joined by their spouse and children.'

Labour's pledges to scrap the two Acts would result in a large increase in the numbers of people eligible to settle in Britain, he said."

In his remarks, the Home Secretary sought to contrast the statements of my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), who rightly said that the Labour party was pledged to repeal the Immigration Act 1971 and the British Nationality Act 1981, with alleged statements of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) that the net result of scrapping that legislation would be an increase of only 1,000 people into the United Kingdom. Such remarks, coming within days of the controversial debate on the wisdom of the Government's decision to introduce visas, were inflammatory. The Home Secretary's speech was designed to frighten considerable sections of the British public and to confuse and divide our community. It was wholly unhelpful to the promotion of good race and community relations.

Mr. Hind: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hesitate to interrupt, but we are debating part III of the Public Order Bill, not a speech given by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary last week. With due respect, we are going a little wide of the subject.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair follows the debate carefully. The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) is relating his remarks to Lords amendment No. 6.

Mr. Madden: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was following the spirit of the earlier remarks of the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind). My conclusions are certainly different from his, but my remarks accurately mirror his remarks.

Our debates on race are of fundamental importance and no Labour Member in any way underestimates their importance or that of the promotion of good race and community relations. We have considerable interest in ensuring that good race and community relations are promoted, regardless of colour, race and sex. I appeal to Home Office Ministers and the Conservative party to ensure that the debate is conducted on the basis of fact and I urge the Home Secretary to show much more caution and responsibility in any further utterances which he may wish to make on the subject.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): I welcome my hon. Friend to the Dispatch Box and I trust that he will continue to abominate secondary legislation.

Although I welcome the new clause, I regret that it does not deal with incitement to religious hatred. I have studied the case of Manla v. Dowell Lee which was before the House of Lords. The basic argument was that religious hatred, in certain circumstances, could be construed to be racial hatred. I regret that the opportunity to deal with the problem of religious hatred has been missed.

5 pm

Mr. Douglas Hogg: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to respond to the four points that have been raised. The speech of the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) was typical of him and it did no credit to the cause that he is seeking to promote. Anybody who knows my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is perfectly aware that no Minister has done more to promote good race relations. I am sure that when the hon. Member for Bradford, West reflects on his remarks today he will regret them.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) questioned whether emblems would be covered by the Bill. I refer him to the definition clause, where he will see that written material covers emblems. I trust that that reassures him.

The hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) raised a complicated matter. If the hon. Gentleman studies the definition clause—it is a far-ranging clause—he will see that, in certain circumstances, a hotel would be classified as a dwelling. The residential parts—that is, the bedrooms—would be a dwelling but the common parts would not. Probably—I say probably because in the end this is a matter for the courts—the same approach would be taken to boarding houses. The bedrooms in a hotel and in a boarding house would be treated as a dwelling for the purpose of the Bill, but common parts of either building would not be treated as such. I trust that that reassures the hon. Gentleman.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) for his kind observations. I shall always treat with suspicion the process of secondary legislation, but I must say—as a candid man—that I suspect I shall use it on occasion or at least advocate to the House that we use it.

Religious hatred is a difficult and important matter. The Government have decided not to include religious hatred in Part III of the Bill because we came to the conclusion that attempts at control would be unenforceable. It would open up too many concepts and too many circumstances in which the law would be required to intervene. If such a provision had been contained in the Bill, we would have created for ourselves unenforceable legislation. I hope what we have done is to restrict our efforts to those areas where we can hope, reasonably, to enforce the law. In that event I commend the amendments to the House.

New Clause

CONTAMINATION OF OR INTERFERENCE WITH GOODS WITH INTENTION OF CAUSING PUBLIC ALARM OR ANXIETY, ETC

Lords amendment: No. 27, before clause 33, insert the following new clause—

" .—(1) It is an offence for a person, with the intention—

(a) of causing public alarm or anxiety, or

(b) of causing injury to members of the public consuming or using the goods, or

(c) of causing economic loss to any person by reason of the goods being shunned by members of the public, or

(d) of causing economic loss to any person by reason of steps taken to avoid any such alarm or anxiety, injury or loss, to contaminate or interfere with goods, or make it appear that goods have been contaminated or interfered with, or to place goods which have been contaminated or interfered with, or which appear to have been contaminated or interfered with, in a place where goods of that description are consumed, used, sold or otherwise supplied.

(2) It is also an offence for a person, with any such intention as is mentioned in paragraph (a), (c) or (d) of subsection (1), to threaten that he or another will do, or to claim that he or another has done, any of the acts mentioned in that subsection.

(3) It is an offence for a person to be in possession of any of the following articles with a view to the commission of an offence under subsection (1)—

(a) materials to be used for contaminating or interfering with goods or making it appear that goods have been contaminated or interfered with, or

[Mr. Douglas Hogg]

(b) goods which have been contaminated or interfered with, or which appear to have been contaminated or interfered with.

(4) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable—

(a) on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 10 years or a fine or both, or

(b) on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both.

(5) In this section "goods" includes substances whether natural or manufactured and whether or not incorporated in or mixed with other goods.

(6) The reference in subsection (2) to a person claiming that certain acts have been committed does not include a person who in good faith reports or warns that such acts have been, or appear to have been, committed."

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment is interesting because it introduces a new criminal offence to strengthen the law to deal with the contamination of consumer goods and associated threats and claims. The House will no doubt be aware that in recent years there have been a number of incidents involving the contamination of food products and other consumer goods. It is notable that many such acts have been carried out by members of extremist organisations, who have attempted to force companies to change their policies, for example, in relation to research on animals. In other cases the motive has been simple extortion.

The perpetrators seek to cast doubts on the wholesomeness of large quantities of a company's products. For obvious reasons it is not possible for a company to check each and every one of its products, and therefore it may have no alternative but to empty its shelves and destroy large stocks. This can obviously cause large-scale economic losses.

The law already contains a number of provisions which apply to the circumstances which we have witnessed in recent years, but none of them were designed to deal primarily with the mischief that I have mentioned. I hope that the House will agree to the amendment, which I commend to it.

Question put and agreed to.

New Clause

POWER TO DIRECT TRESPASSERS TO LEAVE LAND

Lords amendment: No. 28, before clause 33, insert the following new clause—

". —(1) If the senior police officer reasonably believes that two or more persons have entered land as trespassers and are present there with the common purpose of residing there for any period, that reasonable steps have been taken by or on behalf of the occupier to ask them to leave and —

(a) that any of those persons has caused damage to property on the land or used threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour towards the occupier, a member of his family or an employee or agent of his, or

(b) that those persons have between them brought twelve or more vehicles on to the land, he may direct those persons, or any of them, to leave the land.

(2) If a person knowing that such a direction has been given which applies to him—

(a) fails to leave the land as soon as reasonably practicable, or

(b) having left again enters the land as a trespasser within the period of three months beginning with the day on which the direction was given,

he commits an offence and is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months of a fine not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale, or both.

(3) A constable in uniform who reasonably suspects that a person is committing an offence under this section may arrest him without warrant.

(4) In proceedings for an offence under this section it is a defence for the accused to show—

(a) that his original entry on the land was not as a trespasser, or

(b) that he had a reasonable excuse for failing to leave the land as soon as reasonably practicable or, as the case may be, for again entering the land as a trespasser.

(5) In this section—

"land" does not include

(a) buildings other than—

(i) agricultural buildings within the meaning of section 26(4) of the General Rate Act 1967, or

(ii) scheduled monuments within the meaning of the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979, or

(b) land forming part of a highway;

"occupier" means the person entitled to possession of the land by virtue of an estate or interest held by him;

"property" means property within the meaning of section 10(1) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971;

"senior police officer" means the most senior in rank of the police officers present at the scene;

"trespasser", in relation to land, means a person who is a trespasser as against the occupier of the land;

"vehicle" includes a caravan as defined in section 29(1) of the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960; and a person may be regarded for the purposes of this section as having the purpose of residing in a place notwithstanding that he has a home elsewhere."

Read a Second time.

Mr. Kaufman: I disagree with the proposed Lords amendment, and I beg to move amendment (a) thereto, in line 2, leave out 'the senior police officer' and insert 'a police officer of the rank of inspector or above'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take also the following amendments to the proposed Lords amendment:

(a), in line 14, leave out 'twelve' and insert 'four'.

(c), leave out lines 54 and 55.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I thank the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). Grouped with this amendment are a series of amendments that have been tabled by the Opposition. It seems desirable that I should argue the case for the new clause, and the right hon. Gentleman will then have the opportunity to speak to his amendments in the context of what has been proposed. With the leave of the House, I shall respond to the right hon. Gentleman's arguments at the end of the debate.

The House will recall that before the recess a great deal of concern was expressed about the mass invasion of land by groups such as the hippie convoy. I do not believe that I am going too far if I suggest that the House was united in its sympathy for people like Mr. Attwell and felt a sense of outrage at the degradations that were caused to him.

The House will recall that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made it clear, in answer to a private notice question, that the Government were considering strengthening the law to deal with mass aggravated trespass. The result of those considerations is the new clause now before the House, which was moved in another place by my noble Friend the Earl of Caithness. The new clause does not criminalise simple trespass, but creates a new police power to direct trespassers to leave the land under strictly limited circumstances. Those circumstances are set out in detail in subsection (1).

Basic preconditions must apply before the new power can be used, and senior police officers must reasonably believe that two or more persons satisfy certain criteria. They must ascertain that persons have entered the land as trespassers or are present there for the common purpose of residing on the land for any period and "that reasonable steps have been taken by or on behalf of the occupier to ask them to leave"

These criteria must be satisfied.

The first precondition is to ensure that the power is not available where a landowner has given permission for those persons to camp on his land but has subsequently withdrawn that permission. In those circumstances persons entering the land have not done so as trespassers.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): My chief concern, in common with other hon. Members, is the protection and welfare of our ancient monuments and our antiquity. I wonder whether my hon. Friend has considered what would happen if a person paid the entrance fee to visit Stonehenge, thereby becoming in a sense an invitee or licensee, but then created difficulties. Is that person excluded from the provisions before us?

Mr. Hogg: There are two answers. We have extended the meaning of "land" to include historic monuments within the meaning of the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979. This was in response to arguments by Lord Montagu of Beaulieu in another place. However, that does not answer my hon. Friend's question. He asked whether the power comes into existence when people enter lawfully, not as trespassers. The answer is no. The power does not come into existence when people enter as lawful licensees or otherwise with authority. The power to order someone to leave applies only when people enter as trespassers.

If a person, having entered lawfully, becomes a trespasser in the sense that consent is withdrawn, the landowner has a right to go to the civil court for ordinary civil relief.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does that mean that a farmer is not protected if the trespassers go on to his land and encamp upon a farm track, not outwith that farm track, and the farm track is designated as a public footpath on which they have a right to go for a walk, for example? That seems to be a regrettable lacuna.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. and learned Member asks a particular and interesting question. I shall reply off the cuff, but if I am wrong I shall write to him. — [Interruption.] I always have to contemplate being in error, but if the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) contemplated that possibility, often he would be awake half the night.

It is typical of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) to pick up a difficult matter such as this. It is no wonder that he makes a lot of money at the Bar. He asks what happens if we have to deal with a farm on which there is a public right of way. My immediate response is that the farmer remains the occupier of that bit of land, although it is a public right of way. Provided that the people stay on the footpath they might be all right, but if they stray off one inch they will become trespassers and the power will be triggered.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Not necessarily.

Mr. Hogg: Of course not necessarily, because it is a matter for the courts in each case. I think that provided people stay full square on the public way, they might not be trespassers. It also depends upon the motive. If the motive is to do something for which the public footpath was not created, they might be trespassers, because they propose to do something not contemplated by the existence of the footpath. Footpaths are for walking along. My advice — a wonderful phrase to use on such occasions — is that a public footpath is a highway and that camping upon it is an obstruction, which is an offence, but it is not covered by this power.

Mr. Hind: I should like to assist my hon. Friend. Subsection (5) of the proposed new clause contains a definition of land. It states:

"'land' does not include . . . land forming part of a highway."

If a footpath is a right of way, is it part of the highway within that definition? Does my hon. Friend believe that farm tracks or footpaths are not part of the highway, so that the power will exist in the circumstances that we are discussing? Surely a public right of way is part of the highway and therefore the power cannot exist.

5.15 pm

Mr. Hogg: I shall not go much further. "Land" is defined in subsection (5) of the proposed new clause, and it does not include land which forms part of a highway. I understand that a public footpath is a highway. If that is right, camping on it, although perhaps an obstruction, will not trigger the powers proposed in the Bill.

Mr. Alex Carlile: That is a major lacuna.

Mr. Hogg: I doubt that. Anyone who knows about the countryside — as I do, and the hon. and learned Gentleman does not — knows that bringing a large number of caravans on to a footpath and squatting there without trespassing elsewhere is a preposterous idea.

"Land" is defined so as to exclude buildings other than agricultural buildings or scheduled monuments. It also excludes highways and highway verges. All other land, including common land, is caught. The requirement that the trespassers must have "the common purpose of residing" excludes ramblers, bird watchers and other similar users of the countryside from the scope of the power.

The phrase

"residing there for any period" was taken from the Caravan Sites Act 1968. Subsection (5) of the new clause provides that "a person may be regarded for the purposes of this section as having the purpose of residing in a place nothwithstanding that he has a home elsewhere."

The third test, that reasonable steps should have been taken by the occupier to request the trespassers to leave, provides an opportunity for trespassers to leave without the police becoming involved. If a large number of trespassers are present, it is not necessary for the occupier to ask each person individually to leave. A general request to leave through, for example, a loud hailer used either by the occupier or someone acting on his behalf will suffice.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): Subsection (2)(a) of the proposed new clause contains the words "reasonably practicable". What is the definition of those words? Will they not create a lawyers' paradise? To a non-lawyer, that is an ill-defined phrase.

Mr. Hogg: There is no definition of the words "reasonably practicable". That will have to be determined by the courts in the context of the facts. It is not possible for the House, or anyone else away from an incident, to define in anything but the most general terms what "reasonably practicable" means.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): The opening words of the new clause are:

"If the senior police officer reasonably believes that two or more persons have entered land as trespassers".

That is different from assuming that the clause will operate only when people are trespassers. I take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr), because the question whether a person has been a trespasser will be determined only in the light of proceedings and whether the court believes that the senior police officer reasonably believed that the person was a trespasser.

I happen to believe — I hope that my hon. Friend agrees — that this is the only practicable way of dealing with the problem. There are many circumstances in which people try to use the law as a means of avoiding an ordinary, common-sense situation. For practical purposes, there should have been a remedy for what happened in Staffordshire, near Salisbury and elsewhere. Does my hon. Friend agree that it depends on what the police officer, in the first place, reasonably believes to be the case?

Mr. Hogg: Yes. My hon. Friend is correct. I am sorry if I gave a contrary impression. The test is satisfied when the senior police officer "reasonably believes".

We now come to the three criteria that I have already mentioned. It is not necessary to prove as a fact that each one of the three criteria is satisfied. It is sufficient that he "reasonably believes". I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support.

If the senior police officer "reasonably believes" that the three conditions that I have mentioned have been satisfied, he then has reasonably to believe that one of a further three tests has been met before he can exercise his power to direct trespassers to leave.

Mr. Sayeed: As most landowners are not lawyers, a little guidance would be helpful as to what the word "reasonable" means in the context of "reasonable steps". Will my hon. Friend confirm that using a loud hailer to ask people to leave and sticking up notices which are clearly visible around the land would be reasonable action, so that landowners who are not lawyers will understand the meaning of the word "reasonable"?

Mr. Hogg: All that I can say about the meaning of the word "reasonable" is that the test which the court will apply is objective.

Mr. Kaufman: It is subjective.

Mr. Hogg: I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman. It is objective, and it is the test which the court would apply when judging action in the context of the circumstances which existed. It may well be that the use of a loud hailer is reasonable. The affixing of notices, as suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) might be reasonable. I cannot define these things, and even if I did it would not be binding. In the end the courts will determine what is reasonable. They have to do that throughout a whole range of law.

Mr. Kaufman: If the Minister regards the interventions of his hon. Friends as helpful, he should be so lucky as to what helpful means.

Mr. Cash: Be nice.

Mr. Kaufman: I have been nice. I have done my bit for the afternoon and cannot go on being nice for the whole day.

The Minister said that it is an objective test. I advise him to get the civil servants in the Box to send for a dictionary, even a small one, because the amendment begins:

"If the senior police officer reasonably believes".

That relates to something that is going on in the head of the senior police officer and must be subjective. There is no objectivity about an individual's belief.

Mr. Hogg: So far as that observation goes, it is true. The trouble is that it does not go far enough, because in determining whether the police officer's state of mind was reasonable or unreasonable the court has regard to objective, not subjective, criteria. Courts always approach problems of this sort in such a way.

Mr. Alex Carlile indicated assent.

Mr. Hogg: I am glad that the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) agrees with me. I am afraid that on this matter I must tell the right hon. Member for Gorton that a clever point was badly made. It was a clever point, but it happened to be the wrong one. That was a misfortune from the right hon. Gentleman's point of view, but not from mine.

Only one of the tests must be satisfied; that any of those present has caused damage to property on the land, or that any of the trespassers has used threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour towards the occupier, a member of his family or an employee or agent of the occupier, or that between them the trespassers have brought 12 or more vehicles on to the land. It is only at that point, if those subsequent conditions, or any one of them, are satisfied, that the power arises for the police officer to require the trespassers to leave. If the trespassers obey a police direction to leave, no offence is committed. However, the offence is not the trespass, but the refusal to obey a direction to leave.

Subsection (2)(a) provides the back-up offence. Anyone who, knowing a direction has been given which applies to him, disobeys that direction, and fails to leave as soon as is reasonably practicable, will commit an offence. In order to deal with the situation where trespassers obey a direction to leave but re-enter the land, subsection (2)(b) provides that anyone who re-enters the land as a trespasser within three months is also guilty of an offence. Both offences are triable in the magistrates courts and carry a maximum penalty of three months' imprisonment and/or a fine of £1,000.

Subsection (3) provides that a constable in uniform may arrest without warrant anyone he reasonably suspects is committing an offence under subsection (2).

Subsection (4) provides two defences for anyone accused of an offence under subsection (2). If he can show that when he first entered the land he was not in fact a trespasser, or that he had a reasonable excuse not to leave the land as soon as reasonably practicable, or to re-enter it as a trespasser, he will be not guilty of the offence.

Subsection (5) provides definitions of certain words used in the clause. In particular, "land", as I have said, is defined so as to exclude buildings other than agricultural buildings or buildings which are scheduled monuments, and highways and highway verges. "Occupier" is defined in such a way as to protect the owner or, in appropriate circumstances, the tenant. "Property" is defined by reference to the existing statutory definition in section 10(1) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971.

The new clause will provide the police with the necessary powers to deal with aggravated trespass by groups such as the convoy without having adverse effects on ramblers and other such users of the countryside. The new power is, as the events of the summer have shown, reasonable and necessary. But we have also been extremely careful to ensure that it bites only on the particular mischief which caused so much anxiety this summer. I hope that the new clause is carefully balanced, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Kaufman: I am not in the least surprised that the Home Secretary has suddenly found urgent business in Europe and that the former Minister of State—the hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw)—has got himself moved to another Department, because neither of them could have had the bare-faced cheek to sit on the Government Front Bench and support the new clause after their behaviour in Committee. The reason why the Under-Secretary of State is here in lonely isolation moving the amendment is that he is the only member of the Home Office team with completely clean hands on this matter.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): My hon. Friend is a charming fellow.

Mr. Kaufman: He is charming, but that is a different matter.

Manifestations or phenomena such as the hippie convoy are deeply unpopular with the people, and where they cause damage or upset to farmers or landowners they are to be reprehended. At the same time, it is important that we do not use the weight of the criminal law to bear unfairly on people because they have unconventional life styles, and for no other reason. In a democracy, people have the right, without involvement with the criminal law, to pursue life styles that most of us would not wish to pursue. The Government's reaction to those events has not been in proportion to the harm and the aggravation caused. At the same time, I am sympathetic to people such as the farmer, Mr. Attwell, who have found themselves at a grave disadvantage and in considerable trouble as a result of the arrival on their land of groups of people whom they do not wish to have there.

5.30 pm

If we wish to deal with such activities and protect private persons from having their property invaded or damaged and their livelihood affected, is that the right way of doing it? Is it right to create a new criminal offence, punishable by imprisonment? That was not the view of the Home Secretary when he responded to an amendment moved by the the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) and supported by others of his hon. Friends in Committee.

When the hon. Gentleman moved that amendment the Home Secretary said:

"the Association of Chief Police Officers would not welcome an extension of the clause 14 powers to private land. ACPO has told us that it did not wish trespassers to be dealt with in public order legislation."

He went on:

"The police do not wish to be, as it were, at the beck and call of landowners to evict trespassers. The police fear that the measure might cause the complicated concept of criminal trespass to be brought into the law of the land."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 11 March 1986; c. 731.]

That was why the Home Secretary opposed the kind of change in the law which he is now responsible for introducing.

The Home Secretary went on to point out that there were other powers and that those powers should be used. He talked too about the power to enter private land because of breaches of the peace and the statutory power of entry to arrest for criminal damage. Those views were not changed when the Bill was dealt with on the Floor of the House on Report.

The hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw), then the Minister of State in charge of the Bill, must be quoted at length because his words are important. He said:

"the views of the Association of Chief Police Officers are such that it is clear that it it not persuaded of the need for an extension of the new powers under clause 14 in the way that my hon. and learned Friend proposes".

That is the hon. and learned Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell), who is now a junior Minister. The Minister of State went on:

"The police remain of the view that their existing powers to deal with criminal damage and breach of the peace, together with the offences in clauses 1 to 5, should be sufficient to cope with any real mischief that is likely to arise.

"I think that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire underestimates the powers that will be available to the police"

The Minister then explained why. He said:

"Under the existing law, under the new offences and wider powers that are proposed in the Bill, and under the PACE powers, the police have power to enter private land and make arrests if there is a breach of the peace. Under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, they have powers to arrest anyone who has committed an offence if service of a summons is impracticable because of difficulties in establishing name and address. The Act give the police powers to enter land to prevent serious damage to property. Under the Bill,"—

the Public Order Bill—

"all the public order offences which the House has been considering tonight will apply to both public and private land. We have deliberately extended the scope of clauses 4 and 5 to private land to catch the sort of behaviour in which peace convoys and other such groups indulge."

Nothing could have been clearer.

Mr. Cash: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: No. I am quoting from the hon. Member for Pudsey. The hon. Gentleman must get hold of his hon. Friend and intervene on him, not me.

The Minister went on:

"Once the Bill is in force, anyone on private land who threatens violence or who behaves in a disorderly manner, or who is likely to cause alarm, harassment or distress, will commit an offence under sections 4 or 5, as they will become.

[Mr. Kaufman]

"It follows that with this wide range of powers — the police have told us that this will follow"—

Mr. Cash rose—

Mr. Kaufman: No, the hon. Gentleman must get hold of the hon. Member for Pudsey, not me. I am simply quoting him.

The Minister went on:

"the police have told us that this will follow"—

he is quoting the police in support of his very convincing arguments—

"— the police should be able to deal with the real mischief, which lies in criminal damage, threatening behaviour and intimidation by those who happen to be trespassers."

The Minister went on:

"involving the police in a greater extension of services to private landlords might well cause them"— the police—

"substantial difficulty."

He went on:

"the root of the problem facing landowners whose land is invaded by the peace convoy is the slow enforcement process of the civil law."

We shall come to that in a moment.

The Minister went on:

"we should not rush into further legislation until the new police powers to which I have referred have been tried and tested. The police believe that the totality of powers available to them will be sufficient."

That is the view of the police.

"We are not in the business of heaping extra powers on the police, for their own sake."

He said:

"a major change to the law on trespass is not something which we are presently minded to contemplate." — [Official Report, 30 April 1986; vol. 96, c. 1053-54.]

The Government have gone back on every one of those words, after firm statements by the Home Secretary and the Minister of State.

But then we got the hippie convoy and, most unfortunately, there are television sets at No. 10 Downing street, and the Prime Minister has an incorrigible tendency to watch television and then to press her bell and send for somebody. She keeps on doing it. She did it when she saw some football hooliganism and then we had last year's utterly pointless legislation which did nothing to stop the new outbreaks of football hooliganism.

The Prime Minister had another brainstorm about advertising on the BBC and failed again. Once again, it was the Prime Minister doing her "off with their heads, somebody must be summonsed" act. We had a Downing street committee and all this turmoil and action, despite the previous words.

While the matter was being worked out, while the poor old civil servants at the Home Office, who had most sensibly advised the Home Secretary, and whose advice had been accepted, were trying to work out something that would make some kind of sense, Ministers were treading very carefully indeed. Back Benchers were too. The hon. and learned Member for Mid-Bedfordshire, now the Under-Secretary of State, was cautious when supporting the amendments which were debated in Committee. He insisted that, to trigger the kind of amendments that he was advocating, the police must be able to establish a real risk of serious public disorder, serious damage to property, or serious disruption to the life of the community. There is nothing of that in the new clause. The new clause is triggered by a great deal less than that.

Lord Denning supported an amendment moved in the other place in the summer but he made it clear that he only wanted an amendment which would deal with people who intend to deprive an owner of his land — his use and occupation of the land. This amendment is far wider than that and does not meet Lord Denning's criteria.

Lord Glenarthur, another Minister who has now been removed from the Home Office in order that he should not have his words quoted against him, was extremely cautious when amendments were being debated in the other place on 16 July. He said:

"there is already a civil law and indeed a speedy procedure for the recovery of the possession of land."

The hon. Member for Stafford had better think about that. Those are the words of one of his noble Friends, now removed to what the Prime Minister calls the far north — Scotland.

While talking about a possible change in the law, Lord Glenarthur said:

"The circumstances we envisage which would trigger the police power would be similar to elements in my noble friend's amendments; entry as a trespasser, with a refusal to leave on request, coupled with a risk of causing serious damage to property and harassment or intimidation of the lawful occupier."

The new clause goes much further than that.

"The lines which I have described are those upon which we are working at present; namely, a police power to evict trespassers in certain limited circumstances where they intend to reside on the land, refuse to leave, and threaten to cause serious damage to property and harassment or intimidation of the lawful occupier."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 16 July 1986; Vol. 478, c. 983-5.]

That threat to cause serious damage or harassment or intimidation is not in the new clause. It goes much wider than Lord Glenarthur said it would when he said that these matters would be considered. The new junior Minister, the Earl of Caithness, moved the clause and in doing so he made it clear that there was highly effective criminal law to deal with the mischief that his clause was supposed to deal with. He said:

where trespassers cause damage on entering land they may be committing an offence under the Criminal Damage Act 1971."

Addressing one of his noble Friends he said:

"she will appreciate that it is an offence under Section 36 of the Road Traffic Act 1972 to take a vehicle without authority onto any land other than a highway," — [Official Report, House of Lords, 6 October 1986; Vol. 480, c. 102-4.]

It is a matter of contention between hon. Members. The noble Lord was making it clear that the scope of any such new offence should be extremely limited. But it is not limited, because the Home Secretary said that the new clause was unnecessary and he rejected the proposition when something along these lines was proposed. Even when the new clause was being thought about, a Minister speaking on the Bill in the other place said that it would have a far more limited and stringent scope than the scope of this wide new clause.

The new clause is unnecessary and potentially dangerous. Legal expert after legal expert has said that the civil law is available and can operate quickly. It can operate within five days of service of proceedings and, as we have seen, that proceeding can be abridged to as little as one day. It need not be expensive and indeed, farmer Attwell, a member of the public who quite rightly attracted sympathy because of his predicament, obtained his remedy under order 113 of the Supreme Court rules. So did 25 other landowners in the Stonehenge area.

The Government were so confident about the basic efficacy of order 113 of the Supreme Court rules that the Lord Chancellor — a member of the Government not entirely unknown to the Under-Secretary of State — issued a consultation paper on order 113 with the aim of making the civil law more efficient, speedy and effective. The noble Lord issued a press notice on 3 October, only a month ago, in which he said:

"Changes in the civil law procedure for the recovery of land from trespassers have been canvassed in a consultation paper issued by the Lord Chancellor's Department. Their object is to ensure that such cases are heard promptly. At present, a final order for possession may be made five days after the application is served on the defendants or sooner in urgent cases. It is proposed that the five-day period should be shortened to three days, with the power to shorten the period remaining. It is also intended to make it easier to serve the application on defendants whose names need not be known and who are occupying land rather than buildings. Any changes to the rules of court would probably come into force in the new year."

That is only a few weeks away. As I have said, that consultation paper was issued on 3 October and the Earl of Caithness moved this clause in another place three days later and the consultation period ended only last Friday. The Government have made a farce of the Lord Chancellor's whole exercise of trying to improve order 113, which has been shown in the courts to be a highly effective remedy for this mischief.

Mr. Sayeed: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman what he would have done or how the Lord Chancellor's guidance notes would have helped in the following situation. A bunch of tinkers parked a large number of caravans in a field at the bottom of the garden of one of my constituents. The people were evicted by the landowner and that cost him about £4,500. He is not a rich man. The tinkers have returned and the landowner cannot afford to evict them again.

Mr. Kaufman: The hon. Gentleman's constituent had better take this up with the Home Secretary, who said that the remedy available was satisfactory. He should also take it up with the Minister of State and with Lord Glenarthur who also said that the remedy was satisfactory. He could also take it up with the Lord Chancellor who believes that the remedy is inherently satisfactory but could be tightened up a bit. That is why he issued his consultation paper about order 113. If the hon. Gentleman will allow me I shall come to the reason why the course of action that he and the Government are proposing—that the police will enforce the civil law—is unsatisfactory and why a potential injustice to the hon. Gentleman's constituent might be counterbalanced by a severe injustice to others by criminalising this.

The Government have jumped their own gun. The new clause is firmly opposed by a number of groups of people whom the Under-Secretary of State might describe as objective, such as the Law Society. One of the reasons why the new clause is bad is that it imposes an unfair burden on the police officer who will have to administer its provisions. He might be quite a junior officer. That is why we have tabled an amendment about upgrading the police officer who will be responsible for giving the direction.

The police officer on the spot will not be an expert on the civil law or the law of trespass and is not required to be. Nevertheless, he will have to form a belief and make a judgment because his reasonable belief triggers off the action. He will have to form a belief about the intentions of a group of people and about questions of fact. He may have to take sides in a dispute about rights to use land, because, under the law, trespass is not an obvious proceeding. There can be arguments about whether an act is trespass and there are civil law provisions to adjudicate on that.

Disputes over rights to occupy or use land may lead to accusations of trespass. That concept has to be applied not in the first instance by the court which becomes involved only after the arrest, but by a police officer on the spot who has not had the opportunity fully to investigate, as provided for in civil courts by the hearing of evidence under oath, cross-examination and the opportunity to produce documents. The police officer on the spot making a snap judgment has to be a civil court on his own, making judgments on the rights and wrongs of a dispute about land. That is exceptionally unfair to the police, but then, the Government's last two major Acts were exceptionally unfair to the police.

The police officer on the spot may quite possibly be a junior person and may have to act on an impromptu interpretation of the civil law. That is not his role. One analysis is that that nebulous concept of reasonable belief may have to be based on judgments of up to 34 different criteria.

I shall give some examples of what I mean. The police officer will have to make a judgment on "entering the land as a trespasser", and whether a person is a trespasser may be a matter of civil dispute. The police officer will have to make a judgment on the phrase "for any period". This could be a day, a week or a month. Without any definition, neither the police officer nor the occupier is able to know how long the occupier must intend to reside before a direction is given. Another example is "reasonable steps". In this context, "reasonable" is especially unsatisfactory. What other "reasonable steps" can there be to ask someone to leave other than asking him to leave?

A further example is "damage to property". There could be difficulties in deciding whether any damage discovered on the land had been caused by those upon it or by others prior to the occupation. These are all important issues and we are giving a police officer, who has to make these judgments, the right to trigger an arrest that could put someone in prison. A person could be sent to prison if he failed to leave land where he has not caused damage or behaved offensively. That could happen if the officer believed that the person, with others, has taken such action.

There is the question of how the direction is to be given, and the new clause, and therefore the Act, will not specify that. If the direction is to be given verbally, it may not come to the attention of the persons who are involved and there may be dispute about whether anyone knew of the direction. This is despite the fact that those concerned could be imprisoned for ignoring a direction which they did not know about.

Who is a trespasser? These are complex matters, as anyone who practises in the civil courts will know. Civil trespass does not require the knowledge by a trespasser that he or she is trespassing. If a person genuinely believes that he or she has a right to be on land, though mistaken, there will be no defence to any proceedings that ensue as the clause stands. These are serious matters, because we are creating a criminal offence under which someone may be sent to prison. These disputes may not be very serious when there is a dispute in civil law, but we are dealing with an interpretation of trespass by a police officer, not an expert, who is trained in different ways from experts in other areas, to pursue criminals. As I have said, we are considering a criminal offence that could result in someone being sent to prison.

The action of the person who can be arrested need not be disorderly or violent, despite the fact that this is public order legislation. The clause requires that a subjective judgment is made by a police officer in determining whether words used are threatening, abusive or insulting, and the same goes for behaviour. That is an unfair burden to place on a police officer.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) is responsible for an amendment designed to reduce the number of vehicles which can trigger police action. Whether the hon. Gentleman's number, which I oppose, or the Government's number, which I oppose as well although it is a better one than the hon. Gentleman's becomes the operative number, the concept is an absurdity. Why should 12 vehicles trigger off police action while 11 will not? We are being presented with an arbitrary number of vehicles or caravans, and it is the same if we take four vehicles as opposed to three. There could be more than 12 vehicles involved — for example, there could be 11 on one piece of land and another 11 on an adjoining piece of land. That would not trigger police action and it would be the same — I note that the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) nods — with three and three. Once an arbitrary number is chosen, we have an arbitrary piece of legislation.

If police action is triggered by the presence of vehicles, no disorderly conduct is required. Those concerned may be behaving peaceably and may not be indulging in insulting behaviour or committing damage. We have already asked — no answer has been received — what is "any period"? One interpretation that has been offered is an overnight stay, but the Act will not state that. Once again, as so often in the Bill, we see the burden of disproof being placed on the accused person. Instead of the prosecution having to prove guilt, the accused person has to prove his or her innocence under subsection (4).

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Kaufman: No, I shall not give way. I am coming to the end of my remarks and I know that a great many hon. Members wish to contribute to the debate. I hope that the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) will forgive me if I do not give way to him at this stage.

The Earl of Caithness made a curious statement when he moved the amendment in another place. He said that the Government did not want to harass the gipsies and he gave a bizarre explanation of how the new clause would not harass them. He said:

> "Setting the threshold for the test in subsection 1*(b)* at 12 vehicles means that where gypsies travel in smaller groups than that, they will not be caught unless they commit acts of damage or trespass or harass the occupier." —[Official Report, House of Lords, 6 October 1986; Vol. 480, c 103.]

That is the protection for gipsies. They had better travel in small groups. As long as they travel with 11 caravans or fewer and behave themselves, they will be all right. The moment that they travel in groups of 12 or more, they will be in trouble. The new clause threatens the 60 per cent. of gipsies and travelling people who are without caravan sites because of local authorities' failure to carry out their obligations under the Caravans Sites Act 1968.

The new clause is unnecessary, unfair and ill thought out. It could be oppressive and we shall vote against it.

Sir John Farr: Unlike the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), I welcome the new clause. I take this opportunity of welcoming the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department to the Dispatch Box, my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). I could say "So far, so good," but I shall not make such a pun at this hour of the evening.

When my hon. Friend the Minister talked about trespassers on a footpath or public road in the countryside, I think that he was in some difficulty. If a caravan, person or vehicle stops on a public road, highway or footpath, that in itself is an offence because an obstruction is caused.

The provision relating to "two or more persons" in subsection (1) is right. It is a carefully chosen figure and I have no doubt that it was arrived at after considerable debate in another place, the reports of which I have read. I welcome subsection (1)(a), which deals with damage to property and threatening, abusive or insulting words. I welcome also paragraph (b), which contains the phrase "twelve or more vehicles". One has to set a figure and, as I have said, the choice of 12 vehicles has been the subject of debate. I have no doubt that if it is found to be too large or too small a figure, it will be possible later to have it varied by some parliamentary means.

I have raised with my hon. Friend the Minister the question of "reasonably practicable" in subsection (2) and I have received a reply. I welcome the emphasis that the new clause gives throughout to police officers having the power to make certain judgments, but the sort of incidents which the clause is designed to curtail, or at least to harness and control, could occur when police officers are not available. The other day my local police officer came to my home. He was certainly not in uniform; he was wearing tennis shoes and white trousers. I should add that he had come along at urgent notice. The phrase " a constable in uniform" is extremely restrictive. Many of the laws that are used to protect property and persons provide for citizens' arrests in certain instances of trespass and criminal damage. Apparently, this is not the intention in this clause, and I am not sure that that is not a weakness.

In subsection (5), I welcome paragraphs (i) and (ii), particularly the addition of scheduled monuments. The House will recall that this clause arose in another place as a result of what happened to Mr. Les Attwell near Yeovil, when he and a number of other farmers were this summer deprived of the use and enjoyment of the land that they occupy. Does my hon. Friend feel that new clause 28 will go some way to protecting people who enjoy or work on the land in a legal and proper manner, but who are under harassment and threat at the moment?

I am aware that clause 5 refers especially to harassment, but I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would interpret how clause 5 marries with new clause 28. In the countryside there are many examples of people who work or enjoy their occupation but are harassed, bullied and badgered by many people in the most unfair and undemocratic way.

For example, a group of people were enjoying the field sport of hunting the other day. The master of the Surrey and North Sussex beagles was walking along with the hounds when a van was driven at the hounds and the master was attacked in the face with sticks and he suffered a broken arm. Are animal rights protesters catered for in new clause 28? There are too many such incidents in the countryside. People engaged in employment in, or enjoyment of, various countryside activities are being harassed, badgered and driven to take the law into their own hands in the most desperate way. I hope that my hon. Friend can say that there is some chance of curtailing those who would unlawfully interfere with the rights of those who seek to enjoy perfectly legal and proper recreations in the countryside.

Mr. Alex Carlile: The new clause constitutes a significant amendment to our criminal law. Although it provides for an offence that will rarely be proceeded with through the courts, we must always be reluctant to introduce new crimes into the court calendar. Therefore, it is right that we should be circumspect in our examination of this clause.

It is regrettable that we are having to consider a clause, introducing a new criminal provision, that has been rushed into the Bill without having been through a considered Committee stage. Although I broadly support the philosophy behind the new clause, it is especially regrettable that we were not allowed to wait until the end of the representation period of the Lord Chancellor's review of order 113, mentioned earlier by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), before formulating our views on the need for this new clause and the extent of the criminal offence that might be required.

When the right hon. Member for Gorton was speaking, one had the impression — I think that many in the Labour party still believe this — that all farmers have pots of money and can afford to go off to their solicitors and pay the costs of proceedings brought in the civil courts. The impression is that they can somehow wave a magic wand and obtain a hearing in the civil court quickly, and then wave the same magic wand, perhaps slightly extended, and employ the services of the bailiffs to shoo trespassers of their land.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith) rose——

Mr. Carlile: Before I give way, I have a further point to make.

In my constituency and throughout rural Wales, the reality of farming is that many farmers who have experienced serious trespass and damage to their land have a net income of less than £3,000 a year. The real income of the average farmer in Wales is 28 per cent. of what it was 10 years ago. A further reality is that in my constituency—I know because they have told me—many farmers have to rely for the subsistence of their families on family income supplement, which adds a little bit to their meagre income as farmers. There are exceptions. There are some highly successful entrepreneurial farmers in my constituency and throughout Wales, but, at the same time, the income of the majority of farmers is well below the national wage.

Mr. Soley: I cannot allow the hon. and learned Member to take advantage of the temporary absence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) to make such an unreasonable attack on him. Nothing in my right hon. Friend's comments suggested that we are anything but concerned about low-income farmers. If the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes, I shall send him a copy of our policy document which shows that. The point at issue is whether this is an appropriate way to deal with that problem. Given what my right hon. Friend said about the Lord Chancellor's examination of the civil law, the hon. and learned Gentleman should take that into account before making such an absurd suggestion.

Mr. Carlile: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's offer, but the right hon. Member for Gorton said that the civil law is good enough to deal with such situations. That assumes that the average farmer, including the average small farmer in my consituency with a hill farm of between 50 and 150 acres, can afford the £80 that a reasonable solicitor might ask for bringing the proceedings before the county court. I am afraid that the majority of farmers in my constituency cannot afford to put their hands in their pockets and pull out even the £80 needed for the most basic of applications to the county court.

Some may answer that by saying, "What about legal aid?" Farmers, like anyone else, can have legal aid, but if one asks a practising solicitor how easy it is to obtain an emergency legal aid certificate to deal with such a situation, the answer is that it is much harder to get than a hearing before a court. I am afraid that it does not wash to say that civil remedies are adequate.

Mr. Soley: Is the hon. and learned Gentleman suggesting that we should use the criminal law or that there should be a review of the civil law so that it is available to low-income farmers?

Mr. Carlile: I shall answer the hon. Gentleman as directly as he would expect. Just as, early in the debate, without a murmur from either me or the Labour party, we agreed to an amendment that introduced a new criminal offence with a maximum of 10 years in prison, so we are now perceiving another place in which there is justification for introducing a new criminal offence, albeit one with a much lower level of penalty.

This is an important amendment, though extremely circumscribed and providing for penalties which are not great in proportion to other criminal offences. Before I gave way twice to the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), I said that farmers and those who represent and understand their needs understand the need for the police to be able to eject residential trespassers from land. The more one considers the problem and ponders the extent to which police powers are required, the more it becomes clear that, reluctantly, we must agree to a criminal offence which includes that small maximum sentence of imprisonment and the power of a court to impose a fine.

Earlier, I rather unfairly raised with the Minister an issue about footpaths. I apologise to him for raising the issue in that way. His answer earned at least alpha minus and was a valiant attempt to deal with my point, but he suggested that what I said was preposterous and I will not have that. Therefore, I shall have another go at him and this time he will have more time to reflect upon what I consider to be a serious problem which merits a more serious answer.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: When I said "preposterous", I was talking about the idea that a convoy could remain four square on a footpath.

Mr. Carlile: That is just the point I was about to deal with. Unfortunately, it is not half as preposterous as the hon. Gentleman suggests. Throughout the country and in my constituency there are rights of way through Forestry Commission land, which the public can traverse in groups, on horseback, which are wide enough to accommodate two articulated lorries loaded with logs travelling in opposite directions. These are wide rights of way upon which a convoy could camp. One can readily envisage a position, especially where tents are used, in which those who are camped upon land have come there lawfully because they have a right to do so, and have camped mainly upon what is classed as a highway.

Therefore, the absurd position could arise in which those who camp upon a field adjoining, for example, a Forestry Commission track could be rendered liable to the new criminal offence, but those who camp upon the track would not be liable to the new offence.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I merely wish to clarify the hon. and learned Gentleman's proposals. Is he proposing that the meaning of "land" should be extended to include highways?

Mr. Carlile: Farmers must be protected. There is no logical distinction to be drawn between that part of a farmer's land which happens to be a field and that part which happens to be a track over which he drives his tractor; nor between that part of Forestry Commission land which is afforested and that part upon which the log lorries are driven; nor between that part of a national park which is merely farmed land, as for example in Snowdonia, where very large tracts, with the co-operation of farmers, have been opened to the public.

Mr. Hind: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree that there is a way round this problem? My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has told us what it is. The definitions of "highway" in section 5 of the Highway Act 1835, as subsequently amended by sections 328 and 329 of the Highways Act 1980, cover bridges, roads, carriageways, cartways, horseways, bridleways, footways, causeways, churchways, pavements and footpaths. But if a convoy partially or totally obstructs any of those sorts of highway, of which there are many, it commits an offence under section 137 of the Highways Act, which entitles the police to remove it from that spot. In effect, a police officer in situ dealing with such a problem on a highway would be in exactly the same position as he would be in dealing with land adjacent to the highway under the new clause that we are discussing.

Mr. Carlile: The hon. Gentleman is full of appealing ways, but I wonder whether the average farmer attending the executive meeting of the local branch of the National Farmers Union or the Farmers Union of Wales will find that distinction easy to understand. The legislation is intended to solve problems for farmers in a way that they will understand.

However, another point worries me. I am not seeking to put before the Minister obscure obstacles which are best left to law examination papers. It worries me much more that a farmer who has substantial rights of way across his land may not realise that such part of his land as is a right of way is classified as a highway. Therefore, he may ask the police to exercise their powers under the Public Order Act. They may do that, and the farmer and the police may soon find themselves in a civil court accused of wrongful arrest and, ultimately, false imprisonment. This matter needs further consideration.

I share the misgivings which have been expressed about the meaning of the words "reasonable steps" in subsection (1) of the new clause. That point is reinforced when one sets the phrase for that is the standard which the landowner must satisfy — against the standard which the police officer must satisfy. He need not take "reasonable steps" to ask trespassers to leave. He can direct—for the word used in relation to the police officer is "direct" — persons to leave the land. An unhelpful distinction is drawn in amendment No. 28 between the quality of the action required of the landowner and that required of the police officer. That distinction has no logical basis.

"reasonable steps have been taken by or on behalf of the occupier of the land,"—

The right hon. Member for Gorton suggested that there is no need for a new criminal offence to be created because, where damage is committed, a police officer can arrest someone for the damage. Where there is a breach of the peace and the use of threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour, a police officer has power to arrest. But those who take that view — I have received many briefings advocating that view — have failed to observe an essential distinction between the general powers of the police in relation to specific criminal offences and the helpful power contained in subsection (1).

If a police officer sees a crowd of people encamped upon land and an item has been damaged — a constituent of mine suffered damage to a cattle trough in a field on 18 occasions during a fortnight — he cannot march on to the land and arrest the first person he sees for damaging the trough. He must have reasonable grounds for believing that that person has damaged the trough. If he comes along, as is inevitably the case, after the trough has been damaged, he has a problem on his hands, because he cannot do anything about it. If there has been a breach of the peace and a farmer rings up and says, "I have been abused, threatened and insulted by a crowd of people on my land, late at night," but he has no idea which individuals used the insulting words or threatening behaviour, the police are left powerless.

The power arises under subsection (1), where any of the persons who are encamped on the land

"has caused damage to property on the land or used threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour towards the occupier."

Therefore we are providing something that does not exist, in terms of powers of the police, under the existing law. In my view, we are providing something that anybody — perhaps I can return an earlier jibe by the Minister — who, like myself, has considerable knowledge and experience of the countryside and who lives in the middle of the countryside, knows is a reasonable power.

Although I have grave misgivings about the way in which this new law is being introduced and although, in my view, it would have been far better to leave it out of this Bill and to include it in what I believe is to be a Criminal Justice Bill in the new Session of Parliament, starting very shortly, nevertheless, having regard to the balance of interests and considerations, the principle of this clause must be supported. I shall support it later tonight. However, I hope that we shall hear from the Minister that the Government are conscious of the rush that there has been to introduce the clause and that they will be prepared to consider even significant changes if it is found that the clause causes difficulties in the coming months.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Croydon, North-West): I welcome the clause and it will be welcomed by large numbers of people, including farmers whose powers until now have been limited when their land has been invaded. Either they have had to go to law for a civil remedy—which is very expensive and very slow; the county court takes several days to hear a case and it is not inconceivable that legal bills running well into four figures will be incurred—or they have to use the remedy of self-help. In law a farmer is entitled to use reasonable force to remove trespassers from his land. He cannot use reasonable force to remove trespassers from his house, but he can use it to remove them from his land. However, that is thought to be an unwise step to take, because of the consequences that can flow from using reasonable force. Farmers tend to get a little excited.

I believe that it is a good new clause, but I should like to make one or two points about it. The first relates to causing damage to property. We are not dealing with criminal damage. The new clause provides that any form of damage, which includes accidental damage, must fit within the section. However, damage to property is mentioned in the clause. Property that is defined in the Criminal Damage Act 1971 does not, apparently, include the foliage of a plant that is growing wild on any land.

Will my hon. Friend the Minister consider the following scenario and let me know whether he thinks that it fits within the section? A group of vehicles—perhaps seven in number—comes on to a farmer's land. In so doing, those vehicles are trespassing. No intentional damage is caused. The occupants of the vehicles do not abuse or threaten the occupier of the land or his family. However, the movement of those vehicles causes damage to certain crops. In the case that I have imagined, there are seven vehicles. Therefore they do not come within subsection 1 (b), which refers to 12 or more vehicles. Therefore, the farmer is left with the remedy in paragraph (a): he has to establish damage to property on his land.

If the vehicles or individuals accidentally cause damage to a crop that the farmer is growing—corn or maize—am I right in saying that that constitutes property, whereas if they cause damage to a grass crop it would not constitute damage to property? What classes of goods are covered by the phrase "growing wild on any land"? I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to deal with that question.

That question reminds me of what happens under the law relating to motoring. If one is involved in a road traffic accident, one is under a duty to stop and exchange names and addresses. Then one asks oneself, what is an accident? I shall be corrected if I am wrong, but I think that an accident is an untoward event involving damage to people or property.

The courts have held that it is an accident when damage is caused even to a tree. In motoring law, therefore, the tree falls within the definition of property, when it comes to damage, for the purposes of the section that requires one to stop and exchange names and addresses. Under this clause one can envisage the occupants of a group of seven vehicles chopping down a tree with which to light a fire. If a tree is chopped down and used to light a fire, does it constitute a plant that is growing wild on the land, thus taking it outside the scope of "property", or is the tree "property"?

The definition of "property" could give rise to difficulty. When vehicles go on to land they will inevitably cause some damage to some property. Therefore, one has to ask to what extent the definition of "property" includes crops.

Furthermore, I do not understand why 12 vehicles must be involved. I have envisaged a case in which seven vehicles might be involved. The land of a client of mine was invaded by seven or eight vehicles, which caused great problems for my client. He is a farmer and he could not afford to go to law, despite my offer to handle the case for a few sacks of logs, not for a fee.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Plus VAT.

Mr. Malins: Yes, plus VAT.

He could not afford it, and time was against us. Those seven vehicles went on to his land. No insults were offered to his family and the only damage caused was the damage to some of his crops by the vehicles as they went through his fields. I should like to know whether an offence was committed in that case. I rather hope that it was.

Finally, one of the remedies that was available to my farmer friend was the ability to use reasonable force to throw out those people, but the police thought that that would be unwise. There was some sense in that view. However, my friend's great frustration was that the law discouraged him from using reasonable force to eject those people from his land and, due to a very old statute, the law forbids him to use reasonable force to throw people out of his home. There are many people who think that the law relating to squatting in properties should be looked at afresh.

I think that my farmer friend will greatly appreciate the thrust of this new clause. It will provide protection for large numbers of people who in the past have felt defenceless.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I begin by seizing this opportunity, like other hon. Members on both sides of the House, to congratulate the new Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), on his apppointment. In Committee we learned to respect and view with considerable affection the hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw), the former Minister of State, Home Office, who conducted the Bill's passage with great reasonableness and earned the respect of all hon. Members, on both sides of the Committee and the House. However, I am sure that the hon. Member for Grantham will prove an ample substitute.

I take issue with the Under-Secretary of State's claim that the new clause's provisions will apply in strictly limited circumstances. It is precisely because I believe that those circumstances are not strictly limited that I have grave misgivings about it. The hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) pinpointed the problem of accidental damage and of what means. In doing that, he highlighted just one of the many difficulties. There are others. The persons involved must have entered the land as trespassers, yet "trespassers" are not defined. Who decides whether people are entering land as trespassers? Is it to be assumed that they are trespassers simply because they do not have the express permission of the owner?

"has caused damage to property"

6.30 pm

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman may have been out of the Chamber when this point was addressed. The new clause states that the senior police officer must reasonably believe that the people have entered the land as trespassers. Consequently, the hon. Gentleman must accept that the defence's first action in court would be to test the police officer's action on that very point. That is where the issue of trespass would first arise.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman has run ahead of me, because I was about to come to that point. To a certain extent, the whole thing hinges on it.

Someone judging whether the senior police officer "reasonably believes" that a group of two or more persons are trespassers will be unable to receive any guidance from the new clause or the Bill. The new clause states that the officer must reasonably believe that the trespassers are there with the "common purpose of residing there for any period".

But my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has already asked what "any period" means. Is it an hour, a day, or what?

There is also the question whether "any of those persons has caused damage to property".

If the police officer reasonably believes that a wall has been broken by those supposedly trespassing, but they protest their innocence and say that the wall was broken when they came onto the land, it is possible that neither their contention nor the police officer's belief can be proved. Thus, there is enormous scope for difficulty and argument. Many of the provisions in subsection (1) of the new clause are open to very wide interpretation.

Let us imagine that a family of three decide to camp overnight on privately owned land without first obtaining permission. Nothing could less resemble a hippie convoy. Let us then imagine that the owner tells them fairly aggressively to move off and leave his land, and that they refuse, saying that they are out for the weekend and want to camp. They may argue back in a somewhat ripe fashion. But if they do so, it may be said that they have used "threatening, abusive or insulting words".

At that point, all the mechanisms in the new clause will have been triggered. A family of three, whose only apparent crime is to have shouted back at someone who aggressively demanded that they should leave his land, will be subject to a direction from a police officer and, on refusal, to a criminal prosecution. That may well happen and those people would then be caught by the new clause's provisions. The Government have introduced this new clause in order to catch a different sort of offence, but that is one consequence of it. It worries me that such people will be considered criminals if the legislation reaches the statute book.

But worse than the potential scope of the legislation, and worse than the ambiguity of several of the provisions in subsection (1), is the role of the police officer and his reasonable belief. The new clause places a great onus on the police officer. In a subsequent court case, the test will be whether the police officer's belief was reasonable. I am not sure that the police will welcome being placed in that position.

Moreover, subsection (2) states:

"If a person knowing that such a direction has been given which applies to him"

fails to leave the land or subsequently returns, he commits an offence. Subsection (2) does not contain any qualifications about whether the direction was valid. If the person contests that direction or wishes to do so, or leaves and subsequently decides that it was invalid and returns, he has precious little protection. I hope that the Minister can clarify that point. Is it to be assumed that that direction must be valid in order for the mechanism to be triggered? If not, it is a matter of concern, because an invalid direction could be given, and the person concerned would have to comply with it.

I am worried about the new clause's scope and about the ambiguity of several of its provisions. I am also worried that the police officer's belief should be the test on which the whole thing hinges. Moreover, I am concerned that the Government are introducing a new power of criminal trespass. They will turn the police into the bailiffs of privately owned land. Traditionally, we have never supported that in this country, and I cannot support it now.

Mr. Hawksley: I do not particularly want to take up the remarks of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) about whether trespass will become a criminal offence. In Committee, I argued that such a move would not be harmful and might almost be necessary. My amendments were not then accepted.

I accept that this amendment is different. It is not a case of making trespass a criminal offence. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) wondered where the amendment had come from and suggested that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had been watching television. I do not mind where it came from, because I wholeheartedly welcome it, even at this late hour.

It is unfortunate that we did not have such an amendment before us either in Committee or on Report. It would have given us an opportunity to deal with some of these details. It is also a pity that it took a case such as that of Mr. Attwell to get the Home Office to respond. I am glad that the Home Office has responded. We warned the then Minister, both in Committee and on Report, that something would have to be done. In Telford, in my constituency, I have had experience of problems created by peace convoys. My concern is not that this amendment does not make trespass a criminal offence but that there may be some gaps in the law if the House accepts the amendment.

Subsection 1*(a)* of the new clause refers to persons who have used

"insulting words or behaviour towards the occupier, a member of his family or an employee or agent of his".

Who would that be in the case of publicly owned land? In Telford, the Telford development corporation, The Wrekin district council and the National Coal Board, which were owners, had to take action against a peace convoy. To which group are the insulting words directed in those cases? I wrote to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, asking whether he would consider accepting the idea that neighbours, in addition to the occupier, might suffer from insulting words. I am concerned that we may have left a loophole by insisting that it is the occupier of the land and not the neighbours who suffer the insulting words or threats against them.

Paragraph (b) specifies that

"those persons have between them brought twelve or more vehicles on to the land".

The Opposition have asked why 12 vehicles were stipulated. My amendment stating four vehicles can be considered questionable on the same grounds. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State must respond by saying why the figure of 12 was chosen. Twelve is too many; four would be better. What will happen? With the very good legal advice that the peace convoys seem to take around with them, we will soon find that they will have 12 or 13 vans. They will just split up into two groups. They may be only 100 yards apart but on different owners' land, yet under this new clause they will be able to say, "It does not apply to us."

I hope that the Minister will tackle the question of numbers and the reason for choosing 12. My amendment is to probe his arguments to find what the position will be if peace convoys divide into smaller units.

The House should accept the amendment. It will give comfort to many people not only in rural areas, such as Montgomeryshire, of which the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) spoke, but in places such as Telford and other new towns where there is a lot of spare land and where peace convoys have a habit of drifting for the winter. I welcome the amendment and congratulate the Government on introducing it.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): This amendment should be supported because it specifically refers to those who trespass on land for the express purpose of residing on it. Trespassers have caused an immense problem in the area of Wales that I represent. The provision also refers to 12 or more vehicles being brought on to land. There have been many examples of more than 12 vehicles going on to land and causing damage and distress, especially to farmers.

I am pleased that the amendment refers to common land. There is an immense amount of common land in Wales. Vehicles entering land have been a problem for us. I refer to the problems which have occurred on Hay bluff, for example, in my constituency over at least 10 years. A number of people who resided on Hay bluff brought with them dogs that killed sheep. They used abusive language —indeed, unparliamentary language—and threatened to burn down hay barns if farmers did not accede to their demands. Such a demand was made to a farmer when these people were cutting his fences. I remind the House that the cutting of fences is a serious matter for livestock farmers. It deprives them of the use of their land because their stock are no longer contained in the field.

The exclusion of such things as monuments is a weakness in the Bill. Many areas have monuments that the public like to visit. I believe that I am right in saying that such areas are excluded from the Bill.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Included within the definition of land are schedules of monuments within the meaning of the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979.

Mr. Livsey: I stand corrected.

The new clause will provide the police with the power to ensure protection against mass invasion. This is a problem area. The measure will not interfere with normal ramblers, bird watchers, or even courting couples. It certainly will not criminalise simple trespass; it will only criminalise mass invasion — an important distinction. One should realise that mass invasions intimidate the rural public in much the same way as the urban public is intimidated if police over-react and send too many officers to solve a problem. It is a matter of balance and we have to get it right. There is a happy medium of tolerance, and this clause provides it.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) mentioned the right of individuals to pursue certain life styles. I agree with him; it should be a fundamental right. But a difficulty arises when people pursue their life styles en masse. I shall give an analogy, having been a farm manager for part of my career. We always acceded to travellers' requests to stay the night on the farm. Indeed, we used to allow them to go into farm buildings. We welcomed them and provided them with a cup of tea, a bun, sandwiches, or whatever. They came every spring and autumn on their way around the British Isles. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Chris Smith) mentioned campers going on to private land and the possibility of a dispute. In my experience and in that of many other people engaged in farm management, any campers who approached a farmer and asked to erect their tents and stay the night on the land were generally made welcome. They are turfed off in exceptional circumstances, and I regard that as an intolerant attitude.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does my hon. Friend agree that, although many farmers would do exactly as he did and provide facilities for overnight campers, many farmers find it much more difficult to deal with gipsies? A particularly difficult problem in Wales is that, although some local authorities have provided sites for gipsies—such as my district council in Montgomeryshire—many have failed to do so, and the Welsh Office has been absurdly reluctant to designate those sites that have been provided.

Mr. Livsey: I agree. The Bill's great weakness is that provision has not been made for sites for travellers. We are considering some of the essentials needed for protection, but the lack of provision of sites for travelling people is a serious omission.

On the whole, the new clause provides a happy medium, achieving a balance between the rightful public interests and the interests of those who wish to protect their freedom as landowners. On the whole, the Bill strikes the right balance.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicester, North-West): I welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) to the Government Front Bench and to the firing line of the Bill in its late stages. I realise that at the eleventh hour a new offence has suddenly been thrust on us.

I recall an Adjournment debate in 1983, raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), in which I joined. My hon. Friend and I were appalled by the actions of a number of people who were travelling about the country in dilapidated vehicles, camping on property and damaging it. Between 1983 and 1986 the problem worsened. We saw with dismay what happened to farmer Attwell. There was a universal call for something to be done because it was clear that criminal offences were being committed. I wonder whether the creation of this trespassing offence will alter the position of people like farmer Attwell.

I understand that a large convoy caused great disruption in the west country. The police issued directions, the effect of which was to force people in the convoy to drive off the road, and they then went on to farmer Attwell's land. Criminal damage was done, yet no arrests were made and no one was brought before the courts. It appears that the wish of the police force was simply to move the people on, to keep them moving and to disperse them. I cannot envisage people involved in similar situations in the future being charged under the new clause. I foresee similar events occurring. The police will try to move people on and disperse them. I wonder whether the new clause will alleviate the problem.

I have been deeply concerned about the position of people travelling round the country and disrupting the lives of many others who are intent on carrying on normal life. It is right and proper that the Government should act, but I wonder why we have acted in this way. I cannot help but feel that the legislation is a blunderbuss where the accuracy of a rifle is needed. It has been introduced in a great hurry. As we all know, the worst legislation is always initiated when it is a reaction to certain events. This totally new legislation is a reaction to what happened in the summer in the west country. I accept that the police will face a great problem because they have never liked acting in the quasi-civil area of trespass. This new clause means that they will have to do so.

This is a ponderous, heavy-handed new clause. It contains rather unhelpful provisions, such as that dealing with "twelve or more vehicles" and that covering persons who have "caused damage to property on the land or used threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour".

Where in the Home Office is there the vision and understanding of what is required? We are the Parliament of the United Kingdom, not just of England. One need only go north, beyond the border, to see the good legislation which has been in place for some years and been seen to work. Has the Home Office ever looked at the Scottish law of criminal encampment? These ponderous references to "twelve or more vehicles", "threatening" behaviour, and so on, are the basis for the worst sort of legislation. There is the simple legislation of criminal encampment. The word "encampment" is redolent of all the problems with which we are trying to deal—large convoys causing mayhem and damage about the countryside and being harmful to many people.

I welcome the idea behind the legislation and recognise that something must be done, but we must be careful and realise that we do not want to harm those people who would normally be dealt with under the civil law. For years we have seen the signs, "Trespassers will be prosecuted" and laughed at them, realising that we could carry on once we paid our shilling—the total damages. The civil law could be applied if there were a serious trespass, but, by and large, it has been ignored.

I feel sure that in the Scottish law of criminal encampment we will find what this country requires. I shall not vote against the new clause because it is along the lines that I have outlined, but I shall not give it much of a life. I foresee that it will be unworkable, that it will be ignored and that eventually it will fall into disrepute or be repealed because it is found to be full of loopholes and hopeless. I welcome the measure because it will give lawyers much work, not in the magistrates courts but in the Court of Appeal where it will be interpreted. I must declare an interest. I foresee a marvellous amount of work for lawyers arising from it, and for that reason I welcome it.

I urge the Home Office to look beyond our borders to Scotland and the better legislation which has worked extremely well and been tried and tested. Let us look next Session at the criminal justice legislation, repeal this measure and put in its place something better from Scotland.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): I welcome the new clause and thank my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), the new Under-Secretary of State, for his patient and thoughtful response in the past few weeks to the difficult problem of the damage and disruption caused by mass trespass.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) asserted that past Conservative Ministers expressed the view that the present law was adequate to cope with this problem without the need for additional legislation. If the right hon. Gentleman had been more attentive on Report, he would have hard my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw) draw attention to the acknowledged deficiencies in the existing law of trespass. Indeed, my hon. Friend concluded his remarks on clause 14 with the sentence:

"I trust that it is not a state of law which we can allow to remain for much longer."—[Official Report, 30 April 1986; Vol. 96. c. 1054.]

The former Minister clearly had it in mind to bring forward an additional clause. I welcome the fact that he has fulfilled that promise.

I must draw attention to the fact that alliance Members have been very slow to wake up to this issue. It is, of course, welcome that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) supports the new clause. However, the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan)—the alliance spokesman in Committee—took no interest in this in Committee. Indeed, he not only opposed any amendment or extension to the Bill to deal with the problem of mass trespass, but expressed outright opposition to clause 14 which, at that time, was the only part of the Bill that might have been of some use to those affected. Although the alliance has climbed on to the bandwagon late, it is nevertheless welcome on board.

What concentrated the minds of alliance Members was the sight this summer of small farmers having to spend in excess of £1,000 each in unsuccessful attempts to protect their properties and livelihoods from being wrecked. Obviously, the most prominent case was that of Mr. Les Attwell, who comes from my county of Somerset. He is a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Boscawen) who has played a considerable part in achieving a satisfactory conclusion to that issue.

It must be stated repeatedly that the new clause is not creating a new offence of trespass; it is creating a new power to evict trespassers in certain circumstances. The criminal law will not come into effect until a chain of events has taken place. It will therefore not ensnare anyone but the most determined trespasser.

For a start, there has to be an original act of trespass. Secondly, there must be an intention to reside on the land in question. I am not altogether happy with the word "reside" because it can imply that there is an intention to stay for some considerable time. Thirdly, for a criminal act to be committed, the occupier has to ask the alleged trespasser to leave. Having fulfilled those three conditions, there has to be a threat of damage, disruption or harassment to the occupier or his family, or there must be more than 12 vehicles involved. Following that, a senior police officer has to ask the trespasser to leave the land in question and, lastly the trespasser has to refuse to leave the land. Only when those six conditions have been fulfilled will a criminal act have been committed. I do not think that that constitutes a ferocious extension of the criminal law.

I have a number of comparatively minor misgivings, and I would be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister could address them when he replies. Subsection 4*(b)* gives it as a defence for an alleged trespasser to show reasonable excuse for failing to leave the land in question. What does my hon. Friend understand "reasonable excuse" to mean? He may say that it is up to the courts to decide that. Is it, for instance, "reasonable excuse" for a trespasser to say that his vehicle has broken down or become unroadworthy? That is a very frequent excuse at present. It is common for those coming on to land to abandon or dump their vehicles and then claim that they cannot leave for that reason.

Secondly, I would like the Minister to say what is encompassed by his definition of "land" in the new clause. Is it, for instance, two adjacent fields? What would happen if trespassers were to withdraw from a field on one side of the road and immediately encamp in another field on the other side of the road? Is it land defined as belonging to one person or within the encompass of one farm? Is it land within one parish or area? These are important considerations. If there are loopholes, we can be quite certain that they will be discovered, because many of the potential trespassers—members of future peace convoys—have access to good legal advice, like anyone else, and they can tailor their activities accordingly.

Thirdly, I want to refer to the limit of 12 vehicles. It is all right if the 12 vehicles concerned are Mini Metros, but it is not all right if those vehicles are buses. There have been frequent occasions in my constituency when members of peace convoys—hippies, itinerants, or whatever they are called — came on to land and abandoned their vehicles, in which they then lived. They were not cars; they were old school buses and the like. One was a double-decker bus. Eleven double-decker buses, which would escape the clause, can constitute quite a party. In London we are used to seeing columns or convoys of double-decker buses. However, I hope that the new clause will not encourage columns of double-decker buses to constitute future peace convoys in Somerset.

Thes are comparatively minor points. The new clause is certainly welcomed by me and most of the people whom I represent. I hope very much that these will remain as reserve powers for use by the police on rare occasions. There are many legitimate and legal ways whereby people can enjoy camping and caravanning in the west country. The Bill, with the new clause, will be a means of serving notice on the minority of people who come to my part of the country and cause damage or disruption and with whom the law at present is inadequate to cope.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): We can recognise that the Home Office has been in some difficulties over the new clause. Indeed, I suspect that it has been very uncertain about the exact drafting that it wanted, because its views have changed so radically from the first part of the year.

I have a letter from the Home Office dated 23 April 1986 from which I would like to quote. I wrote to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary about the question of the trespass on Greenham Common in my constituency. I suggested that perhaps further powers were needed to correct that trespass. In his reply, the Home Secretary said:

> "The practical difficulties of drafting an offence which applies to land would be considerable, involving for example defining the nature of the land to be covered by the offence, and ensuring that the offence does not have effect beyond those justified by the mischief it is trying to prevent."

Since he wrote that letter in April, the Government and the Home Office have been spurred into action not by the trespass on Greenham Common but by the curious creation called the peace convoy of hippies which existed in an around Stonehenge and throughout the west country and which finally came to rest in the New Forest. For some reason that convoy caught the nation's and the Government's eye more effectively than the peace women. As a result of that hippie convoy we have this new clause.

Although I shall support the Government, I do not think that the new clause goes far enough. I shall test this clause against the narrow constituency example of what we have had to endure at Greenham Common from a trespass. I shall also point out to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) that his view that the civil law is adequate is far from the truth. Because of the statements by the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary at the time of the hippie convoy that the law of trespass would be looked at again and that they would bring forward new proposals when the Bill went to the House of Lords if they thought they could produce sufficient and adequate drafting, I took it upon myself to write to the Home Secretary. I suggested that perhaps what was required was an order of trespass which would enable the police to remove people who were in residence on common land unlawfully. As I have already said, I do not believe that the civil law is adequate or has been proved to be adequate to deal with this matter.

If for a moment I strike a frivolous note to make my point, I do so because I wish to quote from a satirical article that sums up what my constituency, especially around Greenham Common, has had to endure for five years. The article comes from Private Eye and it is entitled "This Romantic England". It reads:

> "The English countryside knows no more colourful sight than the groups of anorak-bedecked peace-women who traditionally cluster around the Greenham Common airbase in Berkshire. With their matted hair and muddy Wellingtons, these exotic creatures fill the air with their shrill cries of 'No cruise, no cruise' and 'We hate men'.
> And then, once a week, a strange ritual is enacted whose origins are lost in the mists of time.
> The burghers of Newbury send 'officials' to 'expel' the women from their traditional roosting ground.
> Amid much squeaking the burly bailiffs 'move in' to dismantle the primitive shelters in which the women and their offspring have made their squalid nests.
> All this is traditionally watched by a large group of local residents, who emerge from their large detached residences behind the rhododendrons and say things like 'About bloody time', 'They use our garden as a public toilet' and 'It's the least the council can do considering the rates we pay'.

[Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson]

A few minutes later, as the last cheers die away and the Council officials' Cortinas disappear down the leafy lane, the women re-emerge from the trees and begin the process of re-building their quaint shelters, from the traditional materials of PVC sheeting, chemical fertiliser bags and old copies of the Sunday Telegraph."

Although satirical, that is a remarkably accurate summing up of what we have had to endure during the past five years and what, to some extent, still exists, although at a much lower level.

I look at amendment No. 28 and ask myself how it will meet the problem of people who persist in a trespass knowing that they are breaking byelaws controlling the common land. I find myself wondering whether the amendment affects common land. It says in the clause that action can be taken only against those whose original entry on the land could constitute a trespass. By its very definition, that cannot mean common land, because there is no trespass in walking or being on common land. Therefore, the first and necessary condition for proving trespass does not seem to exist in terms of the Greenham women and those like them who choose to take up residence on common land.

We then come to the question of residence, as opposed to simply being on common land. My constituents have never objected to the one-day demonstrations around Greenham by the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. They recognise, as I do, that to be able to protest is one of the essential freedoms that a parliamentary democracy enjoys. They have objected to residence on the common land which is taken up by those women with their so-called claim to be doing something to maintain world peace.

The peace women do not go in for one-day demonstrations. They have been with us in larger or smaller numbers since 1981. They have cost an additional £4 million in policing and have been guilty of more than 1,000 offences, including about 300 offences of criminal damage. Throughout, they have been guilty of illegal possession of common land. When I look at what "land" is said to mean in this new clause, there is no reference to it being common land, although there is reference to the "occupier".

It may be that I am wrong to believe that this clause relates entirely to private land where there is clearly an owner and an occupier. However, I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would clear up that point. I for one would like to believe that common land, which is in a sense the possession of all the people of this country, is just as precious to us as anything owned by a private individual and that those who seek to break the byelaws which govern the conduct of all of us so that we may enjoy common land are as much trespassers as those who choose to put their vehicles or themselves on private land.

In the amendment there is the requirement of 12 or more vehicles to prove the trespass. There is also the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) which states that that number should be reduced to four. I find it difficult to understand why any number should be selected. Anybody who has been to Greenham will know that one vehicle can create a considerable nuisance and make my constituents write to me asking what I am doing to get the women off the common or when the Government Departments which own bits of that land will do something to shift them.

I have also noticed that the word "vehicles" covers both motor vehicles and caravans. I hope that those in the Home Office who drafted this clause are aware that the Greenham women, although they do have vehicles, generally live in what are called benders. Benders are structures made of wood and PVC sheeting. Therefore, this clause could not touch their structures at all. There may be a good reason for that; it may be impossible to define what a bender is. However, if somebody had chosen to come to Greenham they might have learnt some useful and practical lessons as to exactly how people live who choose to trespass on land. They do not necessarily require motor vehicles.

I have to say that, although I will support this clause, I cannot do so wholeheartedly unless my hon. Friend can tell me that my misgivings about it not applying to common land are out of place. I want him to think again about the number of vehicles necessary to prove an offence and take into account the fact that those who trespass in this way do not necessarily live in motor vehicles or caravans but can live in other structures which can cause just as much inconvenience and unhappiness to those who have to suffer the trespass as anything else he may have thought of.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): There can be no doubt that some action is required. Following the incident at Cannock Chase, paragraph 56 of the police report stated:

"The state of the site, an acknowledged beauty spot, was appalling. It was littered with debris of all kinds, there was human excreta all about the area, many trees had been broken down or otherwise damaged and there was evidence (from cigarette ends, syringes, etc.) of the use of drugs. The County Council—

I remind the House that it was a Labour county council—

"were compelled to declare the area a health hazard . . . and it was closed off to the public for six weeks while the debris was cleared away and the excreta decomposed by natural processes."

Any Government who failed to take action to prevent that type of affront would be derelict in their duty. For that reason, I must immediately disagree with the contention of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) that the present law is sufficient. Clearly, it is not.

The House must determine whether the remedy of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is the right one. Many hon. Members who served on the Committee will agree that it is wrong to criminalise trespass. The police have certainly resisted that. We wrestled with this matter in Committee and at a meeting at Scotland Yard attended by many senior police officers, who wanted action, but who did not wish to criminalise trespass and turn the police into the bailiffs of private landowners.

It is important for the House to know what some senior police officers would prefer. They do not want a power to enter land and throw off trespassers and damagers. They want some pre-emptive power to prevent trespassers from entering the land in the first place. Their attitude is coloured by their knowledge that the police will meet with resistance if they enter land where people have already established themselves and where frequently those people may be under the influence of alcohol or drugs and will certainly be in a state of high excitement. Many police officers are injured when they must undertake that duty.

The Government's approach is, not to provide a power for the police or others to pre-empt the occupation of land by those who may damage it, but to provide a power whereby, once the trespass has taken place and the encampment has been set up, the police may enter the land and, if the conditions of the amendment are met, require the people to leave.

It is worth quoting the views of the chief constable of Staffordshire who, after the Cannock incident, said:

"What is really needed is some statutory power for the Police to take action of a preventive nature to stop these people entering onto land unlawfully. Quite frankly, once they have entered onto land the harm has been done because it is then necessary to go through the protracted civil process to evict them."

While I shall support the Government, I should have preferred it if they had given the police the power to deal with the mischief before it happens rather than after it has happened.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): As my hon. Friend represents the Police Federation, can he say whether it is within the powers of the police force as the law stands to enforce the Road Traffic Acts as regards the roadworthiness of vehicles? In that way the police could largely take pre-emptive action. Is it not the case that often these vehicles are plainly in contravention of those Acts as they are flagrantly unlicensed, uninsured or unroadworthy?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Yes, indeed, and from time to time the police take action under the Acts. But they are always in a dilemma. If they take action on the highways to deal with convoys under the Road Traffic Acts or the Road Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1986 they will frequently inconvenience gravely large numbers of other motorists who are going about their business by creating large traffic jams. Ironically, sometimes the police must allow a hippie convoy to proceed in order not to create an even worse traffic problem by holding it up at a particular point. Usually the police must balance their actions with common sense.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister, whom I am delighted to see on the Front Bench, will respond to my general point in his reply. I now wish to make two further points.

I agree with hon. Members who have said that the definition of 12 vehicles is unfortunate. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson), I would have preferred no specific number. It should be the number of vehicles sufficient to create nuisance or damage. Once the number is defined, absurd situations arise. For example, the police would be helpless if a group of people took 11 vehicles onto public or private land, if those 11 vehicles did not cause damage, for example if they remained on the road, and if the people driving those vehicles did not use threatening or abusive language. Under the new clause, the police cannot act where 11 vehicles are involved. It would be far better, not to amend the number to four or to keep the number 12, but simply to say that if vehicles are in a number which causes damage, the police may act.

My final point is precise, but I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will understand that the police are a precise group of people. I wish to draw his attention to the text of the amendment. Lords amendment No. 28(1) refers to "the senior police officer"who must reasonably believe "that two or more persons have entered land as trespassers". He triggers the action. He is not a senior police officer, but the senior police officer present. He may be a constable or a sergeant. But under subsection (3), only a constable in uniform may make an arrest.

On some occasions a senior detective officer, such as an inspector or a superintendent, returning home from duty or passing by in the course of work for the CID or Special Branch, may come across a group of people who are committing an offence. It would be his absolute duty as a police officer on duty to take action under this Lords amendment. What is he to do? Is he to say that he cannot effect an arrest until he returns to the police station and puts on his uniform? If my hon. Friend the Minister means that only a police officer in uniform can take action under this new clause, he should say so in both subsections (1) and (3). Then everyone, including the right hon. Member for Gorton, will understand where we stand.

The discrepancy between subsection (1), which specifies a senior police officer, who may well be a plainclothesman, and subsection (3), which specifies that a uniformed man must carry out the arrest, creates an anomaly which a precise service, such as the police service, will not find comfortable. I very much hope that the Minister will clear up that matter, so that, in future, there will be no circumstances in which a police officer, doing his duty—though a member of CID in plain clothes—is made a fool of by lawyers who attend to many of the peace convoys, simply because he was not in uniform.

7.30 pm

Mr. Sayeed: The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) suggested that this clause could be used to persecute those who lead an alternative life style and that that would be wrong. He would be absolutely right if this clause were to be used in such a manner. That is not the purpose, nor the way that the clause will work. What it will do is stop those who are leading an alternative life style from destroying the life styles of other people. Therefore, I welcome this new clause, which I believe is long overdue.

I am delighted that a reluctant Home Office has been forced to change its mind. My hon. Friend the Minister will be aware that I discussed the matter with his colleagues in the Home Office, with the Lord Chancellor and also with the Secretary of State for the Environment. Until recently, I got nowhere.

This clause is deficient in a number of ways, and I regret that subsections (1)(a) and (1)(b) are included. Those provisions mean that if persons are well-mannered and do not cause damage and provided that there are fewer than 12 vehicles in an encampment, they cannot be caught by the clause. Such persons can come on to land, be perfectly polite, not cause damage, have 11 double-decker buses and 50 tents and still not be caught.

I am not especially happy with the definition of "land". I believe that it includes common land, but I wish to draw the Minister's attention to two examples about which I wrote to him a few weeks ago. I have not had an answer from his Department. One concerns a group of people —they are not gipsies or hippies; let us say they are tinkers—who are currently living under the M32 flyover in Bristol. I do not see how this clause will do anything about them. The other example concerns the premises of John Wright on the Bath road that have been virtually destroyed by people encamped in seven vehicles on the land adjoining the premises. Of course, it is hard to prove that those people did the damage.

The current law is ineffective. It is too slow and expensive. Despite what some right hon. and hon. Members have said, I believe that the police are in favour of a toughening of their powers, especially those who are in daily contact with the public. They are sick and tired of being cursed by the public for not having the power to take action. The encampments—just in the past year I have had nine in my constituency—have caused immense distress, anger and fear. The Minister should be aware of the fact that I have had to dissuade some of my constituents from fire-bombing caravans, because they are so bitter that they have been totally unable to get rid of some of these ragamuffins who cause so much distress.

The new clause is pre-emptive. I am absolutely certain that if this clause had not been brought forward—even with its existing faults—someone would soon have died.

Mr. Cash: Some months ago the problem of the peace convoy started off in Staffordshire. Many of my constituents were affected by the goings-on of those members of the peace convoy who first came to Cannock Chase. I am sure the right hon. Member for Gorton will remember—I hope that he will not want to forget this point in view of his remarks about the value of this clause—that the problem originated in the Labour-controlled county council in Staffordshire. I made a phone call to the chief constable of Staffordshire requesting him to provide the type of information to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) referred. The chief constable provided compelling evidence of drugs, abuse of people in the vicinity of my constituency, theft and the most appalling behaviour. All that needed to be brought under control.

I found the remarks of the right hon. Member for Gorton singularly inept in view of the fact that he knew, because the leader of Staffordshire county council arranged either to meet or speak to him on this subject, that this provision was brought about as a result of the actions of the county council in Staffordshire, actions which I thoroughly supported. Yet he now proposes to vote against the provision.

I notice that the right hon. Member for Gorton is fidgeting on the Front Bench. He has good reason to fidget, because he knows that he is about to let down the ratepayers of Staffordshire who elected a Labour county council. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will bear that in mind when this matter is reported in the local press, as I know that it will be.

The ratepayers of Staffordshire had to fork out more than £80,000 as a result of the peace convoy's activities. They took a very dim view of that. Farmers had a great deal of trouble from the peace convoy, whose members stole their produce, invaded their land and caused a great deal of fear and trepidation in the villages in that vicinity.

The Association of Chief Police Officers kindly met a number of Conservative Members from the area. In addition the Home Secretary, the former Minister—my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw)—and two under-secretaries were good enough to have meetings with us. We also had meetings with the County Landowners Association and the National Farmers Union.

The combined effects of those meetings and the proceedings in Standing Committee convinced me, and I believe most right-minded people, that these new provisions were required. I can only say that it is a pity that we had to wait for consideration of Lords amendments to have a provision of this kind brought forward, as this prevents us from discussing it in the detail that it deserves.

I have some sympathy with the concern that has been expressed by my hon. Friends with regard to the number of vehicles and, frankly, I would have preferred that there should be no limit on the number of vehicles. I feel strongly that these provisions are required and that they impose a minimum deterrent test. They will be extremely helpful to the police. They represent common sense and will be used to help both my constituents and those of other hon. Members.

Mr. Hind: I reject the suggestion by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) that we should have done nothing about the convoy problem. The problem was created last summer, and we must find a remedy. The clause is aimed at convoys. It is impossible to stretch it to cover other matters. Last summer the farmers had to use the High Court procedure, which is slow and cumbersome. This is a quick and cheap remedy. The problem can be dealt with quickly by police intervention before the situation becomes worse and the convoys move on.

Two obvious problems are created by the clause. The first relates to vehicles parked on a highway, whether it be a bridleway, footpath or whatever. Police officers will have to bear in mind that they are dealing either with an offence under the new clause or obstruction—an offence under section 137 of the Highways Act 1980. They will have to decide whether the offence is committed on land adjacent to the highway or on the highway itself. Whatever they decide, an offence is committed and the police will have to decide whether to move the convoy on and to arrest, if necessary.

The second problem is that the proposed new clause does not deal with common land. Subsection (1) says that if

"two or more persons have entered land as trespassers and are present there with the common purpose of residing there for any period," the police may direct them to leave that land.

The right to pass and re-pass applies to common land. The new clause cannot apply to that. Even if a person commits damage on a later occasion, contrary to the rights of common, the new clause cannot apply. With respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson), the proposed new clause would not be appropriate to deal with the Greenham common problem, although I bow to the greater experience of my hon. Friend the Minister.

The clause is intended to deal with the convoy problem. It is much needed. Postponed deliberation until the next Session would mean that when the convoys move again the old laws will still be the only way of dealing with them. That will be expensive for farmers.

The small farmers in west Lancashire will agree that, although the proposition is not ideal, it is better than nothing. I shall vote for it tonight and look for improvements in the next Session.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: With the leave of the House, I shall attempt to answer the various arguments. I am conscious of the fact that the House wishes to move to a Division, so I shall reply as quickly as I can. If I ignore some points, I hope hon. Members will appreciate that no discourtesy is intended.

The speech by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) demonstrated, as do most of his speeches, that his skills are essentially of the silver plate variety. They are showy and patchy, and after a time they wear thin. The right hon. Gentleman said that he was deeply sympathetic to farmer Attwell, but he concluded that nothing should be done. I suppose that is preferable to his normal solution, which is that, although he is sympathetic to a victim, he wants to do that victim positive harm.

The right hon. Gentleman contended that the civil procedure was sufficient. It is not. I agree with my hon. Friends the Members for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson), for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) and for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed). The civil law is not, and never can be, an adequate remedy. It cannot be quick enough. The person who suffers an injustice has to find a lawyer, the proceedings have to be drafted and served, a judicial appointment has to be procured and a hearing undertaken. In any event it is necessary to give at least 24 hours notice before implementation to enable a defendant to make representations. The procedures that we suggest are cheap, expeditious and effective. I agree with those hon. Members who have stressed that using the civil procedure requires money. I propose the new clause as a greatly preferred option.

The right hon. Member for Gorton made a number of bad points about the ability of police officers to form a judgment. He asks how they are to determine whether offensive or abusive action, or damage, has occurred. Police officers have to determine such actions every day of their working lives. He asks how they are to determine whether a person is a trespasser. He should have thought of that earlier, because in 1977 he was a member of a Government who passed the Criminal Law Act, which applies the same test — an officer has to determine whether a person is a trespasser.

The right hon. Gentleman also said that the new clause puts an onus on the defendant. It does nothing of the sort. The prosecution must prove every element of the offence. The right hon. Gentleman belly-ached about gipsies. The purpose of the new clause is not to harass innocent gipsies. However, if gipsies create the nuisance contemplated by the Bill, I see no reason why it should not be extended to cover them.

The right hon. Gentleman suggests two amendments to the new clause. He suggests that the power to give a direction to leave should be confined to an inspector or someone of higher rank. Once again the Labour party demonstrates that it has no understanding of the rural areas. In many areas it is difficult enough to find a sergeant, never mind an inspector.

Mr. Kaufman: Whose fault is that?

Mr. Hogg: It is no good the right hon. Gentleman supposing that he has found a point, because I can remind him of the number of police that we have added to the force since 1979. If we were to agree to the amendment, the provision would be of no benefit to people in the rural areas, which I believe is what the right hon. Gentleman wishes to bring about.

The right hon. Gentleman's second amendment is even more preposterous. He suggests that we remove from the Bill the provision that makes it an offence for a trespasser to re-enter land within three months. What nonsense. If we agreed to that, any offender could play cat and mouse. The direction to leave will be given, the man will toddle to the pub and toddle back again and no offence will be committed. That is absurd. The right hon. Gentleman does not want to solve the problem. He is all hot words and nothing else.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) first asked how clause 5 ties up with clause 39 and whether those who protest against fox hunting and the like will be caught by the provision. Clause 39 will not apply as a general proposition, because those who protest against fox hunting do not normally have a common intention to reside. On the other hand, and in specific circumstances, some of the other clauses may apply, for example clause 5. Therefore, although I cannot give him every consolation, the Bill contains material which would remedy what he and I believe to be an abuse.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) is a slightly unsatisfactory case, as are most Liberals. His position is: "Well, it is a jolly good Bill, but I am sorry you rushed it." Let us consider what that means. If the farmer Attwell case recurred next year and we had done nothing, the hon. and learned Gentleman would toddle along to this place and accuse the Government of being dilatory. He cannot have it both ways. We have taken prompt action to resolve a mischief.

Incidentally, the House is used by now to a division of opinion between the Social Democratic party and the Liberal party. Here is another interesting example — a division within the Liberal party itself. On the one hand the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) is giving the Bill a warm welcome, saying that it is a happy medium, and on the other hand the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery is belly-aching and whining. There is an interesting distinction between the two.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) asked several questions, and I shall deal first with the question of property. I feel like a law student being asked to respond to a number of legal questions.

We have adopted a definition of property that is to be found in section 10(1) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. Damage does not include damage to mushrooms growing wild on any land, or to the flowers, fruit or foliage of a plant growing wild. Damage to grass growing wild is thus excluded, but damage to grass grown as a crop, or other crops, is included. For that matter, damage to a tree or to a hedge itself is damage to property, whereas stripping off the leaves would not be damage.

Mr. Soley: What about a window box?

Mr. Hogg: I do not know about the hon. Gentleman's window box, and unless it is a very big window box I do not suppose that people would wish to reside there.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) joined his right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton in belly-aching. He asked how a police officer could know whether someone was residing for any period.

[Mr. Hogg]

That phrase is taken from the Caravan Sites Act 1968, which was passed by a Government whom, I have no doubt, he supported. The hon. Gentleman raised another question about the validity of the direction. If a direction is invalid, no offence is made out. However, that is an issue for the courts. I draw his attention also to the specific defences provided for in subsection (4).

My hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) raised two questions, which I shall deal with separately. His first question related to subsection (1)(a), namely, who is covered by the concept of abuse to the occupier, to members of his family or to his agents? He questioned the position of public authorities especially. Members of the authority's staff, and others who are authorised to act on behalf of the authority, are covered by the subsection.

My hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin and my hon. Friends the Members for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), for Newbury, for Bury St. Edmunds and for Stafford (Mr. Cash), raised the question of setting the limit at 12. I understand their point perfectly well. In the end it is a balancing exercise and a matter of judgment. However, the criteria set out in subsection (1)(a) are alternatives to those set out in subsection (1)(b), or, to put it the other way round, paragraph (b) is an alternative to paragraph (a). We take the view that 12 or more constitutes a nuisance in itself, whereas less than that number would not necessarily do so. However, if there were fewer than 12, that might well trigger the powers under paragraph (a). I can only describe it as a balance, but I hope that I have my hon. Friends' support on this matter.

The comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) were most helpful. I do not follow him in his enthusiasm for Scotland. Although a Lowland Scot by origin, I prefer the law of England. However, there is a more serious point. He said that the provision was ponderous and heavy-handed. We are seeking to strike a balance between the rights of farmers and those of people to whom we do not wish to attach the consequences of the Bill. In making a balance, we are bound to draft criteria and distinctions. I hope that my hon. Friend will feel that we have done so fairly.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wells asked several questions. He was right to emphasise that the new clause does not create a new offence of criminal trespass. However, failure to comply with a police officer's direction would be an offence.

My hon. Friend asked the meaning of "reasonable excuse". He anticipated part of my reply, namely, that it is up to the courts. My interpretation is that if a person says, "I cannot get off the land because my bus is broken," that would not constitute a reasonable excuse. I would regard that as nonsense. However, a reasonable excuse might well arise if, for example, someone was tending another person who was ill or seriously injured. Clearly these are matters for the courts to determine in particular cases.

My hon. Friend also raised a difficult question about land, and I can assist him in this matter. Land will be covered by the Bill, even if it comprises adjacent fields or fields on the opposite sides of the road if those separate parcels of land are owned or rented by the same person.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury made a helpful speech, and to some extent I can assist him as well. Land will include common land, and common land is thus covered by the Bill. He also made an important point about benders. If people are residing on the land in the circumstances that my hon. Friend described, there would be no difficulty in a police officer holding that they entered with the common intent to reside. Having said that, I hope that I have persuaded my hon. Friend to give us not qualified, but unqualified, support in the Lobby.

As I would have expected, the interesting and difficult speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds raised points which are attractive and which concern the Government. He raised two points — the need for a pre-emptive power, and the anomaly between the senior police officer and the arresting officer. I shall deal with them separately. Yes, the pre-emptive power has a charm, but it gives rise to considerable difficulties. Once people are on the land, a judgment can be formed as to whether the criteria are satisfied. It is less easy when they are merely poised intending to enter.

On uniforms, yes, there is a difference between the senior officer and the arresting officer. I would say only that in the public order context it is desirable that the arresting officer should be in uniform and, as a matter of practice, that will not create a problem.

To my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East, I give my apologies for not having replied to his letter and I simply re-emphasise that common land is covered by the Bill. I am grateful to my hon. Friends the Members for Stafford and for Lancashire, West for their support.

To my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West I would only say that we have decided not to extend the Bill to highways, partly because they are already covered by legislation, and partly because the element of damage which would arise from sitting on highways is not nearly as great as the element of damage on other types of land.

I fear that I have gone on somewhat longer than I intended, but I have tried to deal with all the points made by hon. Members. I hope that the House will regard the new clause as a balanced and proper approach to an urgent and pressing problem.

Amendment (a) negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment. — [Mr. Douglas Hogg.]

Question accordingly agreed to.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise for raising a point of order and taking up the time of the House, but I shall be brief.

Yesterday evening during the debate on the Housing and Planning Bill I moved, on behalf of the Opposition and other parties, that we should support the other place in the amendment that was carried against the Government the previous week on the issue of the right to buy properties specifically designed and suitable for elderly people. The Government challenged us on that and the Lords amendment was overturned. Earlier this evening, the other place, by a substantial majority of 24 votes, stuck to its original demand. It behoves us on behalf of all hon. Members to ask the Government to make a statement about their intentions.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

As a result of the vote about which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) has spoken, and given that last night it was made clear that the Government had no objection in principle to a reverse —a reverse that has now taken place in the other House —could the Leader of the House tell us whether the Government will now accept what the other place has done to the Bill?

The decision in the other place has two major and important results. The first is that there should be no further risk of the matter going backwards and forwards between the two Houses. Secondly, we are already under substantial time pressure between now and the proposed end of the Session on Friday. Some Bills from the other place are arriving here a day later for amendments to be considered. It would be procedurally difficult at best, although not impossible, for this Bill to come back, given that there would be a further substantial debate in this House. Yesterday the amendments were the subject of a most substantial debate that lasted for almost a couple of hours. The debate would last even longer if the Bill were to come back.

The Government have been defeated twice by substantial majorities, and earlier they accepted the principle of defeat. Can the Leader of the House tell us whether they will gracefully accept that they have lost on this issue and that old people will be exempted from having their homes taken out of the public sector? That would be justice.

8.15 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I do not want to inject any element of controversy into the evening, but I hope that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) will take a few lessons from the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) who made an effective interjection on a point of order and apologised for impeding another debate. For the reasons given by those two hon. Gentlemen, this matter requires a speedy resolution. A decision will be announced in the House quite soon, through the usual channels.

Clause 35

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS; REPEALS

Lords amendment: No. 29, in page 21, line 1, leave out subsections (1) to (4) and insert—

"(1) The provisions of this Act extend to England and Wales except so far as they—

(a) amend or repeal an enactment which does not so extend, or

(b) relate to the extent of provisions to Scotland or Northern Ireland.

(2) The following provisions of this Act extend to Scotland—in Part I, section 9(2) except paragraph (a);

in Part II, sections 12 and 14 to 16;

Part III;

Part V, except sections (Contamination of or interference with goods with intention of causing public alarm or anxiety, &c.), (Power to direct trespassers to leave), 33 (4), subsections (1) and (3) of this section and any provision amending or repealing an enactment which does not extend to Scotland.

(3) The following provisions of this Act extend to Northern Ireland—sections (Contamination of or interference with goods with intention of causing public alarm or anxiety, &c.), 34, this subsection, section 36 and paragraph 6A of Schedule 2."

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment is essentially technical and requires no amplification.

Consideration of Lords Amendment in lieu of Lords Amendment to which this House has disagreed, Lords Amendment to Commons Amendment in lieu of Lords Amendment to which this House has disagreed and Lords consequential Amendments, considered.

New Clause

FUNCTIONS OF LOCAL AUTHORITIES WITH RESPECT TO PERSONS WHO ARE HOMELESS OR THREATENED WITH HOMELESSNESS

The Lords do not insist on their Amendment to insert a new Clause after Clause 19 to which the Commons have disagreed but propose the following Amendment in lieu thereof, after clause 19, insert the following new Clause—

".—(1) The Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 shall be amended in accordance with the following provisions of this section.

(2) In section 1(2) (homeless persons and persons threatened with homelessness) after paragraph (c) there shall be inserted the following paragraph—

"(d) it is overcrowded as defined in section 89 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1966 and may endanger the health of the occupants."

(3) In section 4 (duties of housing authorities to homeless persons and persons threatened with homelessness) after subsection (6) there shall be inserted the following subsection—

"(7) Where a local authority has a duty under subsections (4) and (5) above "accommodation" shall be defined as accommodation that shall not be overcrowded as defined in section 89 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1966 and which does not pose a threat to the health of the occupants."."

8.17 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment is the combination of lengthy and constructive discussions in the House and in another place on the likely effect of a decision by the Law Lords on an appeal under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act, which has become known as the Puhlhofer case. Hon. Members will recall that earlier we discussed an amendment proposed by the other place to the Act when we last considered the Bill on 2 July. The Government were unable to agree to that earlier amendment because, as I explained at the time, we felt that it would give rise to problems of interpretation and would impose excessive additional duties on local authorities. I also made it clear at that time that the amendment was unnecessary because no substantial evidence had been produced to support the allegations that the Law Lords judgment was having an adverse effect on the prospects of homeless people.

I accept that this new amendment is intended to meet our criticisms of the earlier version and that it has been altered in order to do so. It goes a considerable way towards removing the objections that I raised at that time. I also accept that there are strong feelings in the House and in another place that, whatever the evidence, we should take steps now to resolve any possible adverse consequences arising from the Law Lords' decision in the Puhlhofer case rather than wait to see whether the decision has any effect and respond at a later date.

Under those conditions, and given that the amendment is a considerable improvement on the earlier version, I am prepared to accept it. As I said in July, we will continue to monitor the position. In addition, we are about to launch a research project to look at the way in which local authorities operate the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act and to assess how the system meets the needs of the homeless. We must reserve the right to return with alternative proposals at some stage if it emerges that the amendment is giving rise to significant difficulties. For the present, I believe that the intention of the amendment is clear and that the worst defects of the earlier version have been removed. Therefore, I recommend that the amendment be agreed to.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): From his point of view, the Minister has made the best of rather a bad job. It should be recognised that the Government have not suddenly agreed to this course out of the bigness and goodness of their heart. When the House was considering Lords amendments to the Housing and Planning Bill on the night before the Bill that is before us was considered in another place, a similar, but not exactly the same, amendment was passed.

As the Minister said last night during the course of our consideration of the Housing and Planning Bill, he is a great one for uniformity. He believes that there should be this example of uniformity between England, Wales and Scotland and that we should not be out of step. I note from the response to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) that the Minister does not go for uniformity between Scotland and England when it comes to old folks' housing that has been occupied by the elderly. The definition that applies to that housing in England is much wider than that which applies in Scotland, and I am sure that many authorities in Scotland would wish to be able to apply the same definition.

We welcome the Government's change of mind, however much it has been forced upon them. It can be said that a change of mind has been forced upon the Minister by circumstances which have been out of control. We welcome the fact that he has at last accepted some form of resolution of the Puhlhofer judgment.

The resolution may not be perfect—I am sure that it will prove not to be so—and problems may arise, and if that is the position the Government will have to bring the issue back to the House. If the amendment that is before us is one that the Minister believes to be necessary, we could have saved ourselves much parliamentary time if he had drafted and moved a similar amendment in Committee or on Report. He could have taken steps to arrange for such an amendment to be moved in another place. It is a fact that he has been forced reluctantly to accept the amendment that is before us.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman is basing much of his argument on uniformity, and I suggest that he examines the equivalent English amendment. If he does so, he will find that the Scottish amendment is different.

Mr. Maxton: The Minister is normally better at listening to arguments. I made the point that he has raised when I said that the Scottish amendment was not exactly the same as the English amendment. The basic case, however, is the same. The Puhlhofer decision was overturned in another place. To use the words that I employed earlier, a similar though different amendment came before the other place when it was considering the Bill, and the Government had to accept it because they knew that the Bill would fall if they resisted it. If they had opposed the amendment in another place, they would have been unable to bring the matter back to this place. Therefore, they were forced to accept the amendment. The amendment meets what the Opposition have been suggesting for a long time, and I am glad that the Minister has at last come to the same conclusion as ourselves.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): On behalf of the alliance, I am pleased that the Minister has accepted the amendment. I do not wish to be other than pleased that we have reached this position, especially as the Act to which we are referring is the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, which was piloted through the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross). It is one of the most used Acts to face Members week by week and it is my experience that it is the one that is quoted most often at me.

The argument which led to the amendment turned on an issue which could have seriously undermined the effectiveness of what has proved to be a useful Act. Without the amendment, local authorities would have been allowed to house homeless persons in sub-standard property. I am sorry that the issue had to go backwards and forwards between this House and another place, but I am glad that at the end of the day there is agreement on the amendment in its final form. In the circumstances, I think that every one of us should be satisfied that on a rare occasion—too rare an occasion—we have achieved a real and genuine alteration to a Bill as it has proceeded within and between the two Houses.

Now that we are close to Prorogation, it is somewhat ironic that it is the unelected House that has managed to encapsulate the views of the people's representatives rather than the elected House. If this place had not had to take account of the views and amendments of another place, it might have tried to streamroller through Parliament the original provision. In this instance the existence of an upper House has proved to be effective. I am not sure how often during this Session it has defeated the Government, but it has done so on many more occasions than we have in this place. The Minister commented to me informally before we embarked on these debates that long may the other place continue to do so because there lies his future career.

We have made a bit of a meal out of this issue, but we have secured a good amendment. The Government have accepted it and I am sure that the House is pleased that they have done so. I can only hope that the next amendment will proceed with the same speed and degree of support.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I welcome the Government's acceptance of the amendment. I intended to make the same comment as the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), that the Government have been driven to accept it by the onset of Prorogation. I remember the hostility that the Minister showed towards taking any action of the sort outlined in the amendment when we debated the matter at an earlier stage of the Bill's passage. All I can do at this late stage is to welcome the Minister's sudden conversion and acceptance of the persuasive arguments that we and many lobbyists have advanced on the need for a statutory measure to take care of the huge hole which was blown in the original legislation by another place when it acted in its judicial capacity.

Question put and agreed to.

Amendment of 1980 Act

Lords Amendment: No. 2, in line 2, at end insert—

", or from the date of first being registered by the Housing Corporation (whichever is the later),"

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

I hope that in discussing the amendment the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) will make the same sort of speech as he made last night when he referred to the standing of the Conservative party in the polls in Scotland. The effect of that was to raise the standing of my party by six percentage points. I hope that he will feel able to do the same for us today.

The amendment was tabled in another place by the Earl of Perth. He said that he supported the right to buy, except in a number of limited areas. The amendment exempts from the right to buy houses belonging to charitable associations which may form after 14 November 1985, and accordingly it has a limited scope. It is not a fundamental change and it will not affect the rights of any existing tenants. Indeed, it will not affect the rights of many future tenants, because there is already a range of exemptions for small associations and for houses for special needs. These exemptions will apply to many of the houses provided by such new charitable housing associations as may form in future.

The amendment raises the prospect of increased administrative controls over the registration and funding of new associations. We shall need to ensure that new associations are not used as devices to avoid the right to buy and do not provide houses that could be more appropriately provided by associations which are within the right to buy provisions. I hope that it will be possible to devise these terms in such a way as will leave the existing wide range of activities of the present charitable associations largely untouched. The controls will lie primarily with the Housing Corporation, which already has the necessary powers.

I have to say that matters would have been simpler without the amendment, but, as it has been introduced and will have a relatively minor effect, we do not seek to remove it. As the Earl of Perth said, the amendment is a new idea which did not arise in the long debates that took place in this House or in another place. It is new material. On the basis that I have described, I recommend that the amendment be agreed to.

Mr. Maxton: This is the final farce of the Bill. Although we are delighted that at this late stage the Government are prepared to accept this final amendment on charitable status housing associations, it was a long, weary fight to get them to do so. In the first instance, the only charitable housing associations which were to be exempted were those which had registered offices in England or Wales under the Charities Act. In Committee, the Government agreed that any charitable association recognised as such by the Inland Revenue before 1980 would be exempt from the Bill. The other place passed an amendment similar to, although not exactly the same as, this one—there are differences between similar to and exactly the same as, I point out to the Minister—which extended it essentially to all housing associations, both present and future, recognised as charities. The Government overturned that in this place and insisted that there should be a change. They were prepared to extend the date from 3 October 1980 to 14 November 1985.

8.30 pm

We have finally come to a solution that the Government are prepared to accept. It is that all those housing associations registered as charities before 14 November 1985 will remain exempt from the clauses of the Bill. Any future associations which are able to obtain charitable recognition from the Housing Corporation will again be exempt. Essentially, that leaves us with three housing associations in the whole of Scotland that will not be covered, although they are recognised by the Inland Revenue as charities.

The first is Gowrie in Dundee, which is a small housing association with fewer than 100 houses and so exempt under another part of the Bill. The second is Edinvar, where again many of the houses will be exempt because they are for special needs. The third is the Link housing association, which works largely in Edinburgh. Despite all the changes that the Minister has made, he has achieved what he set out to achieve—to allow tenants of the Link housing association the right to buy the houses at a discount.

On Second Reading, my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and I made the point that the Bill is the "Lord James Douglas-Hamilton Benefit Bill". It is designed to try to save the Conservative Member of Parliament for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton), who has a small majority, but has in his constituency the Link housing association houses at Barnton. The Link housing association gave its tenants the right to buy but was not prepared to give them discounts. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West wanted them to have discounts, so that, as a Conservative Government had introduced the Bill and given tenants that right, his seat would be saved.

Mr. Ancram rose—

Mr. Maxton: I am happy to give way to the hon. Gentleman, because I do not see what other explanation there can be.

Mr. Ancram: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is not trying to mislead the House, but he is giving the impression that in only one housing association will the right to buy be exercised. He will be aware, as he is well experienced in housing association matters, that there are 50 housing associations in which the right to buy will now be statutorily available.

Mr. Maxton: Again, had the Minister been listening, he would have known that I made it clear that this concerns three housing associations recognised as charities. All the rest which are recognised as charities will not be exempted and large numbers of others will have the right to buy.

Mr. Ancram: Link operates in other constituencies.

Mr. Maxton: I recognise that point, but the basic point remains. This was all about the housing association in Barnton in the first place.

I find it astonishing that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West is not here to take part in the debate. It would have been appropriate for the Secretary of State, just for once, to have allowed his PPS to come to the House to make his "thank you" speech to the House and the Ministers for allowing this to take place. It has been an abuse of the House and of the other place that so much time has been spent on Second Reading, in Committee, on Report, on Third Reading and on the procedures through the other place, back here once and back again, just to ensure that the tenants in the Link housing association, among all the other housing associations, should have the right to buy.

This process comes close to gerrymandering a constituency—using the power of the House to save one Member of Parliament. The mess into which the Minister has got himself about the charitable status of housing associations is such that it would be better, even at this late stage, to withdraw that part of the Bill and start again next year. He should treat the matter in that way because he has got himself into a ludicrous position. I know that he will not withdraw the amendment, but I wish that he had the courage to do so.

Mr. Bruce: I shall not attempt to follow the speech made by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton), which was interesting but not necessarily relevant to the issue before the House. I am glad that the Government have accepted this amendment, but the House should not be too ecstatic about it. Some of us have no fundamental objection to the idea that people should be entitled to buy the houses that they rent, including housing association houses, but have real concern, which the Minister has acknowledged, that small housing associations and those providing housing for special purposes will find their capital base eroded by being forced to sell houses at a substantial discount.

I do not wish the House to be under any illusion that we are satisfied that the Bill has provided enough safeguards for some of those associations, although some have been accepted during the passage of the Bill. As the Minister acknowledged, the date is such that the number of housing associations that will be taken in is not great. The implication is that he has reserved the right to monitor and change if necessary.

The point has been registered, and the other place has managed to achieve something that the Government—perhaps reluctantly—have accepted. As we have that small modification, we welcome it, with the clear understanding that we will be looking at the way that the right to buy, as it affects housing associations, takes effect. We shall be looking to see whether safeguards need to be applied later.

For example, the Minister will know that the biggest housing association of all, the Scottish special housing association, does not operate the right to buy in a fair way. In the north-east of Scotland, the only people able to get SSHA houses have been oil workers, although the demand for oil workers is not high. In some cases, there is evidence that non-British citizens have been able to acquire those houses under the right to buy. Some assurances on that would be welcome. A small amendment has been accepted, and I am glad that the Minister has agreed that this change can stand.

Channel Tunnel Bill

8.39 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): I beg to move,

That, when the Committee on the Channel Tunnel Bill reports the Bill to the House, further proceedings on the Bill shall be suspended until the next Session of Parliament.

That if a Bill is presented in the next Session in the same terms as those in which the Channel Tunnel Bill stood when proceedings thereon were suspended in this Session—

(a) the Bill shall be ordered to be printed and shall be deemed to have been read the first and second time;

(b) if the Committee has reported that it has gone through the Bill, the Bill shall be deemed to have been reported from a Select Committee;

(c) if the Committee has reported that it has not completed its consideration of the Bill—

(i) the Bill shall stand committed to a Select Committee of the same Members as the Members of the Committee in this Session;

(ii) all Petitions presented in this Session which stand referred to the Committee and which have not been withdrawn shall stand referred to the Committee in the next Session;

(iii) any minutes of evidence taken and any papers laid before the Committee in this Session which have been reported to the House shall stand referred to the Committee in the next Session;

(iv) the Instruction [17th July] shall be an Instruction to the Committee;

(v) only those Petitions mentioned in sub-paragraph (ii) above, and any Petition which may be presented by being deposited in the Private Bill Office and in which the Petitioners complain of any matter which has arisen during the progress of the Bill before the Committee in the next Session, shall stand referred to the Committee;

(vi) any Petitioner whose Petition stands referred to the Committee in the next Session shall, subject to the Rules and Orders of the House and to the Prayer of his Petition, be entitled to be heard by himself, his Counsel or Agents upon his Petition provided that it is prepared and signed in conformity with the Rules and Orders of the House, and the Member in charge of the Bill shall be entitled to be heard by his Counsel or Agents in favour of the Bill against that Petition;

(vii) the Committee shall have power to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the House, to adjourn from place to place within the United Kingdom, and to report from day to day the Minutes of Evidence taken before it;

(viii) three shall be the Quorum of the Committee;

(ix) any person registered in this Session as a parliamentary agent entitled to practice as such in opposing Bills only who, at the time when proceedings on the Bill were suspended in this Session, was employed in opposing the Bill shall be deemed to have been registered as such a parliamentary agent in the next Session;

(d) the Standing Orders and practice of the House applicable to the Bill, so far as complied with or (in the case of the Standing Orders relating to Private Business) dispensed with in this Session, shall be deemed to have been complied with or (as the case may be) dispensed with in the next Session; and

(e) if the Bill is reported, or is deemed by virtue of paragraph (b) above to have been reported, from a Select Committee in the next Session, it shall thereupon stand re-committed to a Standing Committee.

That this Order be a Standing Order of the House.

We are here to consider a further motion on the Channel Tunnel Bill. The House has debated the Bill four times, once on Second Reading and on three further occasions which were essentially procedural. I crave the understanding of the House for taking up its time yet again with a procedural motion for a carry-over to permit the Channel Tunnel Bill to run from this Session to the next. Hon. Members will realise that the result of the previous procedural debates was to vest the hybrid Bill Select Committee with a series of unusual powers: to receive petitions against the Bill from individual petitioners up to 10 days after the closing date for corporate petitioners; to sit notwithstanding any Adjournment of the House; to adjourn, as the House traditionally puts it, "from place to place"; and to consider alternative access arrangements.

The House will know that the Committee has made full use of those varied powers, and although it has not yet reported the Bill, I wish to pay tribute to the solid hard work and dedication which the members of the Committee, under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) have brought to their task. Of course, the Committee's work is not yet finished. It has now sat for 34 days, for a total of about 220 hours, and has heard evidence or submissions on 4,873 petitions.

Without precedent, the Committee sat for six days away from Westminster, at Hythe and then at Dover, where it heard evidence from many local people who considered themselves to be personally affected by the project. The Committee has visited the principal sites in Kent affected by the Bill.

It would be improper in this debate to go into the substance of the evidence heard by the Committee. It is all there, about 2,000 pages of it, not counting the many dozens of documents handed in, in the minutes of evidence that have been printed daily. It would be equally improper if I attempted to persuade the House of the merits of the Government's case on the many aspects of the project examined by the Committee. The Committee will reach its conclusions on the evidence that it has received and will amend the Bill accordingly.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Procedurally, would it not have been a better order of events to have allowed the publication of the Committee's findings, which will take place tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock, before we had this debate? It was always understood that there would have to be a carry-over motion, but the arguments about the procedure would be far better made in the House with the knowledge of the Select Committee's findings.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. Whatever changes to the Bill the Select Committee may recommend, they will make no difference to the need to carry it over. We are not dealing with changes in the Bill, only with carrying it over. Therefore, we are discussing a procedural matter. The purpose of the motion is independent of the Committee's decision. Its object is to ensure that, as the end of the Session approaches, the enormous amount of work done by the Committee is carried over to the new Session and not wasted.

It would be nonsense if, after the Bill were reintroduced in the 1986-87 Session, a new Committee had to be formed to reconsider it from scratch. That would do a considerable disservice to the multitude of petitioners who have written and submitted petitions and have attended the hearings to explain personally to the Committee their anxieties about the project. Moreover, there is nothing unusual about the central purpose of the motion. It is the normal practice of the House, with hybrid Bills as with private Bills, to continue work from one Session to the next when a Bill cannot be brought to Royal Assent in the Session in which it was introduced. Previous Channel Tunnel Bills were continued—in 1974 not merely into a new Session but into two new Parliaments.

The Government have made it clear from the start of work on the development of the Channel tunnel proposals in early 1985 that the Bill would need to run from one Session to the next. The House implicitly acknowledged that in the debate on 3 June when it agreed to dispense with Standing Orders and permit the Bill to proceed notwithstanding its introduction late in the Session and well after the 27 November deadline which the House applies to private Bills.

Passage from one Session to the next can be dealt with either by a carry-over motion in the old Session or a revival motion in the new. The House may note that in 1974, at the first dissolution, the carry-over route was adopted through a general motion applicable to all hybrid Bills extant at that time. That can be found in the Official Report at column 1468 on 8 February 1974.

At the second dissolution in that year, the revival route was followed, and a revival motion for the Channel Tunnel Bill was debated on 11 November. On this occasion, the Government have opted for the carry-over route, because that eliminates the period of apparent uncertainty when the Bill would otherwise lapse on prorogation, and because it allows work on the Bill to recommence in the new Session without delay.

The motion, despite its usual purpose, is nevertheless unusually long because the Select Committee has not yet finished its work. Those who have read the Committee's minutes of evidence will know that, on 30 October, it finished taking the main body of evidence. Hon. Members will also be aware that, on 29 October, the Chairman of the Select Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central, reported a resolution of the Committee:

"That the Committee, having met to consider the Channel Tunnel Bill and to hear Petitioners as directed by the orders of the House on 33 days and not having completed its consideration of the Bill recommends that the House should provide for the work of the Committee to be continued, if necessary, by a Select Committee in the forthcoming session to which all Petitions referred to this Committee and not withdrawn and all Minutes of Evidence taken before and documents received by this Committee should be referred."

Thus, the House does not yet know whether the Committee will report the Bill in the present Session and the motion must, therefore, cover both eventualities, which it does. If the Committee were to complete its work in the next few days before Prorogation and were to report that it had gone through the Bill and amended it, the first clause and all the paragraphs of the second clause except for paragraph (c) would apply. The Bill would be deemed to have been reported in the next Session and would proceed immediately to a Standing Committee in the new Session. I shall return to that point, which is contained in paragraph (e), in a moment.

If the Committee was not to complete its consideration of the Bill in the present Session, it would report the Bill without amendment and the first clause and the second clause except for (b) would apply. The Bill would be ordered to be printed in the new Session and would proceed immediately to a Select Committee.

Under paragraph (c)(i), the membership would be the same as that of the present Select Committee. It would effectively be the same Committee. Under paragraph (c)(ii), (iii) and (v), all the outstanding petitions, minutes and papers would stand referred to the Committee and the instruction of the House for the Committee to be empowered to consider alternative access arrangements would also be carried over. Under paragraph (c)(vii), the new Committee would have the same powers to sit, notwithstanding any Adjournment of the House, to adjourn from place to place and to report minutes of evidence.

Mr. John Silkin (Lewisham, Deptford): The last words of the motion are:

"That this Order be a Standing Order of the House."

As the Minister knows, Standing Orders differ from sessional orders. Standing Orders remain orders of the House of Commons unless and until negatived by the House in some other way.

Having mentioned the alternatives depending on what the Select Committee might decide and remarked on the precedents, the Minister talked about going on from one Session to another and from one Parliament to another. Do those last words mean that the Government are telling us that the motion, if passed, will be valid not only for next Session but for the Session afterwards, if necessary? If that is the case, the House is entitled to know why.

Mr. Mitchell: No, it refers to this Session. Another motion would be in front of the House if another Session were involved.

Mr. Silkin: Then will the Minister tell the House why those words were have been used?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall return to that point in a moment.

Could I add that, on the basis of the resolution of the Select Committee that was reported to the House, there is no indication that these powers would be required, but it would not be proper, in the absence of such an indication, not to reconstitute the Committee with the same powers as before.

Paragraph (d) of the motion ensures that the position as regards the examiners and the Standing Orders Committee is preserved. The House decided on 3 June to dispense with Standing Orders so far as the Bill, as introduced in this Session, was concerned, but if the Select Committee decides to amend the Bill by adopting the alternative arrangements for access to the Folkestone terminal site, those amendments will need to be considered by the examiners.

Finally, I refer to paragraph (e) of the second clause, dealing with committal to a Standing Committee. It is usual for a hybrid Bill, when reported from a Select Committee, to be recommitted to a Committee of the whole House. However, if the Bill contains a substantial volume of public law provisions, as in the present instance — that is, jurisdiction, frontier control arrangements, policing and safety—it is appropriate to consider these just as though they were part of a normal public Bill. Accordingly, the motion makes provision for the Bill to be referred to a Standing Committee as soon as the Select Committee has reported that it has gone through the Bill.

[Mr. Mitchell]

The motion is but the latest in a series of pragmatic motions that the Government have brought before the House during the passage of the Bill, designed to ensure that the hybrid Bill procedure can deal flexibly with the task of carefully considering the effect of the proposed legislation on individuals and safeguarding their rights, and at the same time responding to the need to discharge the business of the House speedily and efficiently.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I begin by joining the Minister in paying tribute to the members of the Select Committee who have been looking at the Channel Tunnel Bill. They have dealt with over 3,000 petitions in 33 days. I do not know what the report will say, and I cannot guarantee in advance that I shall agree with its conclusions. However, I can guarantee that I shall not challenge the integrity of those hon. Members who served on the Select Committee. I am sure that they will have reached their conclusions in a manner that shows that they have been worthy of discharging the duties that this House has placed upon them.

The members of the Select Committee had to operate within the very severe constraints that were laid down in the Bill and, indeed, by the hybrid Bill procedure. The Chairman has ruled—and I do not challenge his ruling—that the principle cannot be discussed. I do not intend to discuss the principle, but there is no doubt that the ruling that the principle cannot be discussed has left many people feeling very dissatisfied.

It may be that frank discussion of the principle, of the viability of the project and of the capacity of the promoters to rebut challenges to its viability might have been helped had there been proper discussion of the principle. Indeed, it has been reported that there have been some financial hiccoughs and doubt about whether or not Eurotunnel would be able to raise the money by the deadline. Had there been a proper opportunity for the Eurotunnel promoters to argue their case more fully than was permitted by the procedure, it might have helped them. The freedom of opponents to cast doubt on the viability of the project has left Eurotunnel in an exposed position, with the supporters of Eurotunnel not having the same opportunity to argue back.

Of course, none of us can tell, but I repeat my feeling that discussion of the principle could have been of benefit to everyone, including the promoters. A public inquiry would still, in my view, be better for the general appreciation of the tunnel and of its potential benefits, and it would also allow the case of those who seriously doubt the value of the tunnel to have their case properly examined and answered.

The problem over acceptance of the tunnel by the general public remains the Government's decision to proceed only on the basis of the general homily that "it will be a good thing." Regrettably, the Government have not really gone beyond that stage of the argument since Second Reading. When we discussed the principle, the Government did not begin to make the case for regional development and sadly, during the period during which the Committee has been sitting, the Government have remained silent on issues such as inland customs clearance away from entry to the tunnel. Some people in the north of England and in parts of Scotland are seriously looking at these issues. Again, sadly, the Government have done nothing to put the case for freight assembly points away from the mouth of the tunnel.

It is true that encouraging advertisements have been placed by British Rail in the national newspapers, declaring that its interest in the tunnel begins at X, Y or Z, but that is not good enough. The Government should be doing much more. But what is probably worse than their inaction is that the Government have abused the hybrid Bill procedure by inserting proposals for the A20 in the Bill. There has been a great deal of controversy about this. The Council for the Protection of Rural England has said that the Government's conduct "poses an unprecedented threat to the democratic planning system".

The Countryside Commission is reported to be very seriously worried about the damage to the landscape by the A20 proposals.

It is alleged—I do not know whether or not it is true, because I have not read every single word of the minutes of evidence of the Select Committee—that the Secretary of State, through parliamentary counsel, tried three times to persuade the Committee not to admit evidence on the A20 proposals. We were told on Second Reading that the hybrid Bill procedure would permit all objections to be fully considered, but we know now that that claim was being resisted. I do not believe that the Government are entitled to change planning procedures surreptitiously. If there is a case for altering planning procedures, this should be done after due consultation and a full debate of specific proposals by the Government.

I am aware of the argument and the feeling that planning inquiries take far too long and that they attract all sorts of people who are not directly affected by a particular scheme. I understand why Governments, local authorities and private individuals can be worried by the length of time inquiries take and that they can be frustrated because of the way in which some people exploit planning procedures when making their case. However, if there is to be a change of this kind—it is a major change in planning procedures—it ought not to be brought about by sticking bits into a Bill and trying to create precedents that will be quoted in future as the way to proceed.

The Minister quite fairly and properly—I have no complaint about it—has sought to justify or explain the need for the carry-over motion by pointing out what happened to previous Channel Tunnel Bills. However, we must be wary of doing something in a hybrid Bill, and apparently assenting to it, and then saying that as it was accepted the last time there is no reason why that procedure should not be used in other cases. The manner of the Government's proposals for the A20 strengthens the case for a public inquiry.

The hybrid Bill procedure has avoided proper assessment and discussion of British Rail's decision to develop Waterloo as its London terminal for the tunnel services. I understand that the Chairman of the Select Committee has ruled that the Waterloo development is outside its remit. For those who live around Waterloo this is a very serious matter. How are their concerns to be properly taken into account? Will the Waterloo development require a private Bill from British Rail? I do not know the answer, but perhaps the Minister can say whether that is the next stage. Will there be a public inquiry into Waterloo? I think that that has already been resisted in certain quarters. However, we should be told exactly how the Government propose to proceed. I hope that the Minister will not simply say that it is a matter for British Rail. The Government must know what is to happen, and they should tell us.

Whatever happens, it might help British Rail if it had to advocate its case in the public arena, so that it could be given proper public scrutiny. In that case, those in the area might well accept the arguments. I do not know whether they would do, but British Rail's case should be tested in the widest possible forum.

Today, I received a submission from the British Ports Association. Indeed, I suspect that all hon. Members who have said anything about the Channel tunnel have probably received a copy of that brief. It makes three basic points. First, it is concerned about the possibility of a subsidy to Eurotunnel. It is believed that the Government may introduce an amendment to the Bill making it clear that there will not be any subsidy. I do not know how that would be inserted into the Bill, but that is the suggestion.

The BPA is also concerned about the possibility of predatory pricing, and is unhappy with the effectiveness of existing competition law in preventing that. Interestingly, I raised that point on Second Reading, and I share the association's concern that our competition law does not provide the sort of protection needed for our ports and ferry services. That should be properly examined. The BPA is also unhappy about the scrutiny of the safety commission.

Those are all reasonable points that need to be debated and decided. I shall not pursue them further today, but if the Bill reaches Committee, we shall pursue them by way of amendment, and we shall debate those issues fully. It remains our view that a public inquiry would have been, and still is, the best way to proceed. It need not take an inordinate time and it would provide a much better opportunity to get things right. We are concerned that we should get the Channel tunnel right, and that we should not simply leave things to private industry and hope for the best, without doing anything to take care of the public.

For those reasons, I believe that my right hon. and hon. Friends should oppose the continuation motion.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): When my hon. Friend the Minister opened the debate, he did so in a style that was probably designed to make the whole subject sound as boring as possible. Of course, I sympathise with that technique. After all, it is no longer a case of "glad confident morning again". The trumpets are no longer sounding for the project anywhere outside Eurotunnel's offices, and they sound pretty discordant even there. I appreciate that my hon. Friend the Minister felt it appropriate to adopt the tone of an undertaker muttering a funeral dirge from the Dispatch Box.

If I judge the mood of the House correctly, this is not the occasion to give the Bill the thorough mauling that it deserves. Just a few cuffs and a love tap or two will do. Consequently, I shall content myself with that this evening.

This motion is the parliamentary equivalent of switching on a life support machine to prolong artificially the survival and lifespan of a dying Channel tunnel project. Two weeks ago it seemed that the project was clinically dead, when Eurotunnel failed yet again to meet its self-imposed deadline for raising merely the first £206 million of seed money out of a total of £5 billion of funds required. Yet lo and behold, after a frantic weekend of high voltage resuscitation techniques by the Bank of England and others in high places who should have known better, the patient was temporarily saved. But saved for what purpose, for how long and for whose benefit? Those are questions that need to be answered if we are to decide on what is the right and proper course of action for the House to take before voting for the Bill to be carried over to a new Session of Parliament.

Mr. Keith Speed (Ashford): Twice this year I have heard my hon. Friend give the tunnel its obituary: once when there was a change in the French Government, and once when he was confidently predicting that the group would not raise the money. He continues to write obituaries, but the patient refuses to die, and as far as my constituents are concerned, is very much alive and kicking.

Mr. Aitken: I am always surrounded by optimists. However, we have had all this life and death excitement over the first 4 per cent. of the funds to be raised. My hon. Friend should imagine himself as an investor asked to put his money into this project. After a great deal of bally-hoo and excitement with people saying, "This is one of the great projects of the century which will bring a new vision and a new Europhile excitement to the world," imagine the project then being able to raise only £4 out of every £100 needed for the investment. With that humiliating failure in mind, my hon. Friend, instead of whistling to keep up his courage, should read the comments of sober newspapers such as the Financial Times and many others that have basically said, "Whatever else is true, there is a very hard row to hoe ahead for the Eurotunnel consortium."

Simply to ask the questions that I began by asking, such as what is the purpose of prolonging the life of this project and for whose benefit is it, is embarrassingly to lift the veil from the profound dilemma that the Government face on this project. The Government have become blinded to the national interest, first, by the disease of what I call political monumentitis, and, secondly, by what might be called a schizophrenia as to whether it is a free market project or a political project. One has to ask: in whose political interest is this project? After all, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister herself and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, who introduced the Bill, were both dedicated opponents of the Channel tunnel. They repeatedly opposed it in Cabinet Committee meetings whenever it was mentioned by former Secretaries of State for Transport, such as my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell).

Secondly, there was a complete change of direction. A go-ahead was given after a meeting between President Mitterrand and our Prime Minister at Avignon. This was followed by ceremonies in Avignon and Lille and in the precincts of Canterbury cathedral among a pageantry and a sort of faux bonhomie insincerity unseen in Anglo-French relations since the field of the cloth of gold. All these activities were for a French political purpose.

It has been possible clearly to see the French purpose. There was a short-term political objective and two massive long-term political gains. The short-term objective was a French election. President Mitterrand was in a hurry, desperate to save his majority. Another problem in the Channel area was a Socialist stronghold which was disintegrating electorally before his eyes. How wonderful to be able to unveil an exciting new job-creating piece of social and political engineering. The French President had a deal which did not do him much good in the French elections, but nevertheless a short-term objective was achieved.

Much more serious than the French political manoeuvring is the fact that the French are enjoying two massive long-term gains in their national interest. First, by this project we are giving away, and they are gaining, a slice of the cross-Channel industry. It is an industry which happens to be a great British success, both as a service industry and as an industrial story. The cross-Channel industry is worth to this country about £800 million a year. Of that sum, 72 per cent. is in British hands. The industry, by its very nature, is largely British. The British, like the French, go south for their holidays. That holiday traffic makes up the bulk of the industry. Of every £100 spent in that industry, £72 goes to British companies — British shipowners and British ports. That money creates British jobs. Only 12 per cent. of that industry is in French hands. The remainder is mainly in Belgian hands. So there is a growing concern, a successful growth industry dominated, and rightly so, by British companies — British shipowners, British ports and so on.

On the day the Channel tunnel opens, whatever share the tunnel gets of the market, the balance will be tilted dramatically away from Britain's hands. If Britain ends up owning 40 per cent. of the tunnel—I suggest that that is optimistic — her share of the market will have fallen from a 72 per cent. to a 40 per cent. interest, and the French interest will have increased. In one move we are giving away a major, successful slice of a good British industry. That is very much in France's interest and against ours.

Secondly, there is a massive long-term gain to France's maritime and railway industries and a loss especially to our maritime industry. The gains to the French maritime industry are perhaps best illustrated by looking at the hypothetical route of cargo coming into this country from a foreign destination, say, South America, the middle east or the far east. At the moment, because Britain is an island, all cargo that comes into Britain has to come through a British port, contributing to that port in dues, cargo and freight handling charges and jobs. The day the Channel tunnel opens, there will be a complete alternative — a shipper will be able to offload his cargo in French ports, such as Toulon and Marseilles, send the goods to Britain on the high-speed French network, having paid dues to a French port and railway and having taken that business from Britain's maritime industry. This is a long-term disaster for Britain's maritime industry.

The British Ports Association has predicted that as many as 40 per cent. of the 175,000 jobs that it created in our maritime industry could be put seriously at risk by this development. The French are ready to seize it, and that is why they are modernising ports on their present scale, why they are quickly linking their railways with high-speed electrification to the ports, and why they have such enthusiasm for this project. It is a shift in the balance of power from our maritime industry to their maritime and rail industries.

Mr. Speed: My hon. Friend has been generous in giving way. In intervening, I am cutting out the need to make a speech. If my hon. Friend thinks positively, does he feel that it is possible that Liverpool and Avonmouth could handle the transatlantic trade and that all the freight could pass through those ports to Europe via the Channel tunnel? Why should the French be the only ones with initiative when we have the geographical advantages?

Mr. Aitken: The simple reason is that we have not invested in a high-speed rail network of the type in which the French have invested. It is the triumph of hope over experience to think that the French, who are ready for this challenge——

Mr. Speed: In seven years' time.

Mr. Aitken: If my hon. Friend can persuade the Government to invest huge sums of money in the rail network and port modernisation on the French scale, that might be a different story, but we are unprepared for the coming battle and will therefore lose it.

There is something much deeper about this project, which is to do with French intentions. The French are sometimes our enemies, always our rivals and only occasionally our friends. Of course, it is one of the cardinal principles of modern mealy-mouthed policy in Britain that we should never say anything detrimental about the French because they are our so-called partners in the EEC. However, British public opinion marches to a different drumbeat from the insipid civilities of diplomacy.

In a week in which the French Government have behaved with a perfidy and poltroonery over Syrian terrorism, which led The Wall Street Journal to label them, rightly, as the "Euro-cowards", it is as well to examine the roots of the Anglo-French entente cordiale, of which the Channel tunnel is the new and shining symbol. Last month the French completely failed to support the Government's stand against proven state-sponsored Syrian terrorism. France's contribution to our dangers and difficulties was first a statement from the Minister of the Interior, Mr. Charles Pasqua, that there was "real collaboration" between French and Syrian intelligence to fight terrorism. France has continued its negotiations to deliver a £200 million arms sale to Syria, and France has refused to play any part in our efforts to get a concerted EEC response to the Syrian outrage——

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Aitken: No, I should like to finish my point.

I can do no better than quote from today's issue of Time magazine, which sums up the situation thus:

> "British officials were furious at the faintheartedness on the Continent . . . snapped one disgusted senior Thatcher aide 'Either you're in the business of anti-terrorism or you're not.'"

In case you think that I am going to be irrelevent, Mr. Speaker, that is an archetypal example of the French attitude that worries me and millions of other people in this country.

Last month the French were not on Britain's side in the business of anti-terrorism, but this month they are on Britain's side in the business of Euro tunnelling. Why? The answer is that there is a gain to France to be soft on Syrian terrorism and a gain to France to be enthusiastic about the Channel tunnel. Would that Britain had such a robust, if at times cynical, attitude to defending our national interest, at least with regard to the Channel tunnel.

Before we commit ourselves to devoting a massive amount of parliamentary time to the Channel Tunnel Bill in the next Session, let us not forget that we are not even halfway through the parliamentary process, although it seems to have been a marathon so far.

I should like to hear a Minister spell out, from the Dispatch Box, the political gains for Britain's national interest in this project. Please let us not have any more honeyed words about jobs. The Government's White Paper admits that there will be a net loss of jobs in the maritime industry. The White Paper reached that very low figure of 3,000 job losses only by suppressing the information about the jobs that would be lost in ports other than Dover and Folkestone. The British Ports Association, at the other end of the scale, predicts that 40 per cent. of the 175,000 jobs in the industry could be lost.

Let us not have any more "pep" talk about how the Channel tunnel will be invigorating and challenging for our exporters. The reverse is true. From long experience, I can say that our importers may well meet the challenge and the invigoration with greater success than our exporters have met the opposite challenge.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Before my hon. Friend is entirely captivated by the suggestion from my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Speed) that we can make good any losses by shipping goods to Lyon via Liverpool, will he draw my hon. Friend's attention to what is happening to British lamb exporters, who are trying to exercise their legal rights but who are prevented from doing that by vandalism and excessive bureaucracy from the French authorities?

Mr. Aitken: My hon. Friend has great experience in these matters and he knows only too well that the French very often win the game by breaking the rules. That is what we fear in the case of the Channel tunnel project.

I return to our national interests. The Government have one card to play. It is that some temporary jobs—about 10,000 — will be created by British construction companies and other British companies in the industrial sector from orders from the Channel tunnel if—and this is a big if—Britain's companies get their predicted share of the contracts.

But at what price? The garden of England, in environmental terms, is likely to be turned into Britain's grey and concrete land. The white cliffs of Dover are likely to become the green cliffs of Dover as a result of the spoil being deposited, by this misguided decision, at the bottom of Shakespeare cliff. There will be much environmental damage and many job losses in the maritime industry, all to create a benefit match for the French.

I am slightly exaggerating — one other group of people will benefit besides the French. They hope that they will be laughing all the way to the bank. They are the shareholders, bankers and directors of Eurotunnel. We may be decimating our maritime industry and ruining our environment, but perhaps this project will make a handful of people rich. But will it? Here we enter the realm of what I call "market forces schizophrenia". The Government have not really decided whether they are backing the project or whether they are at arm's length from the project and letting market forces decide. I resent the fact that taxpayers' money will be used to buy some £400 million worth of new rolling stock for British Rail. I resent the fact that large sums of money will be spent on infrastructure and extra policing costs for the project. I am worried——

Mr. Robert Hughes: I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument with care. However, he seems to be suffering from schizophrenia. A few moments ago he was complaining that the French were investing too much in their railways. Now he is complaining bitterly about the money being made available to British Rail. I happen to think that it is not enough. The hon. Gentleman must make up his mind.

Mr. Aitken: There is no schizophrenia on the other side of the Channel. The French are backing this project totally and wholeheartedly with taxpayers' money. That is not what our Government are doing. They say that this project is being decided by market forces and that they have nothing much to do with it. They say that they are simply supporting it politically and that it is all being done by private money. That is not true.

The position of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) is perfectly rational. He seems to be saying that if he was at the Dispatch Box he would put the resources of the state behind this project, or at least behind the infrastructure. That is a logical position. I agree that he does not suffer from schizophrenia. However, I am afraid that the Government do. That was revealed when the Bank of England and others in high places got up to some bizarre and, quite possibly, improper activities in trying to twist arms so that Eurotunnel could totter towards the finishing line to raise the first 4 per cent. of the funds.

Is this really a free-market project? I suspect that when it comes to raising the remaining 96 per cent. of the money, in one way or another Government forces will have to come into play even more formidably than they have so far, although not necessarily on our side of the Channel. Perhaps we will decide to play the game and lose it. However, I am sure that the French—indeed, they have already done it—will put Government resources behind the tunnel. Some of the institutions which have invested in the project are backed by the French Government.

On a pure arm's-length, market-forces-assessment, this investment is a dodgy gamble. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Minister can confirm that the first advice given by Department of Transport civil servants to the Secretary of State last year was that perhaps none of the bids to build a fixed link could be financed on a purely commercial basis. I hope that we will be able to have that advice disclosed to Parliament and the press. I also hope that the Department of Transport's own traffic forecasts will be disclosed. They are well below the self-serving and optimistic forecasts put forward by Eurotunnel in its prospectus.

We will need major debates on that prospectus and the investment that will be sold to the public. I fear that the prospectus is not far removed from a South sea bubble. Many of the figures seem to be plucked out of thin air. For example, there is the forecast, which anyone who knows the Channel ports has grave doubts about, that 67 per cent. of car holidaymakers will choose to go by the tunnel and that 89 per cent. of foot passengers will choose the tunnel. Where do those optimistic forecasts come from? Before any private citizen is encouraged to invest money, we need a proper parliamentary debate on the subject.

There is long-term doubt about the French role. I fear that, because the French will have so much Government support, they will not just have a share of the Channel tunnel, but will be the dominant shareholder, perhaps the controlling shareholder. That is a great worry. Instead of being the Anglo-French Channel tunnel, it may become the French Channel tunnel. As I have already said, it is massively more in France's interests than our own, and the investment is likely to be heavily loaded towards French ownership rather than towards our own.

Why should Parliament be asked to deliver by this motion what the market cannot deliver, or at least is expected not to be able to deliver? Hon. Members do not have to rely on my word; they can read the Financial Times and other newspapers. Everyone knows that there are grave difficulties ahead. So far Eurotunnel has been extremely sanguine.

Many hon. Members may remember that earlier this summer Lord Pennock made an irritated outburst on "The World at One", in which he ticked off Members of Parliament. He said that if only Members of Parliament would stop mucking about with the Bill, he had banks and investors all over the world lined up and waiting to go. Yet, at the finishing post, the money was not available and Sir Nigel Broackes, the Governor of the Bank of England and others had to be called in to help.

Hon. Members are busy people. The Select Committee should at least examine the whole question of investment. Although I pay tribute to its hard work, its members seem to have been men of iron whim, completely excluding money and safety from their deliberations. I find that difficult to understand. Will the House be given an opportunity to debate the Select Committee report before the Bill goes to Standing Committee? The Select Committee has not shown the hybrid Bill procedure to be workable or fair in deciding projects of this nature. It would have been much better to have a shortened form of public inquiry and to have a proper look at the real financial credibility of the project, which is so much in doubt, and which will be in greater doubt when attempts are made to raise the remaining 96 per cent. of the money.

We are in a make-believe, Alice-in-Wonderland world. There is a lot of talk about the project, but the results are disappointing. We have a long way to go yet and I do not want to see Parliament's time wasted next Session. We must first have a much more clear-cut, concrete accurate view of the prospects, and all the evidence suggests that those prospects are still dim.

9.26 pm

Mr. John Silkin (Lewisham, Deptford): The hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) gave us a wide and perfectly correct description, which was perhaps not to everybody's taste, of why the Channel tunnel should not be built and, rightly within the rules of order, why this particular motion should not be passed. There will be plenty of opportunity—hours and hours—next Session, assuming that the motion is passed tonight, to continue this interesting discussion of the concept and desirability of the tunnel. By then we shall have much more information with which to amuse and interest the House.

Tonight I propose to be narrow in my interpretation of the motion—I hope that the House will be duly grateful—and to stick to the motion, perhaps a little of the history of such motions and why the Government are in such an infernal hurry to pass it.

When the first carry-over hybrid Bill was proposed in the House, the then Prime Minister chose to address the House because it was considered of such importance that only the Prime Minister could do so. From Ramsay MacDonald to the Minister of State is not exactly a step up in protocol. It seems that today's Government are taking a more relaxed view of their duties. [Interruption.] Some may say that the Minister is better than Ramsay MacDonald—I do not know. That was in 1931 at the time of the so-called national Government. There were 47 Labour Members only at that time and rather a large number of Conservative Members.

The interesting point about that particular hybrid Bill was what it was. It was nothing like as large as the Channel Tunnel Bill. It was certainly a hybrid Bill because it included private interests and it sought to enlarge, not to diminish, the public sector. It was the London Passenger Transport Bill, and Mr. Ramsey MacDonald proposed that it should be carried over to the following Session.

The other point is that Ramsey MacDonald and his Whips had made the appropriate sounds beforehand and found that the House, in general, approved of the measure. There was a little concern and grumbling about it, but the Whips had done their job very well and the result was that, in 1931, there was no division and the order went through happily. In 1932, it took rather a long time for the Bill to be debated and considered and a similar motion was put before the House the following year. Hence my asking the Minister—I knew the answer to the question but he did not seem to——

Mr. David Mitchell indicated assent.

Mr. Silkin: That is good. The Minister knows the answer now. I want his assurance that, if this motion is carried tonight and the suspension continues until the next Session, the Bill will not last another Session—whatever happens to the Government, and assuming that it is the same Government after the next Session has ended. As I have said, the London Passenger Transport Bill was carried forward for two Sessions. If the same occurred with this Bill, it would be an abuse of Parliament because there is opposition to it, whereas the London Passenger Transport Bill met no opposition. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) wishes to intervene, I wish that he would do so. Perhaps then I would hear, because all that he is doing is mumbling at me.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): When the Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, suggested that the motion be carried forward a second time, he was suggesting it be carried forward to another Session, not another Parliament. I do not believe that that was the case.

Mr. Silkin: Ramsay MacDonald referred to a dissolution in his speech, which I was examining the other day. If the hon. Member for Canterbury were to spend a little time in the Library, he would find that it is possible—the Under-Secretary said so in his opening speech—to carry the Bill forward from one Parliament to another. The Under-Secretary said that that was done with the Channel Tunnel Bill in 1974.

I am merely trying to point out that the status of this motion and Bill is not regarded as so important to the Government that it should be introduced by the Secretary of State. Perhaps it would be wrong for the Prime Minister to introduce the Bill, although it is very much the Prime Minister's scheme—there is no question about that. The present Secretary of State for Transport inherited the scheme from his predecessor, so perhaps it would not have been a bad thing if the Prime Minister had introduced this motion.

I am trying to give the motion an importance that the Under-Secretary has not given to it. The hon. Gentleman craved our indulgence for bringing this tedious subject to us again at this particular moment. He told us that the House had talked a great deal about the Channel tunnel. He said that he did not wish to bring this motion before the House tonight, but he had to do so because we were at the end of the Session. The Under-Secretary said that nobody wants to talk about the Bill—but he is wrong. I find that more and more people wish to talk about it.

If I go into the wider questions concerning this matter, I promise you, Mr. Speaker, that I will relate it to the motion. It is perfectly true that many people, cornered sometimes on or about to go on holiday, said what a marvellous thing it would be if they could go by a tunnel and be in France in no time at all. On the whole, those who try to export our goods did not seem to be asked the same question. The question was directed to those who travel by car, and they thought of different things. Some thought of a bridge and others thought of a road tunnel.

The enthusiasm for spending £4·5 billion — at the present estimate — to get to France, if one can, five minutes earlier, seems to have evaporated. There is now a feeling that this is not the right thing for us to do and not the right thing on which to spend our money.

There is contention and controversy about the matter which did not exist with the London Passenger Transport Bill. That was illustrated by the bitter intervention made by my opponent, the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Speed), on his hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South. There is controversy in the Conservative ranks, let alone in the country.

In the light of that, why the hurry? Why is it so essential not to waste a single moment? The Select Committee, in its restrained fashion — because it deliberately excluded various questions from its consideration—said that time must not be wasted and that we must at all costs try to get the motion through in one Session. Many of us believe that the project will not run its full course in any event. So why the hurry? I think that the hurry is because the Government are in a corner. They are in a fix. They thought that the project would be marvellously popular, full of razzmatazz and zing. It has turned out to be a damp and sodden squib.

The Government now say that they cannot abandon the project immediately. They cannot say that they are not so interested in it that they will not give it time or that they will postpone it until the next Session because people would then say that Parliament was not playing the game. The Government say that many investors—perhaps 96 per cent. of them—are waiting to come in, so they had better encourage the poor baboons to do what they can —to come in and to make a go of it. It becomes more and more difficult to do that.

The Government now have to go to their rivals to collect a bit of money. They have to scrape it together, at the 25th hour rather than the 24th hour. There is no great enthusiasm — in fact the reverse is true — among the British public. There might be a certain amount of interest among the French and Japanese, and I have no doubt that with the Under-Secretary of State's persuasive abilities the Warsaw pact might be induced to put in a rouble or two.

Generally speaking, nobody really wants the Channel tunnel any more. Perhaps the hon. Member for Canterbury is attracted to the idea. He is a great historian and there is something historic about it. The hon. Member for Ashford, because of his containers and lorries, thinks that is is not a bad idea. He has to stick with it now because he supported it when he was a Minister. What is he to do but be consistent?

Mr. Speed: I supported a rail-only tunnel. I never, never, never supported a drive-through tunnel — nor would I. It is interesting that one of the principal people concerned with Sealink proposed just that — a drive-through tunnel — which would have been environmentally disastrous for Kent.

Mr. Silkin: I am delighted that the hon. Member for Ashford should say that. I wanted him to say it, because it shows the divisions. They are important divisions.

The Government are in a hurry — an unnecessary hurry. I believe that as the years go by they will regret that hurry.

I am sorry to keep referring to the speech by the hon. Member for Thanet, South but it was a brave and audacious speech which deserves to be remembered and considered. He talked about a South sea bubble. I totally disagree with him. A number of people made a fortune out of the South sea bubble before the shares went down in value. Compared with the Channel tunnel, the shares of the South sea bubble sound like gilt-edged securities.

I do not think that we shall have a Channel tunnel. I never believed it to be likely, but I am an optimist. I believe that it would be disastrous for the country. It would be disastrous for security, for trade and for the environment. It would mean the worst possible use of resources.

I do not believe that the Channel tunnel will happen. If the motion is passed tonight—I shall do my little best to try to stop it—all that will happen is that for a week or two the Government's and Prime Minister's faces will be saved. It will be no more than that. In the end the lunacy of the project will be clear to everyone in the country.

Mr. Peter Rees (Dover): We have had two interesting contributions from both sides of the House, replete with historical analogy. I shall not follow my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) into a consideration of the South sea bubble. I was impressed by the recollection of the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) that fortunes were made. I believe that Sir Robert Walpole made a considerable fortune. But it is not for me to speculate on who will make or lose money out of this project. I am merely concerned on this occasion with the interests of my constituents and the impact of the Channel tunnel on them.

However, since we have been invited to go back a little in time, I hope that I may recall, for those of us who have been in the House since 1970, that this is the third Bill we have had to consider on the Channel Tunnel. The first was introduced by the Administration of my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). The second was introduced by the Administration of which the right hon. Member for Deptford was a Member. The third was introduced by this Administration. The right hon. Member for Deptford was the Chief Whip at the time of the second Bill and, therefore, presumably mobilised support for it.

The simple point on which we have to focus tonight is whether we want to proceed with the existing Bill or whether we want it withdrawn or killed off only to pave the way—my hon. Friend the Minister will no doubt correct me if I am not right and make the Government's intention clear—for the introduction of a new Bill in the new Session.

Mr. Silkin: The right hon. and learned Gentleman should always get his facts correct. I was Chief Whip before he came into the House and I was sacked before he ever came into it.

Mr. Rees: I am sorry to intrude into the right hon. Gentleman's private grief. If my memory was inaccurate on the precise post which he held after the general election in 1974, at least I am accurate in recalling that he was a member of the Cabinet which commended the second Bill to the House.

Mr. Silkin: I wish the right hon. and learned Gentleman would get his facts right. I was not a member of the Cabinet until six months afterwards.

Mr. Rees: At any rate, the doctrine of collective responsibility no doubt embraced the right hon. Gentleman closely and warmly. At least I am accurate on that. He cannot deny that.

The sole issue on which we are focusing is whether we want to kill off the Bill tonight and pave the way for, perhaps, a fresh Bill to be introduced in the next Session. I would find that a rather daunting prospect and I shall say precisely why. It is not because I have lost any zest for debate on this great subject. As the right hon. Gentleman said, there will be aeons of time in the next Session to devote ourselves to this gripping subject.

But before we play the battle through to its conclusion we must consider the interests of the people most directly affected. I must emphasise that a range of decisions, both business and personal, have been shirked because of the uncertainty created by the Bill and whether it will reach the statute book. Let me reduce the matter to a level which may even evoke a sympathetic response from the right hon. Gentleman. There are small people who are unable to sell their houses at the moment because of the uncertainty about whether the Channel tunnel and its works will cut across their gardens. We should be concerned about them and their interests before we become too enmeshed in considering the history of the South sea bubble and other such grandiose analogies.

I should like to see some certainty brought into the matter. I do not mind whether the Bill is killed off by a vote of the House or allowed to proceed by a vote of the House. I do not mind if it is killed off by those who are invited and decline to offer sufficient money to see it through. Some certainty must be brought into the matter and it would be a great pity if we caused merely a slight delay and paved the way for my long-suffering hon. Friend the Minister of State to introduce a new Bill in the new Session. In that case we would get the worst of every world. If on Third Reading the Bill is killed, I have no doubt that that will generate a great deal of enthusiasm in certain parts of east Kent and not least in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: And in Southend.

Mr. Rees: My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) has been remarkably consistent on a number of issues and I have no doubt that he sees this Bill, not unfairly, as a dimension in the long debate about the European Community and Britain's role in it. I do not want to prevent my hon. Friend enlarging the debate, even if he were allowed to do so.

Mr. Taylor: That is why my right hon. and learned Friend is against it.

Mr. Rees: I can assure my hon. Friend that I have made my position absolutely clear in interventions during the course of this Session. It is a matter of regret that we do not yet know the conclusions of the Select Committee. I should like to join other hon. Members in paying my tribute to the patience of the Select Committee. It had to deal with an enormous weight of evidence and it must have been a relief for the members of that Committee that neither my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South nor I were in a position to give evidence. Our absence did not preclude our constituents and those of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) from giving a great deal of pointed and powerful evidence. No doubt that evidence has been carefully sifted and we await with keen interest the conclusions that the Select Committee may have reached and may announce tomorrow.

The Select Committee was able to rise early on the first day during which it heard evidence in my constituency and was able to see at first hand the operations of the port of Dover. I hope that that made a deep impression on the Committee. Whatever its conclusions, the debate will continue into the next Session if the House so wills. A key issue is that there should be fair competition between the Channel tunnel—if the House agrees that it should go ahead — and the ferries that operate from the constituencies of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe and my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South. It may be that some other hon. Friends have an interest in ensuring fair competition.

That is one of the central issues, so we must ensure that the same measure of safety is demanded of the operators of the Channel tunnel as is demanded of the ferry operators. There is also the matter of customs and immigration procedures. I understand that those will be matters for the Standing Committee and that the Select Committee was prevented by its terms of reference from going into them.

Other matters concern the environment and communications. If Dover, Folkestone and Ramsgate are to compete fairly with the tunnel, it is crucial that communications in east Kent should be thoroughly and carefully examined. I am thinking here of the railway line which joins Folkestone-Dover to Deal, Sandwich and Thanet. Perhaps understandably, British Rail was a little equivocal, a little hesitant, in its assurances about the continuation of that line into the 21st century. That is a matter of considerable importance. Roads are also important and it is a matter of pain and regret to me that in spite of the Dover bypass and the connection from Dunkirk and Boughton to Dover, there is not a dual carriageway all the way down to the port of Dover.

As Dover is the main roll-on, roll-off port and the major passenger port of the kingdom, I think that the time has come when my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Transport should consider carefully whether the dualling of the A2 down to the port of Dover should not be accorded much higher priority. Beyond that, there is the question of the A20-M20 extension. I am fully aware of the sensitivities that must be considered in incorporating into the Bill an extension into the town of Dover, and any point of entry that the Department chooses—it gave us a preview of its thinking some years ago—is bound to be highly sensitive. I hope, however, that at least it will be possible to retain in the Bill the extension that takes the road round and beyond the village of Capel le Ferne. Capel has been promised a bypass for many years and the weight of traffic that will be generated by the works on the tunnel will justify the incorporation of the bypass in the Bill.

Secondly, I believe that the retention of the relevant clauses in the Bill will be an earnest or pledge to the inhabitants of Dover, especially the operators in and from the port of Dover, that they will have a proper connection to the motorway network. If there were any doubt or hesitation about that, that would be to build in a tremendous advantage for the tunnel and would put the ferry operators and port operators at Dover in an unacceptably disadvantaged position. I hope that, even at this late stage, the members of the Select Committee and the Minister of State will give due weight to that consideration.

There will be many other matters to which, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, we shall return, if the House passes the order, during the next Session. As time is short, I do not want to explore once again all the general considerations that the House should take into account in considering the Bill. I hope very much that my hon. Friend the Minister of State and all those who have a direct hand in this important question that is crucial for the future of east Kent, and for my constituency in particular, will bear in mind the fundamental princple tht there should be fair competition and that nothing should be weighted in favour of the Channel tunnel against the operations of the ferries and ports of east Kent.

As I do not believe that the present cloud of uncertainty should hang over east Kent any longer, and as I should like to see the matter thrashed through to a conclusion one way or another in the next Session, I will not be joining right hon. and hon. Members on the Opposition Benches in voting against the order.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): Paragraph (c) (vi) of the motion reads:

"Any Petitioner whose Petition stands referred to the Committee in the next Session shall, subject to the rules and Orders of the House and to the Prayer of his Petition, be entitled to be heard by himself, his Counsel or Agents upon his Petition".

I am not making a facetious point in suggesting that one of the limits of the motion is that it was clearly drawn up by a man. Several of the petitioners from my constituency are of the other sex, and several of them found it extremely difficult to put their views to the Select Committee.

I join my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes), who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, in endorsing the integrity of the members of the Select Committee. It may be that, as in other cases, some Members have more integrity than others. That will remain to be seen in due course. The reality is that, whereas the original Bill and the order say that individual persons of whatever sex are entitled to be heard, the Select Committee procedure has been such that considerable pressure has been put on the individual petitioner not to take time in putting his or her case.

Again, the Select Committee is up against difficulties. I am not suggesting that it is a matter of pressure from the Government to make sure that the business is done by a certain time or date. The Committee does not need such pressure to realise that it has many petitions with which to deal. But there is no way in which the Select Committee has fulfilled the commitment given by the then Secretary of State for Transport that the Committee's procedure would be not only as good as but better than a public inquiry. In a public inquiry, major issues such as whether a single London terminus should be the sole outlet for traffic would not have been dealt with by taking evidence on only one and a half days. This is of considerable importance, as my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North pointed out. I am glad that he supported the case for a public inquiry into the sole use of Waterloo as an outlet for Channel tunnel traffic.

Furthermore, there is no way in which a public inquiry would have allowed a major development proposal such as the sole use of Waterloo to be made without the proposers having been called to give evidence. It is scandalous—I am sure that the Government Ministers on the Front Bench are gripped by this matter, as they are paying such close attention to it — that a Select Committee should have been given terms of reference in which neither British Rail nor Customs and Excise is called upon to set its case before the Committee.

I can illustrate that by some figures. Indirectly, through the Government's agent, we have learnt in evidence to the Select Committee that the traffic impact estimates for Waterloo given or used by British Rail assume 6 million passengers a year. However, British Rail is now talking —it depends on what day one gets it—of 15 million to 20 million passengers a year passing through Waterloo. One does not need to be a mathematical genius to see that if one takes a number, say 6 million, and trebles it as British Rail has done, and then subtracts some passengers getting off at Ashford, the result is not the 6 million on which British Rail is basing its figures for estimates of traffic congestion and the viability of traffic use around the station.

The reality is that the congestion is likely to be horrendous. The Minister kindly agreed to come to Waterloo, and he may be surprised to know that there is no special barb about to follow my thanking him on behalf of the local community for doing so. He spent more time there than the Select Committee and went round the environs of Waterloo seeing the local community and the way in which the traffic access ramps could not possibly take three-lane traffic, as is anticipated in British Rail's plan. Anybody standing outside to catch a cab at Waterloo, or coming out of Waterloo East, should face the fact that British Rail is proposing three-lane traffic in that area without widening the road.

[Mr. Stuart Holland]

Ministers of both parties and Back-Bench Members have stressed that nobody has a magic formula for reversing inner-city decline and stemming the crisis into which the inner city has fallen. After seeing the area, the local community, the housing, and the efforts made by the community to make this part of the inner city flourish, the Minister told a television programme that he had learnt a great deal. He said that he had not appreciated just how many new housing and community projects there were in the area, and that British Rail had a case to answer on the traffic impact and about dispersal of traffic, and whether there should be a single flagship terminal.

I welcome the fact that the Minister was able to say that. However, such issues are not being addressed by the Select Committee. It is not clear to me, as the hon. Member who represents the Vauxhall constituency, just when these issues will be properly addressed. Nor is it clear, I regret to say, whether the Department of Transport has any clear idea what the total traffic impact on the south bank is likely to be of another 20 million passengers a year and an estimated 4 million vehicles a year coming into or going out of Waterloo.

The proposal has now been made by London Regional Transport that the National Bus Company terminal should be moved from Victoria station, where its lease from Grosvenor Estates is running out, to either of two sites in London, one of which is at Vauxhall bridge. This is relevant to the entire matter of the commercial viability of the Channel tunnel project. British Rail has been challenged on where the traffic coming out of Waterloo will go.

Will the bus tour operators be linking up with the rail link? Will the traffic go across Westminster bridge and Waterloo bridge into central London? "Oh no," British Rail said. "It will be using the south bank and embankment routes and going either west or north across Chelsea bridge or Albert bridge." That could be tremendous if we were considering only buses coming out of Waterloo, but the problem is that the traffic may now run into another 240 buses an hour going into or coming out of the new National Bus Company terminal at the Vauxhall Cross intersection.

I have tabled questions to Ministers on this——

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): This is the first proposal that I have heard that will have such a strategic impact on London. It is a pity that we do not have a strategic planning authority to assess it. The idea of a National Bus Company terminal at Vauxhall is surprising and almost inconceivable.

Mr. Holland: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. I must say that not only I, but many in the local community were staggered to find that, of the range of possible sites being considered, only in the past few weeks has London Regional Transport come to consider Vauxhall as one of its two main options; and, taking its hint from the way that the role of public inquiries has been downgraded by the Government's handling of the Channel tunnel issue, LRT gave notice only a few weeks ago that evidence from the local community supporting or protesting against the proposal had to be in by the end of October. That meant that the local authority—in this case Lambeth — could not even consider the new proposal in any detail. It had no details of the new proposal that it could submit in time to its normal monthly planning committee. Lambeth therefore has not been in a position to give proper evidence.

That is directly relevant to Waterloo. British Rail wants to get away with traffic congestion figures based on 6 million passengers, when it is now talking about 20 million. Indeed, 20 million passengers could be critical to the commercial viability of the project. It is not at all apparent that the road network on the south bank can take either the additional traffic from a London bus terminal at Vauxhall Cross or the additional traffic at Waterloo. It certainly cannot take both.

In that context, I put it to the House that the case for a public inquiry into the Waterloo issue, as there may or may not be recommendations for public inquiries involving other road networks associated with the Channel tunnel project, is evidenced by this simple fact. The traffic throughput at Waterloo with a 20 million passenger flow would be equivalent to one jumbo jet entering or leaving Waterloo station every three and a half minutes. The total passenger flow at Waterloo would be equivalent to that at Gatwick airport.

Is it conceivable that a new airport or traffic flows of that kind, would be accepted by Parliament without proper and due scrutiny? Instead, the matter was considered for two and a half days, including the evidence that was put to the Select Committee both by local community groups and by Lambeth council. It is essential that these issues are considered not only by a Standing Committee, which would face similar pressures to those that were faced by the Select Committee, but by a public inquiry.

Furthermore, British Rail is not being called to give evidence to the Select Committee. I referred to this yesterday at Question Time. An article in the New Civil Engineer of 30 October said that, according to British Rail market analyst Ken Gibbs, British Rail is planning a new —it is called top secret—Channel rail link to get a fast rail service from the coast to London. In his reply to my question yesterday the Minister said that he knew "of no authoritative suggestion that there should be a new rail line from the coast to Victoria". — [Official Report, 3 November 1986; Vol. 103, c. 671.]

That lets the Minister off the hook on two grounds. First, the decision about what is or is not authoritative is entirely subjective. The Minister can decide that something carries authority and that something else does not. Tonight we want to know whether it has come to his attention that any proposal has been made by anybody regarding such a link. Secondly, we want to know whether it has been considered, as Ken Gibbs is alleged to have said, by British Rail. Furthermore, we need to know its implications for the Channel tunnel project, especially the case for dispersal and the case for the use of Waterloo, rather than Victoria, as a flagship terminal.

I quote from the New Civil Engineer, the magazine of the Institute of Civil Engineers. It says that Mr. Gibbs apparently "declined to reveal details of BR's plans to deal with the shortfall in capacity but it is understood a new line would leave the London-Dover line near Paddock Wood, pass to the east of the hillside village of Ightham and either travel along the M25 corridor before rejoining the main line north of Sevenoaks or continue due north joining the Rochester main line near Swanley."

I do not know what Conservative Members feel about such a new rail line proposal, which has implications for a least some of their constituents.

No evidence has been given by British Rail to the Select Committee because British Rail is not being called upon to give evidence to it. However, the implication — I quote from this article in the New Civil Engineer of only a few days ago—is:

"This latter option gives the possibility of routing Chunnel traffic into Victoria station, relieving the anticipated pressure of 20 million passengers per year at Waterloo by the turn of the century."

Officially, British Rail and Eurotunnel are denying the existence of these plans. However, observers have commented:

"BR would do well to hide high speed plans until the Channel tunnel is built. If the tunnel was in place and the network seen to be patently inadequate, then the argument for the new railway would be clear. To publicly acknowledge the need for it before work on the fixed link had even begun would risk an embarrassing public row . . . Few forget that public outcry over a similar plan in 1974 helped scotch the previous Chunnel venture."

Whether or not one supports or opposes a fixed rail link, these are matters to which hon. Members as well as the Select Committee have a right to answers now from the Government.

If we are to take the Select Committee and Standing Committee procedure seriously, and whether we are to vote for or against this order tonight, hon. Members need to know what is in the pipeline and what is being considered. It is alleged that this new rail link will be privately financed and privately operated. That might appeal to Conservative Members. They will not be surprised to hear that it does not appeal to me. In the same way a further issue arises, because British Rail has apparently admitted to that magazine, although not to the House, that at peak times, with commuter traffic coming into Waterloo, it will not be able to accommodate more than two trains an hour, whereas it needs four trains an hour for commercial viability. The Minister should answer those questions tonight.

I have another point that will no doubt enthral the House. At some time or another most of us have played with trains, and know that with a single track and a loop, or even two tracks, the problem of how a fast train is to pass a slower train arises. No wonder British Rail wants an entirely new fixed system. If the project is to be commercially viable, the trains must run on time. Someone somewhere else once said that the trains had to run on time, and would do so. It is interesting that in his analysis of Fascist Italy, Dennis Mack Smith considered Mussolini's claim that the trains ran on time. He found that by and large the inter-city trains ran on time, but that as the track was inadequate, any local passenger train or goods train in the way was shunted off the main line. Indeed, freight was lost for weeks and months in Italy in the 1930s. I am glad that that brings at least half a smile to the faces of some Conservative Members.

What will happen to traffic, including commuter traffic, in the south-east of England if Channel tunnel trains are to run on time, on inadequate track? Their dictates will be fulfilled and commuter traffic will be pushed out of the way. Happily, I am not suggesting that a commuter train will be lost, never to be found again, as apparently happened to the local freight traffic in Italy, but commuters will be pushed out of the way in other ways. Their services will be slower, and will be disrupted. Commuters will obtain a second-class service because of the imperatives of the link.

Those issues should be addressed in the Bill. What rights will the private operators of such a new rail link have? Who will take the decision on the priority allocation of trains? Are the Government going to back the tunnel operators and give them a commitment that they will have priority in the use of lines? Will there be a new private line?

I am well aware that several Conservative Members wish to speak, and there will no doubt be a sigh of relief when I say that I am about to conclude my speech. But I have this to add. The Secretary of State is supposed to be a serious politician. That may come as a surprise to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), but the Secretary of State is supposed to be on his way up within the Conservative party. I am sorry that he is not in the Chamber, but no doubt he will return shortly. Indeed, we even heard recently that he is a possible contender in due course for the leadership. Consequently, I suggest that the Minister should get a message through to the Secretary of State.

If the Secretary of State endorses such a crass muddle over the impact of local traffic, he will not make any positive reputation for himself in the House, but he will become known as the man who made the biggest planning bungle of the 20th century. That would be bad for travellers on the Channel fixed link, bad for commuters and bad finance. If the Government had any sense, they would come clean about the matter, put the issues to the House and hold a public inquiry to enable them to be properly considered.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): I listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland). I certainly hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench also listened to him carefully, because he spoke about a major problem that has been thrown up by the Channel tunnel project. I refer to the arrival and departure of passengers at the London terminal. It is important and right that the hon. Gentleman should raise that matter. His is the one voice in the House that speaks of this problem in his constituency. It is quite right that he should. I am interested in his comments.

We are considering a motion to suspend consideration of this Bill and to take it into the next Session of Parliament. The views of my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) have been attacked by other hon. Members before. I have great admiration for my hon. Friend, but I do not understand why he should be against the Channel tunnel. It certainly does not serve his constituents to speak as he does. I suggest that my hon. Friend is against the French, the Common Market and the Community. I suggest that that underlies everything that he has said tonight and on many occasions in the House, in public, in the press and in articles that he has written which express his opinion so strongly, so dramatically and so passionately against this fixed link. He disclosed tonight in his speech, to which we listened with interest — we must listen because he is a highly intelligent man who serves his constituents and Parliament well—the reasons why, like my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), he is passionately against Europe. Okay, it is quite true.

Mr. Aitken rose——

Mr. Crouch: If I may develop this point, I shall then willingly give way.

We are discussing whether to consider the Channel Tunnel Bill — the fixed link from this country to the continent of Europe—in the next Session of Parliament. I happen to be in favour of it—not that my constituents are in favour of it—because I believe it is in favour of Great Britain and its economic, social and future development. I could be wrong, so could the Prime Minister, the Cabinet, the present Secretary of State for Transport and successive Secretaries of State for Transport.

There is another view—that it is not right to have a fixed link and it is a disadvantage. The right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) does not believe it would be to our economic advantage. He has honourably and strongly held the view over many years that he is not in favour of our membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Aitken: I know that my hon. Friend would not wish to misrepresent my motives. I have spoken so often about the Channel tunnel that I cannot always repeat everything on every single occasion I speak. I am against the Channel tunnel on national grounds, for the reasons outlined tonight and on other occasions. On local grounds, I have a very strong constituency reason, strongly supported by my constituents. The reason is that Ramsgate is Britain's second biggest Channel port. It is highly vulnerable to a loss of business of the kind that the Channel tunnel is almost certain to provide. For that reason alone, I assure my hon. Friend that my stand is highly popular in my constituency, and that is a very good local motive.

Mr. Crouch: It is not for me to question how my hon. Friend's constituents view the matter. He is the judge of that. He knows how his constituency views it. I am sure he is popular, but I think he is wrong. I do not think there are many in this country who agree with him. He said the idea of this fixed link — this Channel tunnel — was a question of monumentitis and that is why it is being done.

There is another voice echoing in the House tonight. It comes from my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East and it is a typical voice. My hon. Friends the Members for Southend, East and for Thanet, South are typical. They do not want to see any monument to any progress. They used a phrase which I shall use against them. They do not want to see progress or achievement. They do not want to be 19th century entrepreneurs. They want to be 20th century backward thinkers. I say that with all the passion I can command, because I believe in the future of our country. Few of us seem to have the guts to believe in the future of this country — much better to close the door, lift the drawbridge and say, "Let us be little Englanders." If ever there were a little Englander in the House, it is the right hon. Member for Deptford. Of course, he is honourable—little Englanders can be quite honourable—but he is such a person.

Mr. Silkin: I am a large Commonwealther.

Mr. Crouch: When the right hon. Gentleman talks of the Commonwealth, I cannot help but think that perhaps in my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South there lingers, even for family reasons, a longing for what was once called empire and for what the right hon. Member for Deptford calls Commonwealth. I give no ground to anyone in my belief in the Commonwealth, but I believe also in our links with Europe.

It is right to debate the Bill in the next Session, because it needs further consideration. The hon. Member for Vauxhall has told us that further consideration of the London content and problem is needed, and I agree with him. Many environmental problems in Kent need further consideration in the House and in the other place. More time should be given to them. That is why I agree with this motion.

I do not want to be too unkind in criticising hon. Members because their views differ from mine. If one raises one's voice in passion, that is the custom of the House and it is encouraged by the House. Whether one wants that or not, it cannot be helped. One raises one's voice because one believes in one's view, and one may be wrong. As I have said before in talking about this project, many of my constituents think that I am wrong. Perhaps I am wrong, but perhaps not. I am not saying this just to support my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Cabinet. That has not been my wont. I have done what I have thought to be right for the country. I think that this project is right for the country.

We all know that our export market is in Europe, with more than 60 per cent. of our exports going there. Some purists would say that those are not exports and that we are all in one market—a home market. It is a colossal home market, but the fact is that more than 60 per cent.

of the exports which earn us our wealth cross the Channel by an inefficient means, relying on ship transport. I do not accept that relying on shipping alone is sufficient but I accept that a direct rail link from Glasgow, Edinburgh, Newcastle, Leeds, London——

Mr. Silkin: Aberdeen.

Mr. Crouch: Of course, I am talking of an electric rail link under the Channel to Paris, Brussels, Milan and Frankfurt. That is the way for this country to grow and, perhaps for the first time, to enjoy the benefits of being in the much larger market of 400 million people which is called the European Community.

This matter needs more consideration. We must not rush that. No one can accuse the Government of having rushed it, but perhaps there is something in Labour Members' statement, which they have advanced so consistently, that it would be better to have a public inquiry lasting a year or more. That is democracy at work. I believe that consultation with the public and the public's presentation of their views to Members of Parliament through a Select Committee are not bad ways in a modern system for people to have their voices heard right up to the very fount—the Minister. When parliamentarians report to the Minister, it is better than when an inspector reports.

Mr. Stuart Holland: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he said earlier. But surely there is a mean between a public inquiry which may take a year and giving evidence by the local community in a day and a half. That is what is wrong and why the local community cannot be heard.

Mr. Crouch: The hon. Gentleman has reminded me of something that he said which I thought was perhaps the most telling thing said tonight. He said—and I must accept that this is right as no hon. Member contradicted him—that only a day and a half had been given for the consideration of the important question of what effect the project would have on the traffic environment in London. That is very important. Much more time should be given to that question. Heaven knows, it is difficult enough to do anything in a crowded city like London, and that point deserves a great deal of thought and consideration. I concede that point.

I criticise my hon. Friends and others, but perhaps I am being unfair. If I am, may I be unfair to all the British people? What has happened to the British people today? How different they are from what they were 150 years ago when Stephenson invented the railway. We built the railways in this and so many other countries in the world. We did not stumble or hesitate; we did it. We built the Severn tunnel and we did not stumble or hesitate. It took 14 days of explanation in Committee to get the Severn tunnel project through the House. Engineers argued their case and were heard in departmental Select Committees. So many Select Committees had to hear those cases 140 to 150 years ago. Last century Parliament was not only busy but brave and prepared to take decisions. We were not little Englanders in the 19th century. We were guilty of many other crimes and we created colossal industrial slums and degradation for part of our country as we developed our industrial revolution—we must not do that again—but we made decisions and got on with things. We became rich and great and the most powerful nation in the world because we had the courage in this House of Commons and Parliament to make decisions, and the British people were behind us.

It can be argued that the British people in those days did not enjoy the full franchise of parliamentary democracy as we enjoy it today, so decision making is slower now because we have to consult more people and take more time about it. However, whereas they were not frightened last century, we are frightened today. People are frightened and they complain.

What are we afraid of as we contemplate these great projects like the Channel tunnel—the biggest engineering project in the history of Europe? Are we afraid of competition? Are we afraid of being swamped by the French? We used not to be afraid of the French.

Mr. Silkin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Crouch: Of course, but the right hon. Gentleman is interrupting a splendid flow.

Mr. Silkin: Was it not Lord Randolph Churchill who killed the Channel tunnel project in the 1880s?

Mr. Crouch: Yes, it was.

Mr. David Mitchell: My hon. Friend will recall that, while Lord Randolph Churchill condemned the project, his son supported it.

Mr. Crouch: Yes, it is very interesting. In fact, Lord Randolph Churchill's great grandson today tells me that his father-in-law was one of the fathers of the idea of the Channel tunnel, whereas his great grandfather, Lord Randolph Churchill, was one of those who opposed it. It is interesting to see how thinking develops within a family, let alone within a Parliament.

One of the worst things that can happen in making a speech is to be sidetracked into the glorious avenues of history. I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Deptford for not going further up that avenue.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) said some nasty and unkind things earlier in his speech. Would he at least have the humility to accept that, just because a scheme is big and imaginative and attracts a lot of headlines and little coloured pamphlets, it is not necessarily sound or a sensible use of public money? Does he not realise that the British public are getting a little upset about schemes such as De Lorean and Concorde, which were big and imaginative but which wasted a lot of money which could have been better spent in other ways?

Mr. Crouch: I hope that my hon. Friend will not think that I am being unkind to him. I am performing in the House as he performs when he advances his views so strongly against our membership of the European Community. He is entitled to those views, just as I am entitled to mine.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: One must be humble.

Mr. Crouch: I will show as much humility as I can, and I will bear in mind my hon. Friend's stricture to do so.

Are the British people afraid of change? It is a terrible indictment if they are. If they are, then it is up to the House to give them the leadership and encouragement not to be afraid of change—or of Concorde. They must not be afraid of a great advance in aerospace technology. I accept that Concorde may not have been a great economic success because its research and development was paid for by the Government. However, it has broken through not just the sound barrier, but a barrier which shows that there is a future for supersonic aircraft for passenger travel. I do not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East. Concorde did cost money, but successive Governments, supported by the French encouraged it.

Are we afraid of competition and change or are we afraid of the challenge of change and competition? It seems so to me at times. I can understand the people of Kent being opposed to the tunnel, because they tell me so. It will change a part of Kent considerably. It will change Folkestone — the Shepway constituency. It will change Cheriton, Newington and Peen dramatically. Perhaps Newington and Peen will disappear under the marshalling yards at the entrance to the tunnel. I am looking for my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Rees) because the tunnel will also change Dover. It will change the traffic pattern to that town. Ashford will grow bigger and richer and more jobs will be created there. It will change Ramsgate. I believe that that port will grow in importance alongside the fixed link at Folkestone. I could be wrong. I believe that there is a need for an ancillary service to the continent by large economic ferry ships. However, the tunnel will not change my constituency of Canterbury, although people think it will. Two million tourists and pilgrims come to Canterbury every year, and they will still be coming, perhaps even more.

The tunnel will change the pattern in Kent. Most of it will be attracted to the M20 that will feed the tunnel. That will be better for Kent's environment. It will funnel the massive amount of traffic, domestic cars and lorries going to join the tunnel on to one road. It will be an advantage to have the traffic on one road rather than as at present spread across so many different roads to so many different ports in Kent. I can understand the people in east Kent being anxious and angry — they are angry — at the prospect of this change to their environment and the way they live today. Kent is an area for living or even retiring, not so much for earning a living. It is called the garden of England. It is a beautiful area. I live there myself and I shall go on living there even when the tunnel is built.

There may not be an advantage to the people who live around the tunnel entrance, at least not as they enjoy life today. Future generations may take a different view. Our children and grandchildren who will continue to live there may like the jobs and modern, high standard of living that will develop. Folkestone may not remain a retirement town; it may become a bustling, exciting link town with the continent.

Whatever the people of east Kent or Kent as a whole think, theirs is not the only voice to be heard in Britain on this massive decision. Some in the north-east, north-west, south Wales and Scotland, all of whom have spoken in the House, do not want the fixed link because, they say, it will make Kent prosperous at their expense — part of the golden triangle in the south-east. Others believe that Britain needs a fixed link as we now have the biggest, fastest growing export market in the world. The Government must take note of all those voices and strongly held views.

The Government must listen to my hon. Friends who disagree with the project because there is something in all the arguments. They must not be ignored, and their views must be taken into account. The Government and Parliament have a duty to heed them. That is why we need time. The Government must act in Britain's best interests, advance our economy, protect our environment and spread the work opportunity across the country. Those factors are all equally important. In the past 15 years the great industrial development in the North sea has been spread across our engineering bases in England and Scotland.

The Government have a duty to explain their case and to put forward the advantages in contrast with the disadvantages voiced so eloquently by others. They must be more eloquent in advising the public, particularly those who see disadvantages, of the genuine advantages of this fixed link. The Government have a duty to promise that they will protect the environment. That is what Kent needs above all and what it is so worried about. In all those matters I want the Government to have more time so that they can carry the great majority of the people with them on a great project of great advantage to the country.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): In some ways it is appropriate that I follow the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch), who referred to the old pilgrimage trail. The western half of my constituency is the ancient borough of Southwark. It was from Southwark to Canterbury and vice versa that pilgrims, first for matters spiritual and later for matters more mercenary, went down what is now the A2, which starts at London bridge and goes to Dover. Halfway through my constituency there is a sign to Dover and Folkestone, 72 miles away.

I have a small part of the London end of this project in my constituency, as the western edge of my constituency includes part of Waterloo. Although it is proper that the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland), who represents the northern third of Lambeth, speaks principally for that larger community, my constituents in the northern third of Southwark have as great an interest.

It was always clear that this Bill—unusual in nature, a hybrid Bill—with its Select Committee and Standing Committee, and its passage to the House of Lords, would be the subject of a motion such as this. The motion is not surprising given the debates that we had at the beginning of the current Session. The question which still remains to be answered — I remind the Minister that he has not answered the question put by my other parliamentary neighbour, the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) — is why this is not a Sessional Order as opposed to a Standing Order of the House. If the Government envisage that they will only need the forthcoming Session of Parliament to complete their procedural work, they only need an order covering that one Session. Something that is put into the Standing Orders, as the right hon. Member for Deptford said, remains part of the Standing Orders of the House until repealed. I should be interested to hear why the last clause is in the motion.

I welcome the fact that the motion recognises that it is not for the House collectively, or for the Government, to put pressure on the Select Committee. It is no secret that the Select Committee has been deliberating again today and, having completed its evidence only a matter of days ago, is likely to announce its conclusions tomorrow. It is right that the Committee should not be put under any further pressure. If, for any reason, the Committee is able to announce only part of its conclusions and further work is needed, it is proper that it should be given that time. It is the procedures as opposed to the principles of the Bill that are my greatest concern as a Member representing the interests of my constituents as well as the interests of my party.

When legislation comes before the House, there is always a dilemma as to how the timetabling should work. It is regarded as a weapon of opposition that one can hold up Government business. The weapon of a Government with a sufficient majority is that they bring in a guillotine motion which is passed unless there is a sufficient internal rebellion. I hope that the Government, once the Select Committee has completed its task, will not try to railroad through the debates which will be necessary in the Standing Committee of this House or in the Committee of the other place.

It is right that proper debate takes place. It may be possible to agree on a timetable from the start of proceedings but that is the perennial question that arises when the first clauses are contemplated in detail but are followed by a rush of debate and a guillotine at the end. The way in which the interested parties will proceed depends upon adequate time being made available after the completion of the order and its passage.

I have two worries which I wish to express on behalf of my constituents who live just over Westminster bridge on the south bank—they are partly procedural and partly substantive. The Bill makes it clear that Waterloo will be the terminal in London. It is clear from the evidence that ten years ago Waterloo was not contemplated as the terminal in London,. When the predecessor to this Bill was before the House there were 10 suggested termini and Waterloo was not one of them.

It is not abundantly clear why Waterloo should be the terminus. Clearly there are two Southern region stations of substance — Victoria and Waterloo. One might include Blackfriars, which has a claim, or London Bridge. A terminus was suggested at King's Cross using the Snow Hill link. A terminus at docklands was also suggested.

Why has British Rail not been asked to put its case? Why was the consideration of Waterloo as the terminus to cope with such a massive influx of people specifically excluded from the Select Committee's deliberations? That Committee worked as hard as anybody could have asked any Select Committee to work. The hon. Member for Vauxhall is right. We are talking about 20 million people, not 6 million — phenomenal crowds. As the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) said, we have had difficulties enough coping with crowds on the accesses to the Channel ports for centuries. To allow a massive new influx without permitting any argument is unacceptable.

We must have something from the Minister tonight to put at rest the valid fears of communities which inevitably are always under threat in the intense metropolitan life of an inner city, particularly in the capital. He knows about development sites. He has seen the pressures and the efforts being made to hold communities together because of the incursion of office blocks and traffic. He knows the projections for vehicular traffic up to the end of the century. He knows the practical difficulties that already exist.

We are always complaining about buses and coaches parked on Westminster bridge and about colleagues being delayed access to the House for Divisions because of traffic congestion. There is regular trouble on the other side of the river—not only at rush hours—outside the Department of Education and Science, along York road, around Waterloo station, along Waterloo road and Westminster bridge road, and along the Embankment to Vauxhall cross, which is a major and congested intersection.

It is imperative that fears about traffic flows and traffic management are allayed properly by proper investigation and inquiry. It is not sufficient to say that there will be no opportunity for the problems to be explored. If the problems were not attached to the Channel Tunnel Bill, they would be the subject of a public inquiry. If we cannot have a public inquiry—I accept the outcome of the debate — we must do something to ensure that the problems are examined.

The London evidence took only two and a half days in the Select Committee last month. The development of a terminus for international rail traffic in London merits much more than that. We must have some assurance that the Government will allow the arguments to be expressed.

The major anxiety is traffic — the handling of passenger traffic, the ancillary traffic and the works in the schedule. There is a knock-on—perhaps knockdown—concern about what will happen as a result of the development. I think of housing implications, social services and accommodation. Housing, and the space to go with it, is immensely important.

I do not underestimate the importance of the problems worrying people in the Kent villages and on the coast. Communities are at stake in both places. The Minister must know from the record number of petitions and petitioners that communities at both ends are unhappy.

The Government have one more year in which to remedy that unhappiness. I do not want to argue about whether the project will go ahead or whether the City will come up with the money—that is for other people and other places. But the Bill has several stages yet, here and in another place. The Minister must try to find mechanisms so that those who have been prevented from asking questions and having them answered, about transport primarily, but also about housing, open space and land and other community issues, are given the opportunity to put their case.

I am, above all, like every other hon. Member, sent here to represent my constituents. The way in which, and the ease and co-operation with which, the Government will be assisted in the remaining stages of the Bill depend on the Minister giving a sympathetic and positive response to the anxieties, strongly put by my neighbours on both sides, irrespective of political difference and shared by people who have equal community concerns in Kent. I hope that the Minister will be positive.

10.50 pm

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) made an all too typically Liberal speech, elaborately sitting on the fence and refusing to come down on either side. He reminded me of the statement, "These are my principles and if you do not like them I have some others which may suit you better."

Having said that, I am bound to say that the hon. Gentleman, like the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland), raised important points regarding the London part of this business. I am rather persuaded by what both said that these matters have not received the consideration that they deserve. It is no argument against the motion but I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will have taken on board the genuine anxiety felt on both sides of the House that these matters require careful consideration.

I intend to be brief. I shall be a great deal briefer than my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) and I shall be a great deal less charitable than he was about the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken). I am sorry to see that he is not in the Chamber and if I waffle for a minute or two he may return. I intend to criticise severely the unworthy and distasteful speech that he made in opening the debate from the Back Benches this evening.

No doubt the speech will get the publicity that it deserves. That is to say, it will get the headlines in The Sun. But this is a responsible legislative Chamber and I ask all hon. Members, whether they are for the project or against it, what conveivable useful purpose is served by trying to whip up hatred against our allies and our French partners. I am glad to see that my hon. Friend has returned to the Chamber because I can now repeat what I have said, which was that I found his speech unworthy and distasteful.

Mr. Aitken: I would not have expected anything less of my hon. Friend.

Sir Anthony Meyer: I am glad to have fulfilled my hon. Friend's expectations.

What conceivable useful purpose is served in trying to whip up hatred against the French? We have to work with them. They are our partners in the European Community. If we fall out, things will go badly for both of us.

Mr. Aitken: What about Syria?

Sir Anthony Meyer: There my hon. Friend goes again, spreading stories, which turn out to be untrue, that the French are about to embark on a great arms deal with Syria.

The Eurotunnel project, which of course raises doubts and anxieties, will bring great benefits to both our countries, as well as to a great many other countries besides, unless we fall to squabbling about which of the two will derive the greater share of the benefit. There is a doctrine which seems to be alien to the thinking of my hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and others who think like him, and that is the idea that the whole can be greater than the sum of the parts. If both sides work together on a project, the total good that can be achieved for both of them can be greater than what each of them puts into it.

I should like to make one contribution to the argument about which side derives the greater benefit. This tunnel will extend the continental railway system by some 400 miles, but it will extend the British railway system by 1,500 miles or more. My constituency depends very much on the continued viability of the British railway system. Like a great many people in peripheral areas, my constituents readily accept the argument that the construction of this tunnel will do almost more than anything else to put British Rail on a viable course. Because my constituents depend to a large extent on British Rail for their continued prosperity, this project is undoubtedly good news for them.

There is an uncovenanted benefit from this project, although it is one upon which I do not want to dwell. It is that British rolling stock will be able to travel freely all over the continental rail system, but continental rolling stock will find considerable difficulty in negotiating our tighter curves, closer lines and smaller tunnels. By cheating, we seem in that case to be making a net gain.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South made the worst of a bad case, especially when he alleged that the Eurotunnel promoters were having great difficulty in raising the money. He is evidently disappointed that they have succeeded in raising the money that they set out to raise. But it would not be surprising if there were difficulties in raising money, because people who put up money for such a project are not to know that my hon. Friend and those who think like him are an insignificant minority in the House, as will be evident in the vote. For all that prospective investors know, 600 hon. Members may think like my hon. Friend and prefer to dwell on the difficulties, the obstacles, the disadvantages and the drawbacks, and think that Britain will be the loser, that we will be taken for a ride and that we are the suckers in all this.

It is a miracle that any measure can get through the parliamentary labyrinth nowadays. If one combines the parliamentary obstacles that have always existed with the growing national worship of failure, exemplified in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South, it is amazing that anything is ever done in Britain. The order that we are debating is an ingredient in enabling such a miracle to be brought about, and I have no hesitation in supporting it.

Dr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): The anxieties of my constituents have been expressed in hundreds of words to the Select Committee, and I should like to pay tribute, if not to what the Committee is likely to say in its report — I cannot prejudge that — to the Committee for the way in which it has received those words of my constituents. Apart from the more esoteric concerns, the anxieties in north-east Kent boil down to a couple of simple issues. My constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) live behind the tunnel door. They see the prospect of a fixed link not as a job creator, but as the north-east Kent bypass.

My constituents are surrounded by a poor road infrastructure and they see the French Government pouring money into the infrastructure in the Pas de Calais. They have no incentive to offer like the incentive offered by the French in the Pas de Calais. Until fairly recently they had no cause to believe that their worries were not well justified. During the summer recess my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Transport and the Under-Secretary of State for Employment with responsibility for tourism and more recently my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry visited north-east Kent. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry in an interview with the Thanet Extra, one of our local papers, said that "he was convinced that better roads into the area were necessary before assistance could be given."

In the Isle of Thanet Gazette he is reported as saying:

"Firms are unlikely to invest in Thanet unless road and rail links are improved because at the moment lorries cannot get in and out."

My hon. Friend the Minister of State is right.

My hon. Friend kindly visited Thanet early on Sunday, and I place on record my thanks, and those of my constituents, for the courtesy and sympathy with which he viewed our problems. I would not wish to suggest that the Thanet way is the modern equivalent of the road to Damascus, but anyone who travels in the middle of the road over Roman Galley hill comes perilously close to his maker. My hon. Friend was kind enough to acknowledge upon his departure that he had learnt a great deal from his visit.

As a result of my hon. Friend's visit, Kent county council has submitted a three-phase plan for the improvement of the entire Thanet way. It has also submitted an application for Government support. I would like to hope and believe that that support might be forthcoming. I would like also to hope that Thanet's claims for intermediate status, or the establishment of an enterprise zone, might be heeded. If we are to realise the potential of north-east Kent, there must be a concerted effort by the Departments of Transport, Employment, the Environment and Trade and Industry, together with the Kent county council. That will be necessary with or without the prospect of a fixed link.

The port of Ramsgate, which employs many of my constituents, has deposited exciting plans for its development and I hope and believe that it can succeed. The operators of what is becoming known as Kent international airport at Manston have exciting plans as well, and I believe that they can succeed. We can attract industry and I believe that we can compete with the French, but if we are to do so it must be on equal terms.

Only today I attended the launch of a major computer and electronics initiative. The research and development for the project has been carried out in my constituency. The manufacturing that will follow will be located — where? Will it be in Thanet, Kent or northern France? There is a major — I hesitate to say "national" — company that next month will be holding a reception at the Ritz hotel, to which 100 bankers have been invited. This has been done to attract investment in industrial development. Is this development to take place in Kent or in England? The answer is no. It is to take place in northern France. It is recognised that the attractions and facilities in northern France are better than those provided in the United Kingdom.

It may surprise my Whips and some of my colleagues when I say that I shall support the carry-over motion. That is not because I have become converted suddenly to the attractions of the Channel tunnel. I shall do so because the House demonstrated on Second Reading its wish that the debate should continue. I believe that there is a great deal more to be said and that there may be a great deal more to oppose. I would like to think that we can make progress in this matter and I shall support the motion.

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): I may surprise the Government Whips and some of my hon. Friends when I say that, although I am an opponent of the project, I shall support the carry-over motion. It is essentially a procedural matter, but that does not minimise its importance. If the House passes a carry-over motion, it is according a privilege to the promoters of a Bill that should only rarely be granted. I shall demonstrate that by suggesting to all my hon. Friends how horrified they would be if the Government were to bring forward straightforward Government legislation and suggest that that should be carried over.

There would be horror at such a constitutional outrage, because the ability to ensure that legislation is dropped at the end of a parliamentary year is the fundamental strength not just of the Opposition but of Parliament over the Excutive. Therefore, the carry-over provision is remarkable. The House rightly recognises that we have to give the promoters of private legislation that right to carry-over; otherwise there would be gross injustice to those who had expended a great deal of time and money in a quasi-judicial manner in bringing their case before the House.

Sir Anthony Meyer: I know that it is the accepted doctrine, but does my hon. Friend really think that it is such a valuable ingredient in the preservation of democracy that uncompleted legislation should fall at the end of every Session? It is rather akin to the Treasury being unable to think for more than one year at a time.

Mr. Moate: That is a matter of great debate. I should have thought that the vast majority of the House would agree that to remove that power of Parliament over the Executive would deliver such power to the Executive that parliamentarians would simply become mere rubber stamps. Let us not proceed down that line. My answer is that the power to stop legislation is our greatest strength. Therefore, we are according a remarkable privilege, and one that should be given only for private legislation.

We should think carefully about hybrid Bills, which is what we have here, with major Government legislation as part of it. We are allowing highly controversial legislation to be carried over to a new Session. In this case, we must do so because the promoters have been led down that path and it would be unjust of Parliament not to allow the case to continue to be put. In no way should we fail to understand the importance of what we are doing; nor should we do it lightly.

However, I must express my dissatisfaction with the hybrid procedure for a proposition of this nature. Some valuable points have been made, for example, about the Waterloo terminus. We must put it on record that consideration of the London terminus or termini of the Channel tunnel project is an integral part of the proceedings. It is fundamentally wrong that consideration of that terminus is not part of the whole procedure, and being examined in depth by whatever body is deemed appropriate to consider it. Nobody, even the strong supporters of the Bill, pretended that that consideration has been made.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) drew attention to this point, and then said rather sadly that, because we did not get a public inquiry to consider this matter, he would watch carefully the Government proposals during the coming months. However, his party voted against a public inquiry, so he is trying to have his cake and eat it when he worries about the absence of an inquiry against which he and his party voted.

Mr. Simon Hughes: There are two issues. The first is whether there should have been a public inquiry at the beginning, and the Government made it clear that they would not have one, and the matter was fought and lost some time ago. The second was whether there should be an inquiry into whether the terminus in London should be

[Mr. Simon Hughes]

Waterloo or some other station. My argument was that given that it was clear that this was just a subsection within a clause, and there was not to be a public inquiry into it, there should be far more than two and a half days on limited selective questioning as to whether that was the appropriate formula, excluding asking British Rail to justify its position.

Mr. Moate: The hon. Gentleman said, "The matter was fought and lost some time ago," as though it were a matter of regret, when I presume that he was glad that the battle for a public inquiry was lost because he voted against a public inquiry. We now have to find out from him and his party what they expect by way of public inquiry into this one question.

It is regrettable that the Select Committee, for all its tremendous efforts, has excluded matters that are of fundamental concern, particularly safety, finance and fair compeitition. Other hon. Members have referred to fair competition. I fully accept that my right hon. and hon. Friends will endeavour to build into the project the requirement that there will be fair competition between the ferries and the tunnel. However, legislation now is unlikely to be effective a decade from now if a tunnel is built. It will be even less effective if French or overseas interests end up with a dominant financial interest in the tunnel. The ferries against which they will be competing will be British ferries.

It will be very hard to ensure that the Channel tunnel does not adopt a policy of predatory pricing against ferry operators if at that time the British financial interest in the tunnel is a minority interest. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will say just how we shall be able to ensure that the Channel tunnel operators do not adopt a predatory pricing policy against the remaining ferries. That is not a small matter. If all ferry operations were to come to an end, with all the consequent implications for defence, our maritime tradition and seafaring interests, I suspect that the vast majority of right hon. and hon. Members and the electorate would be against the Channel tunnel project. We are entitled to far greater assurances from the Government on this point.

Without launching into any of the points that were made at some length by my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch), there is immense concern in our county about the environmental impact and damage to commercial interests and to our ports. It has nothing whatever to do with whether or not one was for or against entry into the EEC. To my hon. Friends the Members for Canterbury and for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) it is a romantic dream. They are welcome to it. That is fine. But to others the Channel tunnel is a transport communications system which has to be judged in the light of its impact upon our environment and our commercial interests. My hon. Friends do no justice to the argument by introducing fairly ancient arguments about the EEC.

Furthermore, construction of the tunnel is not necessarily an exciting and imaginative technological challenge to everybody. We have gone beyond that. Already we have highly efficient, varied, fast and economic transport links with the Community. I resent my hon. Friend's allegation that we are "little Englanders." This island has great maritime links with the continent of Europe and with the rest of the world. Being an island has made this country more outward looking than any other nation. My hon. Friend wants to substitute one rolling motorway for a whole range of transport links with Europe. If he finds that exciting, so be it, but it is not right for him to level the charge at other people that because they are against that particular engineering project they are small-minded or "little Englanders." We can be very proud of our maritime links. They are highly developed and highly sophisticated and they are of immense value to this country.

I believe that this is a bad Bill. It will be environmentally damaging to our county and it will not be good for Britain. It is right that the promoters should be allowed to put their case fully, but they should put it in accordance with the traditions and procedures of this House. It should not be done lightly and it should be done now, but in a fairly relaxed manner. This Bill should be allowed to be further examined. Judging by all the historic references to past failures, this tunnel will never be built in our lifetime. During the forthcoming Session of Parliament, I think that the Bill will stumble at one of the many further hurdles that it has yet to encounter.

Mr. David Mitchell: I find myself in happy agreement with the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes), who opened the debate for the Opposition by expressing appreciation for the work of the Select Committee. The House owes a considerable debt to the Chairman and the members of the Select Committee for the tremendous amount of work that they put in. Quite uniquely in the history of Select Committees, the Committee Members went to Kent to meet the local people and see on the ground what was going on. The House will want to put that fact on record.

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North referred to the assertion that it would have been better to have a public inquiry. A public inquiry would involve an inspector, appointed by the Secretary of State, hearing the evidence, not in a wholly dissimilar way from the way in which the Select Committee heard the evidence before it. The inspector would then make his report in private to the Secretary of State, who, in private, would make his decision, against which there would be no appeal, and then publish the inspector's report together with his own decision.

I should have thought that, on a matter of such unique national importance as the Channel tunnel, the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North would take the view that it required something more than a Secretary of State taking the ultimate decision, behind closed doors, as to whether the planning of this tunnel should go ahead. That is why the Select Committee procedure, with the Committee sitting in public and making its report public, is a more democratic one. The highest tribunal of the land can take the decision. The hon. Gentleman can take another view, but I am putting forward mine.

Mr. Robert Hughes: As the Minister takes such a view of the highly democratic nature of our Parliament and the need for Members of Parliament to make up their own minds, will he guarantee that when the Bill is again considered by the House—if the motion is passed—there will be no Government Whips operating?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman will be aware—he need have no hesitation or doubt about this—that in this matter the Whips will not be of signal importance. My hon. Friends who are not in favour of the Channel Tunnel Bill will vote against it, Whips or no Whips. The hon. Gentleman can take that assurance.

The next point raised by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North concerned the need for inland clearance depots linked to British Rail. I agree that at the moment there are rail-served inland clearance depots at Birmingham, Glasgow, Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester and Stratford, London. He is right. This is something to which we should pay close attention. I recently asked for further information about the best location for British Rail's linkage with various parts of the country. As the hon. Gentleman may know, Sheffield has been taking a special interest in the possibility of establishing a new inland clearance depot with that in mind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) sought to make a funeral oration over the Channel tunnel. Mark Twain's response seems particularly appropriate:

"The report of my death was an exaggeration."

My hon. Friend went on to assert that only £206 million had been raised out of £5,000 million required, and that this was only 4 per cent. of the money. My hon. Friend has got it wrong. The promoters are not seeking that amount of equity. The vast majority of that sum will be in the form of loans for which contact has already been made. Twenty five per cent of the equity has already been raised. It is remarkable that that amount has been raised before the Bill has gone through the House, before the legislation has gone through the French Parliament, before the treaty has been ratified and before the concession agreement has come into effect and subjected to an unparalleled campaign of substantial distortion by the opponents of the proposal. On that basis, it is remarkable that the equity raising has been so successful.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South said that the project had been saved, but asked for whose benefit. He went on to say that the winners would be the few investors in Eurotunnel who stand to make a fortune. My hon. Friend is apparently suffering from schizophrenia because a little later he went on to say that the project was a south sea bubble and that no profits would be made from it. His schizophrenia showed itself again when he talked about the French investing in the tunnel and it being a French tunnel. The last time we debated this issue my hon. Friend tried to persuade us that the French would withdraw their support. He now alleges that it is a profitable operation in which they wish to invest. He should be careful not to contradict himself too often.

My hon. Friend spoke of the garden of England going grey under concrete. In any case, whatever happens, the traffic going through the east Kent area—whether it is Channel tunnel or port—will double by the end of the century and we will have to provide massive additional road infrastructure for that purpose. That is where the largest part of the concrete to which my hon. Friend referred will be.

Because this is a rail link tunnel, British Rail expects that it will take no fewer than 1,000 38-tonne lorries a day off the Kent roads. The environmentalists and my hon. Friend, if he wishes to be unbiased in these matters, can take some satisfaction from that.

My hon. Friend referred to taxpayers' money for British Rail. I assure him that the money for BR in this project is wholly commercial. There will be no extension of the public service obligation and the taxpayers' contribution to BR in respect of financing its work for the Channel tunnel. About £390 million of expenditure is to be incurred at 1985 prices, which will provide a useful number of jobs, but it will be commercial money. It will not come from the taxpayer. The project will be fully viable in its own right.

My hon. Friend asked what gains there would be and said that there would not be gains in jobs. It is certain that not only will there be gains in jobs—about 10,000 a year on average over the next seven years during construction of the tunnel — but that once it is completed, as my hon. Friends the Members for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) and for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) said, exporters and industrialists in the far north will be able to get their goods delivered to the markets of Europe. Sixty per cent. of our exports go to Europe. We shall be able to get delivery of those goods to the markets within 24 hours with a reliability, speed and low cost which cannot apply today. In doing so, we will ensure that jobs will be more secure in the north of the country than they are now, with the present disadvantages.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Speed) drew attention to the opportunities for BR to exploit our geographical position. He was right. With his long experience of sea matters, he will be familiar with the development of the vast international container ships going one way around the world which seek one, and only one, stop in Europe. The map shows that one stop in the United Kingdom with a Channel tunnel will provide them with the best, most economic way of getting their containers into the European market.

The right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) asked me to confirm the correctness of my earlier assertion that, if the Bill is required to go through a further Session, there must be a further carry-forward motion. I can assure him on that score. What I said at the beginning was correct.

Mr. Silkin: That was not the assurance for which I asked. The assurance I requested was that, if the Bill becomes stuck in the next Session, it will not be carried forward into the Session after that. The hon. Gentleman did not deal with the point that I made about the Standing Order. On the contrary, he has now confirmed that, in the Government's view, it will run from Session to Session.

Mr. Mitchell: Let us be absolutely clear. Tonight we are ensuring that the Bill goes forward, later this month, to the new Session of Parliament. We are not ensuring that it would automatically be carried on the basis of the motion tonight into any future Session of Parliament, either because of a general election intervening, or because of the end of that Session of Parliament.

Mr. Silkin: Will the Minister make this absolutely clear? Can the Government give the assurance that if the Bill fails in the next Session that will be the end and it will have to start the process all over again? I want that assurance, because that was what the hon. Gentleman was trying to tell me—that there would be no carry forward from next Session to the Session after that.

Mr. Mitchell: Of course I am not going to give the right hon. Gentleman that assurance; nor would he expect me to do that. He knows perfectly well that the Bill has Government support. If, for any reason that I cannot imagine, it was still around at the end of the next Session, or if a general election were to intervene, of course I would expect to see the Bill brought up again and carried forward into the ensuing Session.

The right hon. Member for Deptford gave us a very interesting dissertation on Ramsay MacDonald and the 1931 precedent. He suggested that tonight was a major parliamentary event.

Mr. James Hamilton (Motherwell, North): Oh, come off it.

Mr. Mitchell: The right hon. Gentleman did suggest that this was a major parliamentary event. He drew attention to the fact that Ramsay MacDonald had moved a similar motion in respect of London Transport in 1931. It has now become common practice for hybrid Bills to be treated in this way, and that is acknowledged in "Erskine May".

The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that this was not the right thing to spend "our money on." I wrote those words down as he used them. It is not spending "our money." I wish that the right hon. Gentleman would recall that the project is completely privately financed. "Our money" is not being put into it, and that is one of the big advantages. The risks are being taken by the investors and not by the taxpayers.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Rees) raised a number of important points. He expressed anxiety over the uncertainty that his constituents face, especially in the way of blight. That is a very good reason why the House should see the project through and come to a decision in the ensuing Session of Parliament as quickly as possible. I can give my right hon. and learned Friend the assurances that he sought about competition, and I can add that the Government have agreed to bring forward a clause in Standing Committee that will prohibit the Government from providing funds or guarantees to Eurotunnel. I hope that that will remove some of my right hon. and learned Friend's anxieties.

My right hon. and learned Friend also raised the question of the A20 and stated how important the road is to his constituents. I know that it is important for relieving congestion, for reducing accidents and for providing relief for Capel le Ferne. However, my right hon. and learned Friend will know, and the House will want to know, that we must seek the views of the Select Committee. Like my right hon. and learned Friend, I shall be watching with great interest to see what the Select Committee has to say on that subject.

The hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) spoke about the sole use of Waterloo as an outlet for the Channel tunnel. I draw his attention to the fact that it is British Rail's intention to run services to Waterloo and through Olympia to the northern parts of the country. One would be able to get a train from Glasgow, Manchester or Birmingham and pass through Olympia. Waterloo will not have the sole concentration of traffic. Having said that, in answer to the worries that the hon. Gentleman expressed, I must tell him that the number of trains that enter Waterloo daily is legion. In the project we are talking about four trains an hour. We should have some sense of proportion about this, rather than assume that 500,000 people a day will pour through the place so that one would not be able to move for the resulting congestion.

Mr. Stuart Holland: The Minister is well aware that it is not just four trains an hour, but four trains of exceptional length, each equivalent to two trains. In addition, it is four trains in and out. Will he answer the traffic flow figures that have been given which suggest that they are equivalent to Gatwick? In reality, Lambeth—for example—has no elevation, no study of the plans for a terminal to absorb that sort of traffic.

Will the Minister also address the question of the social criteria and the impact on land use values? Unfortunately, the Minister's committee would not accept those criteria, and no one else seems to be considering them. That is one reason why the community groups withdrew from the committee.

Mr. Mitchell: I shall come to the hon. Gentleman's last point in a moment. He expressed some outrage that there was no evidence from British Rail before the committee. The committee had the power to require British Rail to give it whatever evidence it required. If it decided that it did not require further evidence, so be it.

In respect of the number of passengers, British Rail must plan its terminal not on annual figures but on peak flows, based on the number of trains arriving and leaving in any hour, and with the expectation that at certain points in the year those trains will be nearly full. That is what British Rail's consultants, Sir Alexander Gibb and Partners, have done. They have assumed four full trains inwards and four full trains outwards an hour, which is the most that the railway network between the tunnel and London can accommodate. That would provide 6,000 additional passengers in the hour moving through Waterloo. The consultants examined how they could be handled by the road system and the Underground, and concluded that there was adequate capacity on both. Indeed, with an altered road layout within the station, the road conditions on surrounding roads during peak periods in 2003 will be no worse than at present.

The hon. Gentleman raised a point about the joint consultation committee. That was an opportunity to expose, with the representatives of British Rail standing in front of the committee, all the figures, facts and information. I deeply regret that, for very narrow reasons, the representatives of the Lambeth area walked out of that meeting. Other councils were able to extract a great deal of useful information from British Rail.

It reflects ill on the hon. Gentleman that, having encouraged me to set up the committee, his local representatives should walk out and then complain later that they did not obtain the information that they wanted.

Mr. Stuart Holland: The Minister is well aware that they are not my local representatives—[Interruption.] No, no, no—the House should get this clear. We are not talking about Lambeth council and its representation; we are talking about local community groups. The local community group decided that as the question of the social impact of the Channel tunnel traffic would not be taken into account by the committee, and that it would be solely a matter of the traffic implications, they could not co-operate with the committee. These questions will not be answered at all. Gibbs has not answered them. There will be the equivalent of 16 trains an hour, with Gatwick-like traffic, going through a terminal building about the size of this Chamber. It is quite absurd.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman should know—and I am sorry that he does not—that the reason why Lambeth representatives walked out had nothing to do with the explanation that he has just given. It was because they wanted the meetings held in public so that they could turn it into a public meeting rather than one in which elected representatives could discuss issues—rather as the elected representatives in Kent discussed them and as a result secured a number of changes.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the question of a report in the New Civil Engineer and asked whether it was true that British Rail was planning secretly to build a new line to the east of Sevenoaks. He asked me to deny that. The hon. Gentleman might be interested in the anatomy of a rumour. Some months ago British Rail asked some younger members of staff to work out every single, conceivable option—there were 50 of them, and this was one. Forty-nine were rejected, and this is one that was rejected as not being a potential runner. How the magazine got hold of that one and picked it up rather than the other 49 I would not know, but it was on that basis that the article rested. The hon. Gentleman should recognise that there is no truth in the rumour and that there is no reason to place any reliance on it.

Mr. Stuart Holland: Is the Minister saying that the proposal will never be put to the Government and will never be accepted by them for such traffic, despite its major implications for the scheme?

Mr. Mitchell: I have just explained the antecedents of the rumour. As BR rejected it, and as I can handle only propositions that come to me from BR, no such proposition is on the table.

Mr. Robert Hughes: I asked two questions about Waterloo. Is the fact that the Select Committee decided not to hear BR the end of the matter? Will there be a private Bill for the terminal at Waterloo, or will there be a public inquiry?

Mr. Mitchell: I am sorry if I omitted to answer those questions. No, there will not be a further Bill. That matter is contained in this measure, and as the relevant schedules will come before the Standing Committee there will be further opportunity for debate then.

My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury courageously put a view which not all his constituents share. I have been in Canterbury three times in the last month and almost every one of the younger people I met in the city was wholly in favour of the scheme. History will judge my hon. Friend well for the stand that he is taking.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) raised a number of points. He said that the Select Committee should not be hurried. That is the purpose of this motion, which provides two options. One deals with the possibility of the Select Committee completing its work in time, while the other does not. The whole of the worry that the hon. Gentleman expressed has been fully catered for.

The hon. Gentleman asked why Waterloo and not Victoria? The platforms at Victoria are not long enough and the amount of property that would have to be demolished would be considerable. He then asked why not Blackfriars. The platforms there are not long enough and could not be made long enough. Why not London Bridge, he asked. The curve of the line there would not allow trains of this length to be handled properly. I have already answered his question about whether there will be more opportunity for debate. As I explained, the schedules will provide that opportunity.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West was also uneasy about the Waterloo situation. I have explained the opportunity that was given to the representatives of the people of Waterloo and Lambeth and how they walked out on that opportunity, so they can hardly grumble about a lack of such opportunity.

Hon. Members also drew attention to one of the most important factors arising out of the Channel tunnel, and that is its effect on BR and the opportunity for BR to be linked into the whole of the European rail network. I profoundly believe that the opportunities that that will provide for our exporters—in north Wales, Glasgow and the north of the country—to be able to compete on equal terms with others who have land frontiers with the major countries of Europe will prove in the long run to be one of the most lasting beneficial effects to flow from the Channel tunnel.

Whether hon. Members support or oppose the Channel tunnel, I believe that none of us would want to put all the petitioners to the trouble and expense of re-representing their views to a new Select Committee, so I hope that the whole House will approve the carry forward proposal. An expert on procedure told me that the subject of a carry-over motion of this sort on a private or hybrid Bill could be said to be twofold—to make petitioners less poor than they otherwise would be, and lawyers less rich than they otherwise would be. I commend it to the House.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Ordered,

That, when the Committee on the Channel Tunnel Bill reports the Bill to the House, further proceedings on the Bill shall be suspended until the next Session of Parliament.

Ordered,

That if a Bill is presented in the next Session in the same terms as those in which the Channel Tunnel Bill stood when proceedings thereon were suspended in this Session—

(a) the Bill shall be ordered to be printed and shall be deemed to have been read the first and second time;

(b) if the Committee has reported that it has gone through the Bill, the Bill shall be deemed to have been reported from a Select Committee;

(c) if the Committee has reported that it has not completed its consideration of the Bill—

(i) the Bill shall stand committed to a Select Committee of the same Members as the Members of the Committee in this Session;

(ii) all Petitions presented in this Session which stand referred to the Committee and which have not been withdrawn shall stand referred to the Committee in the next Session;

(iii) any minutes of evidence taken and any papers laid before the Committee in this Session which have been reported to the House shall stand referred to the Committee in the next Session;

(iv) the Instruction [17th July] shall be an Instruction to the Committee;

(v) only those Petitions mentioned in sub-paragraph (ii) above, and any Petition which may be presented by being deposited in the Private Bill Office and in which the Petitioners complain of any matter which has arisen during the progress of the Bill before the Committee in the next Session, shall stand referred to the Committee;

(vi) any Petitioner whose Petition stands referred to the Committee in the next Session shall, subject to the Rules and Orders of the House and to the Prayer of his Petition, be entitled to be heard by himself, his Counsel or Agents upon his Petition provided that it is prepared and signed in conformity with the Rules and Orders of the House, and the Member in charge of the Bill shall be entitled to be heard by his Counsel or Agents in favour of the Bill against that Petition;

(vii) the Committee shall have power to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the House, to adjourn from place to place within the United Kingdom, and to report from day to day the Minutes of Evidence taken before it;

(viii) three shall be the Quorum of the Committee;

(ix) any person registered in this Session as a parliamentary agent entitled to practice as such in opposing Bills only who, at the time when proceedings on the Bill were suspended in this Session, was employed in opposing the Bill shall be deemed to have been registered as such a parliamentary agent in the next Session;

(d) the Standing Orders and practice of the House applicable to the Bill, so far as complied with or (in the case of the Standing Orders relating to Private Business) dispensed with in this Session, shall be deemed to have been complied with or (as the case may be) dispensed with in the next Session; and

(e) if the Bill is reported, or is deemed by virtue of paragraph (b) above to have been reported, from a Select Committee in the next Session, it shall thereupon stand re-committed to a Standing Committee.

Ordered,

That this Order be a Standing Order of the House.

PETITIONS

Jarrow Crusade

11.50 pm

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I beg to ask leave to present a petition signed by more than 2,700 people from the Sheffield area protesting about the level of unemployment and its effect upon the young.

I pay tribute to the marchers who accompanied the Jarrow march from Sheffield to London to present this petition not just to me but to my hon. Friends the Members for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard), and for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery).

Since 1979 Sheffield has passed through a difficult period. We need the House to recognise the plight of our people in Sheffield. The petition states:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House does urge Her Majesty's Government that the necessary action be taken, and the necessary active assistance given to remedy the wrongs at present being inflicted on Sheffield.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I beg to ask leave to present a petition signed by 7,500 constituents who reside in the Barnsley metropolitan district, represented in the House by my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason), my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East (Mr. Patchett) and myself. It is for the convenience of the House that I present the petition.

The petition is the result of the Jarrow crusade 1986. We had the honour and privilege of being with the marchers during their short stay in Barnsley. It is a crusade of people — young and not so young — who have marched yet again, after the last Jarrow crusade, to bring to the attention of the nation the plight of the unemployed —more than 21 per cent. in the Barnsley metropolitan district. That represents more than 18,500 people, including hundreds of young people who have never seen real permanent employment. The area has 1,400 school leavers embarking upon a career of unemployment.

Based on the Government's regional assessment submitted to the European Community, the area will be one of continuous decline. That is the pattern if the Government continue in office.

Two of our young constituents joined the crusade at Barnsley and they helped to present the petition outside the House this morning. They were chosen as representatives of the members of the Barnsley Centre Against Unemployment. They are Tracey Devenport and Dean Kenyon. For over three years they have sought employment day in, day out. As they walked south they saw how unemployment became less pronounced and prosperity more evident.

They rightly ask why that is. Why is the nation so divided? What is the House doing about it and how long will it take to get rid of the problem? That is why the petitioners pray that your honourable House urges that necessary active assistance be given by the Government for the provision of work in the area of Barnsley metropolitan district.

This is a great credit to all who took part in the crusade.

[Mr. Allen McKay]

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.
To lie upon the Table.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that of the House, I beg leave to present a petition on behalf of 5,000 people in the Wakefield metropolitan district area, covering Wakefield, Hemsworth, Pontefract and Castleford, and Normanton. The 5,000 people have signed a petition asking the Government to take action to arrest the industrial dereliction in the area. The petition talks of seven years of dereliction and industrial depression which has never been paralleled in the history of the area. We ask that the Government take note of the petition.

Young people marched the full length of the country to bring to the Government's notice the need to generate employment in the north of England and throughout the country. We share their plea that the Government should allow employment to be developed in areas with extensive unemployment.

I present the petition on behalf of colleagues who represent the Wakefield metropolitan area.

I beg leave to present the petition.
To lie upon the Table.

11.57 pm

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I beg leave to present a petition on behalf of many thousands of my constituents.

I recall the 1936 Jarrow crusade as a seven-year-old child. Little did I know that 50 years later I would be presenting a petition about unemployment in the town in which I was born and bred.

The petition states:

for seven years Jarrow has endured industrial depression without parallel in the town's history.

We have lost many jobs. The whole of the shipbuilding industry on the south side of the Tyne has been obliterated by this Government's policies. Ten unemployed constituents, Ken Smith, Wayne Scott, Paul Loft, Lawrence Maloy, David Melia, Billy Orr, John Badger, Harry Thorn, Paul Thomas and Stephen Byrne, carried the petition in the original box which held the petition in 1936.

I beg leave to present the petition.
To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will know that to have petitions read at this time of the day the House officials are notified. Other similar petitions will follow. Perhaps you will draw to the notice of those responsible that the Paymaster General, the Minister responsible for unemployment, has not had the decency to turn up for the presentation of the petitions. He was prepared to turn up earlier today when we were discussing availability for work. The Paymaster General himself is not available for work. He is treating the people who have walked 300 miles with nothing less then contempt.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The shadow spokesman for employment is not here either.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Whether Ministers are present or not is not a matter for the Chair.

Housing (Basildon)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

11.59 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): Ironically, the very success of Basildon in promoting itself as an attractive new town has largely contributed to the present pressures on our housing stock. Basildon has everything going for it at the moment — good community facilities, excellent communications, particularly now with the completion of the final part of the M25, increasing job opportunities, reducing unemployment, the largest covered shopping centre in Europe—and all that set in the heart of the beautiful Essex countryside.

Our slogan is "Basildon means business" and that we certainly do. On Monday 8 December for one week there will be an exhibition in the Palace of Westminster entitled "Basildon—a town of opportunity". It will be Basildon week in the House of Commons and the Commission for the New Towns will be promoting the event in order to stimulate even further interest in our town. So the commitment to permanently securing Basildon's position as the finest new town in the country is as strong as ever. [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] Nevertheless, if that is to be achieved, it is essential that housing policy in Basildon is directed in such a way as to meet people's evolving needs.

Most hon. Members, however long they have served in the House, would agree that the number one problem that appears time after time in their postbags is that of housing. [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] It is often said that an Englishman's home is his castle. If that is so, experience has shown me that everyone wants to live in as pleasant a castle as possible.

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My parliamentary colleagues keep shouting out "Reading, reading" and I am unable to listen to the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) giving us the good information that he tries to do. Is it possible for you to bring order to the place?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for protecting the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess).

Mr. Amess: The purpose for which new towns were established is well known and in Basildon's case it was largely for the purpose of easing housing pressures from the east end of London—the area from which I hail. In that objective there can be no question but that the Commission for the New Towns has certainly been successful. I only regret that some of the London boroughs, having been given that opportunity, continue to pursue misguided housing policies which only seem to make matters worse and people's lives miserable.

I doubt whether there is any town in the country where the Government's housing policies have been so successful as in Basildon. The right-to-buy legislation has transformed our town. I can tell my hon. Friend the Minister how much my constituents welcome the latest legislation which we discussed only last night which increases still further the discount on the sale of council and commission properties and the reduction in the period before one can resell a property thus purchased. Record sales of council and corporation property have been achieved in Basildon. All that in spite of intense opposition to our right-to-buy legislation from the three Socialist parties — Labour, Social Democrat and Liberal. I still find it extraordinary that Socialist councillors can purchase their council or corporation property while supporting parties which do not approve of such an opportunity for the general public. Such behaviour is hypocritical.

While on the question of the right to buy, I want to make my first specific point to the Minister. It seems unfair to me that constituents who desperately wish to purchase their property are being denied that opportunity because their homes are regarded as unfit for a mortgage, particularly due to the problem of clay heave in Basildon following the drought that we experienced some years ago which has meant that a number of properties still require underpinning. There seems to be a great reluctance among the financial institutions to grant mortgages on such properties and my constituents are being deprived of their right to buy.

Let me also say at this point how greatly my constituents look forward to the Government's recently announced initiative on the right to rent. There is no properly established rented sector in Basildon and encouragement in that area is welcomed by my constituents. In the 1960s a number of high-speed system-built properties were developed in Basildon. About 1,000 such properties were built in the Vange area of the town. Roughly half of these are now owner-occupied and the other half are still rented. Over the past two or three years, structural problems have arisen and the houses are now known widely as suffering from concrete cancer. I understand that the builder who was responsible for using faulty components is now bankrupt.

People who originally purchased those properties from the corporation or the council have found it impossible to sell them. A blight has been put on them by the financial institutions and the Vange housing action group has been formed under the leadership of Mr. Williamson. I pay tribute to the group for its efforts in getting the matter resolved. The Under-Secretary has not only seen the properties, but has seen a deputation at the Department.

I understand that the Housing Defects Act 1984 does not cover these properties. I fully appreciate the compexities of this matter, but I have to tell the Minister that the patience of my constituents seems to be wearing a little thin. The circumstances of the people concerned are different, but all of them are clamouring for action and they are looking to me in particular to provide it. They want to know what arrangements are being made for examining each property to ascertain what, if anything, is wrong with it. If there are faults, the tenants want to know whether the property will be repaired or bought back and at what price. They have also said that if a dwelling is given a clean bill of health it is essential that some direction be given to the financial institutions and estate agents to lift the blight that hangs over the properties.

We all realise that, strictly speaking, the responsibility lies with the purchaser and the surveyor, if an independent structural survey were carried out. However, I have made it clear that the Government, who rightly introduced legislation enabling stock to be purchased, accept responsibility in this matter. I ask for a clear and precise statement about the future of these properties, and an assurance that individual counselling be given after that announcement has been made.

Another worry about housing in Basildon is the speculation, much of it mischievous, about the disposal of the 16,000 properties presently under the management of the commission. Despite the fact that before its demise the development corporation made it clear that for the immediate future there would be no change for tenants, the management was passed to the new town commission. The then Socialist council, without direction, decided at great expense to the ratepayers to embark on a so-called consultation exercise with the commission tenants. This is quite disgraceful, but what can one expect from a body that is now involved in a consultation process about local education, a service provided exclusively by Essex county council? Of course, it all has to do with political posturing and an attempt to cause divisions where none should exist.

It is intolerable that rumours have been spread causing alarm, especially to the elderly, suggesting that if a body other than the council takes over the houses, repairs and the like will not be carried out. At present, a high proportion of the housing stock is in public ownership. As the future ownership of the 16,000 dwellings is considered, our prime responsibility will surely be to determine who is best able to manage those properties and who would have the necessary financial support to bring them up to the high standard that we hope they will reach.

I now come to the final matter that I wish to bring to the Minister's attention — the problem of housing single people in Basildon. I want to take the opportunity of this debate to launch a campaign for a building programme to house them. They are the forgotten many.

Just about every conceivable building design has been tried in Basildon and I shudder when I hear that some of the designers are receiving awards for estates which have since suffered appalling problems. In two such developments — Langdon hills and Felmore — action groups have been formed to try to sort out the district heating systems.

Sheltered housing in Basildon, however, enjoys an extremely high reputation throughout the country. It has even been used as an advertisement in a party political broadcast. There is constant demand from the elderly to be given the opportunity to live in Basildon. I pay tribute to all the assistance that Essex county council, the Commission for the New Towns and the Government give the elderly in Basildon, and deservedly so, and the tremendous assistance that is received from voluntary organisations.

Unfortunately, I have a never-ending stream of young people coming to my surgeries who desperately need accommodation either to rent or purchase. These are second or third generation Basildonians. Their parents came originally to the town on the understanding that their children would be housed, but, alas, the demand has not been met. There is constant frustration locally about the points system, which has been changed with the result that applicants feel that the goalposts are continually being shifted.

Some of my constituents have commented that if they become pregnant and have a baby they will be housed. What a spirit in which to take on the responsibility of bringing a child into the world. I have a high proportion of single-parent families in Basildon, who desperately need support and proper accommodation. I have always maintained that I do not want any more of our local countryside lost to building programmes, but there are clearly certain areas still where specific building programmes could be undertaken for single people. I am sure that my constituents would welcome an extension of the highly successful shared ownership scheme and the provision of flats and bed-sits.

Another possibility that could be explored is the provision of the university complex type of accommodation at reasonable rents, or community studio apartments. There is a need also for a sophisticated version of YMCA-type accommodation for young people who face tension and difficulties at home and yet are not quite ready for the responsibility of independent accommodation. There are no tower blocks such as those in London which could be decanted and used for accommodation for single people, even if the equation were as simple as that. There are no doubt parts of estates, however, that could be usefully reserved for those with special housing needs. The possibilities are endless and all avenues should be explored in an effort to improve matters.

I started by extolling the virtues of Basildon as a new town and a place of opportunity. Young people are its lifeblood. We owe it to them, while recalling the visit of Lord Stockton to the town in the early 1950s, to provide a base from which they can flourish.

12.12 am

The Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction (Mr. John Patten): Lord, Stockton's successor by many removes, who is standing at the Dispatch Box, visited Basildon, in the company of his hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess), not so long ago, and saw the realisation of the dream of his noble Friend. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the issue of housing in Basildon and for giving me the opportunity to put on record what the Government are doing to try to help Basildon.

I must congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon on his exemplary and persistent performance in putting across to the Government the concerns and views of his constituents. I went to Basildon with him, as I have said, to hear some of them at first hand. My hon. Friend is an advocate for Basildon and its people, and they should realise that.

This evening my hon. Friend has concentrated on housing issues that affect his new town. As he said, it is ironic that a new town which was set up in response to housing problems should now be having problems of its own. My hon. Friend has raised four main groups of problems, the last one being the need for better provision for single people in the town. I hope that time will allow me to deal with that issue. If not, I should like to write immediately after the debate to let him know what we are doing on shared ownership and in a number of other directions which may be of help.

I shall concentrate on the activities of Basildon council under Socialist control, what can be done to help those suffering from clay heave and what I have decided to do to help in the Vange area. What Basildon did when it was under Socialist control to try to put the frighteners on its tenants was a scandalous misuse of public money and a politically immoral act of a particularly savage kind. It tried to put across inaccurate information to frighten tenants, some of them elderly, about their future. There is no basis for what was done. The Government and people of most political views deplore such actions.

Yesterday, during the almost closing stages of the Housing and Planning Bill, Labour Members said that it is important not to tell lies about Government policy. I congratulate those on the Opposition Benches who said that. I only wish that the message had filtered through to those on Basildon council who have done so much damage not just to their standards as councillors, but to those living in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Some people living there find that their houses suffer from considerable problems of ground movement and clay heave. My hon. Friend has mentioned dwellings that have suffered ground movement. I understand that that in itself should not prevent subsequent mortgageability. There is no particular reason why it should do so, provided that reasonable remedial action has been taken. The development corporation devised a thorough system of underpinning, and I understand that houses repaired in this way have subsequently been sold to tenants, with finance coming from building societies.

My hon. Friend and I both strongly support the right to buy. If my hon. Friend has specific, named cases of building societies that will not accept otherwise traditional houses that have been underpinned by the new town corporation, perhaps he will write to me giving me chapter and verse, so that I can have the matter looked into further. We have evidence that houses properly underpinned under the scheme have been sold satisfactorily.

I know that the welfare of people in the Vange area has greatly concerned my hon. Friend since the matter came to light two years ago. I must go into this in some detail, and it is the kind of detail that Mr. Williamson and his friends on the action group, whose work I admire, will want to look at carefully in Hansard. Subject to certain conditions, the Commission for the New Towns should be authorised to offer to buy owner-occupied HSSB houses and flats at 95 per cent. of what their value would be in the absence of faults or potential faults associated with the use of the HSSB system in Basildon.

The percentage has been adopted by analogy with the provisions of part XVI of the Housing Act 1985, formerly the Housing Defects Act 1984, although the dwellings are not being designated under that Act. It is important to get these details down. The offer will be open only to owner-occupiers who bought their HSSB dwellings before the date of this announcement today. The commission will be authorised to buy only in cases where an owner-occupier will on completion offer vacant possession to the commission. Ample notice would be given to remaining eligible owner-occupiers of any closing date for the scheme, and in practice I expect it to operate for several years.

The faults, or potential faults, associated directly with the HSSB system which will be disregarded for the purposes of arriving at prices to be offered by the commission to owner-occupiers are, first, any defects in the structural connections between the concrete components and, secondly, actual or potential corrosion of steel reinforcement in structural concrete components. In all other respects valuation will reflect the actual condition of the dwelling.

The HSSB dwellings, both owner-occupied and tenanted, are, I am told, mostly very satisfactory and pleasant homes. The main problem for owner-occupiers arises from the general reluctance of building societies and others to lend on these dwellings, in view of the possible risk of defects developing later in the concrete components as a result of building methods that were employed at that time. The commission is carrying out investigations to see whether precautionary measures may be advisable to reduce any risk of structural problems arising in the shorter term. The commission will indeed inform the HSSB residents in due course about any such measures. Owners who sell to the commission will remain subject to the normal rules on repayment of discount.

I do not want to burden the House with too much detail, but it is important to put a few further facts before my hon. Friend and the House. Discount will be repayable if an owner purchased at a discount and if, at the date of sale to the commission, a period of less than five years — or three years, once the relevant provisions in the Housing and Planning Bill have taken effect — has elapsed since that earlier transaction. An owner's reasonable costs for conveyance of the property to the commission, incurred after the commission has notified the owner of the particular proposed terms for purchase of his home, will be met by the commission. I hope that my hon. Friend welcomes that provision.

To spread the cost and to alleviate practical problems, the commission may have to arrange applications from owners wishing to sell to it in order of priority. Clearly it cannot all be done at once. Priority will be decided on personal circumstances — for example, medical or social difficulties, or the need to move for reasons of employment elsewhere in the country or abroad. I must stress that each purchase by the commission will, of course, reflect the prevailing conditions in the housing market at the time that the transaction takes place.

Those who are now tenants of HSSB houses and flats in Basildon and who have the right to buy under the Housing Act 1985 will retain that right. Any future purchases of HSSB dwellings from the commission or any other owner will, however, be at the purchaser's own risk. It is very important that my hon. Friend's constituents understand that after the date of my announcement any future purchases of HSSB dwellings from the commission or any other owner will be entirely at the purchaser's own risk. Such purchasers must be aware that they may be unable to sell their homes at a future date and that they will not be eligible for repurchase of their homes by the commission.

I hope that on reflection my hon. Friend will feel that he is able to welcome the announcement that I have made in considerable detail, for which I apologise both to him and to the House. However, I know that if I had not made the announcement in considerable detail, my hon. Friend would have been inundated with requests for details from his constituents. I am sure that Mr. Williamson and others will welcome this news. If anything that I have said is not clear on the record, my hon. Friend knows that he has only to write to me for elucidation.

In the three or four minutes of this Adjournment debate that remain, I turn to the fourth and last point that my hon. Friend raised — the problems encountered by young home seekers in Basildon and the relationship of these people to our right-to-buy, but, more importantly, to our right-to-rent policies. Their problems are typical of those faced by their contemporaries elsewhere, particularly in the south of England. The Government's response must be to try to create a favourable climate for the forms of private investment which will be the best solution to those problems. The need to find permanent owners for the new town housing in Basildon may itself help to create a favourable climate for new housing initiatives in the town.

That is a broad-brush generalisation, but it will probably turn out to be true. If, for example, housing transfer leads to a widening of the present narrow housing association base in that part of the country, there might be reason for optimism about Basildon's ability to draw in private investment to tackle today's housing problems and tomorrow's housing expectations.

The armoury of new weapons that the Government are giving themselves to try to help is considerable. We need to encourage City institutions and building societies to provide housing for rent. The Building Societies Act 1986 and the Housing and Planning Bill certainly enable us to make significant moves in that direction.

Shared ownership will be of great importance. The shared tenancies that we are developing, again in co-operation with the private sector, will be important in widening the basis of rented and part-rented, part-owned homes in Basildon and elsewhere. Last week, I announced that I was pursuing an initiative of particular relevance to young people who move away to take up jobs. This is the flat share scheme which we are discussing with building societies and housing associations. Under this scheme, young people will get newly-built or well-converted flats that are especially designed for sharers at affordable rents. I hope that by referring to these three or four schemes my hon. Friend will see that we are developing as fast as we can, in a totally new look at the overall rented sector, ways of helping people who are faced with the sorts of problems he so clearly discussed.

There is hope for the future in the rented sector and the part-owned, part-rented sector and there is help at present for those people who live in the Vange area who have battled so hard for the scheme. I am pleased to take the opportunity presented by my hon. Friend's admirable speech to announce this scheme.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-six minutes past Twelve o'clock.

and (2) in the Standing Committees under the following heads:

1	2	3	4	5
Date when Closure claimed, and by whom	Question before Committee when claimed	Whether assent given to Motion or withheld by the Chair	Assent withheld because, in the opinion of the Chair, a decision would shortly be arrived at without that Motion	Result of Motion and, if a Division, Numbers for and against

[The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Return ordered,

of Instruments considered in Session 1985-86 by the Joint Committee and the Select Committee on Statutory Instruments respectively pursuant to their orders of reference, showing in each case the numbers of Instruments subject to the different forms of parliamentary procedure and of those within the Committees' orders of reference for which no parliamentary procedure is prescribed by statute, and the numbers drawn to the special attention of the House or of both Houses distinguishing the ground in the Committees' orders of reference upon which such attention was invited; and of the numbers of Instruments considered by a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. and by the House respectively, in Session 1985-86, showing the number where the question on the proceedings relating thereto was put forthwith under Standing Order No. 79(5).—[The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

PRIVATE BILLS AND PRIVATE BUSINESS of the number of Private Bills, Hybrid Bills and Bills for confirming Provisional Orders introduced into this House and brought from the House of Lords, and of Acts passed in Session 1985-86;

Return ordered,

Of all Private Bills, Hybrid Bills and Bills for confirming Provisional Orders which in Session 1985-86 were reported on by Committees on Opposed Bills or by Committees nominated partly by the House and partly by the Committee of Selection, together with the names of the selected Members who served on each Committee; the first and also the last day of the sitting of each Committee; the number of days on which each Committee sat; the number of days on which each selected Member served; the number of days occupied by each Bill in Committee; the Bills of which the Preambles were reported to have been proved; the Bills of which the Preamble were reported to have been not proved; and, in the case of Bills for confirming Provisional Orders, whether the Provisional Order ought or ought not to be confirmed;

Of all Private Bills and Bills for confirming Provisional Orders which in Session 1985-86 were referred by the Committee of Selection to the Committee on Unopposed Bills, together with the names of the Members who served on the Committee; the number of days on which the Committee sat; and the number of days on which each Member attended;

And of the number of Private Bills, Hybrid Bills and Bills for confirming Provisional Orders withdrawn or not proceeded with by the parties, those Bills being specified which were referred to Committees and dropped during the sittings of the Committee.—[The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

PUBLIC BILLS

Return ordered,

of the number of Public Bills distinguishing Government from other Bills, introduced into this House, or brought from the House of Lords, during Session 1985-86 showing:

(1) the number which received the Royal Assent, and

(2) the number which did not receive the Royal Assent, indicating those which were introduced into but not passed by this House, those passed by this House but not by the House of Lords, those passed by the House of Lords but not by this House, those passed by both Houses but Amendments not agreed to; and distinguishing the stages at which such Bills were dropped, postponed or rejected in either House of Parliament, or the stages which such Bills had reached by the time of Prorogation. [The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

SELECT COMMITTEES

Return ordered,

for Session 1985-86, of statistics relating to the membership, work, costs and staff of Select Committees with so much of the same information as is relevant to the Chairmen's Panel and the Court of Referees. [The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE

Return ordered,

of the days on which the House sat in Session 1985-86 stating for each day the day of the month and day of the week, the hour of the meeting, and the hour of the adjournment; and the total number of hours occupied in the sittings of the House, and the average time; and showing the number of hours on which the House sat each day, and the number of hours after the time appointed for the interruption of business. [The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

STANDING COMMITTEES

Return ordered,

of (1) the total number and the names of all Members (including and distinguishing Chairmen) who have been appointed to serve on one or more of the Standing Committees showing, with regard to each of such Members, the number of sittings to which he was summoned and at which he was present; (2) the number of Bills, Estimates, Matters and other items referred to Standing Committees pursuant to Standing Order No. 79 (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.) or Standing Order No. 80 (Standing Committees on European Community documents) considered by all and by each of the Standing Committees, the number of sittings of each Committee and the titles of all Bills, Estimates, Matters and other items as above considered by a Committee, distinguishing where a Bill was a Government Bill or was brought from the House of Lords, and showing in the case of each Bill, Estimate, Matter and other item, the particular Committee by whom it was considered, the number of sittings at which it was considered and the number of Members present at each of those sittings. [The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

SPECIAL PROCEDURE ORDERS

of Special Procedure Orders presented in Session 1985-86; the number withdrawn; the number annulled; the number against which Petitions or copies of Petitions were deposited; the number of Petitions of General Objection and for Amendment respectively considered by the Chairmen; the number of such Petitions certified by the Chairmen as proper to be received, and the number certified by them as being Petitions of General Objection and for Amendment respectively; the number referred to a Joint Committee of both Houses; the number reported with Amendments by a Joint Committee, and the number in relation to which a Joint Committee reported that the Order be not approved and be amended respectively; and the number of Bills introduced for the confirmation of Special Procedure Orders:

Of Special Procedure Orders which, in Session 1985-86, were referred to a Joint Committee, together with the names of the Commons Members who served on each Committee; the number of days on which each Committee sat; and the number of days on which each such Member attended. [The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Competition Policy (Monopolies and Mergers Commission)

1. Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met the chairman of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission to discuss competition policy.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): My last meeting with the chairman of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission took place on 15 April 1986.

Mr. Pavitt: When the Secretary of State next meets the chairman of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, will he discuss in depth the human tragedies which are occurring as a result of rationalisation of takeover bids which lead to unemployment and family tragedy? In particular, will he look at the present takeover bid for Ault and Wyborg in the London borough of Brent, which is a good borough, and the loss of jobs that will occur if the takeover bid continues? Is it not time to stop raising the golden calf and the idol of glory for profit and look at people instead?

Mr. Channon: I shall refrain today from commenting about the London borough of Brent. The Office of Fair Trading is making preliminary inquiries into the possible takeover referred to by the hon. Gentleman. If it qualifies on assets or market share under the Fair Trading Act 1973, the Director General of Fair Trading will advise me in the normal way on the question of a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Grylls: Is my right hon. Friend aware that many people will be greatly encouraged by the setting up of the Leisener committee to look into competition policy? Does he agree that the Government's determination to see the growth of small and medium sized businesses, which has already had considerable success throughout the country, means that competition policy should be shaped to protect smaller firms from restrictive practices and excessive merger mania?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend has already given evidence to the committee and I shall certainly consider with great care the submissions that he and his colleagues have made about these issues, which I believe have much support in the House.

Mr. Ashdown: Within the context of competition policy, will the Minister explain how competition in the British economy is increased or improved by converting British Gas and British Telecom from public monopolies into private ones?

Mr. Channon: The whole House is well aware of the great success of the British Telecom flotation, and I am sure that the same will happen with British Gas.

Mr. Cash: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that detailed negotiations are taking place within the European Community on competition policy and that it would be highly desirable if more persons were qualified in matters relating to competition law? Does he agree that the Law Society and the Bar Council should take these matters seriously, because, on the whole, people are at present singularly ill qualified to advise on matters of that kind.

Mr. Channon: That is an important and interesting point. I agree with a great deal of what my hon. Friend has said. There is considerable interest in the commission about the whole area of competition policy and that, of course, will be considered in the review.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the Secretary of State accept that my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) has raised an important matter? There are great injustices in this area. Will he, at the Dispatch Box today, condemn predatory acquisition by companies of other companies only for the purpose of closure? Is he aware that in the case of the Scottish and Newcastle attempt to take over Matthew Brown last year the only intention was to close the brewery in Workington? That is happening in other areas of the economy and it is for Secretaries of State to condemn that practice from the Dispatch Box. Scottish and Newcastle may well come back with a further bid in the next two months.

Mr. Channon: It would be quite wrong of me to make any comment on cases that might come before me when I have to decide whether to refer the matter to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. It is essential in such cases that I preserve my right to act on my own discretion in deciding whether to refer matters to the MMC.

Mr. Dorrell: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, increasingly, competition policy should be operated on a Europe-wide rather than a purely national basis? Is it not crazy for us to be talking on the one hand about completing the internal market while on the other hand we are continuing and often even reinforcing the fragmentation of the European market?

Mr. Channon: The European aspects are always taken into account in deciding whether to refer a proposed takeover to the MMC. I have some doubts about the proposition advanced by my hon. Friend that it would be preferable for those matters to be decided by bodies other than the British Government.

Power Plant Industry

2. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what support he is giving to the British power plant industry; and if he will make a statement on the industry's domestic work load.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Giles Shaw): My Department is providing substantial support in a number of ways: through financial assistance under the Industry Acts, through our support for innovation scheme, and through assistance on exports. The domestic work load is largely dependent on the ordering programme of the electricity boards, which is a matter for the boards themselves.

Mr. Brown: As the Minister says, I accept that the domestic ordering programme is a matter for his right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Energy. Nevertheless, the Department of Trade and Industry is the British power plant industry's sponsoring Department. Can the hon. Gentleman tell the House why the Government have failed to provide a sufficient domestic ordering programme to provide a base load for the domestc industry so that we can compete on equal terms with foreign companies, in foreign markets, and so that the British industry can survive?

Mr. Shaw: I respect the hon. Gentleman's connection with the power plant industry because it is a major producer in his constituency, but he will know that the domestic ordering of the power industry is not within the control of the Department of Trade and Industry. He will know equally that it might help to see the Opposition applying a power policy indicating that nuclear power is to play an increasing role in power ordering. With regard to the Government's investment in assistance to the power plant industry, the hon. Gentleman should know that some £55 million has been invested under the Industry Acts since 1980, and some £164 million on aid and trade proposals, which have led to export orders worth £770 million, which is a very substantial amount.

Mr. Ron Brown: Recognising that many companies, including NEI Peebles in my constituency, have been artificially starved of orders, largely because of the attitude of the Central Electricity Generating Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board, will the Minister use his muscle and influence to encourage the bureaucrats to place orders of that type, whether it is coal fired or turbo? That is important. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that scrap and build is an important argument put forward by the trade union movement, because many power stations have antiquated equipment and it is about time that it was replaced?

Mr. Shaw: I cannot follow the hon. Gentleman's advice and put forward a scrap and build programme. He will know that the CEGB is considering the case for new coal-fired stations, but equally he will know that no decision will be made on that until the Sizewell issue has been determined.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend agree that thousands of jobs are tied up in the nuclear power industry and that there has not been an order for a nuclear power plant for more than eight years? That uncertainty has to be resolved shortly if those thousands of jobs are to be protected for the future.

Mr. Shaw: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's point. He will be aware that the results of the Sizewell inquiry are awaited shortly by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Mr. Williams: The Minister rightly referred to the export performance of the industry. I am sure he will agree that the industry cannot survive on domestic sales alone. He also referred to the support that the Government have given the industry. What does he have to say about the complaint of the industry that in the export markets the financial package is now the crucial factor in determining whether we win or lose an order, and that in that respect the Government are crippling the industry by their abnormally high interest policy?

Mr. Shaw: The right hon. Gentleman is not being wholly fair about that. I took the opportunity to meet the chairman and deputy chairman of NEI recently because I was aware of their restructuring operation. Their presentation showed that the support being offered to help win export orders is quite considerable. I accept that any industrial operator, particularly a heavy plant operator, would want there to be a reduction rather than an increase in interest rates.

Balance of Trade

3. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will state the current balance of trade.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Alan Clark): In the year ending September there was a surplus of £403 million on the current account.

Mr. Wallace: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply, but does he agree that in the third quarter of this year there was a deficit of £1·2 billion? When he looks to making up that deficit, what proportion of it does he envisage will come from increasing exports of manufactured goods and what proportion from increased exports of services? There is great fear on this side of the House that the Government are being complacent while the country's manufacturing base is being eroded.

Mr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman's figures are somewhat misleading, because we are broadly in balance for the whole of this year, although I recognise that one month in the third quarter was especially depressing. Our manufacturing productivity has increased by 32 per cent. since 1980, and in the last quarter our export of manufactures was at its highest level. I believe that that trend is on the increase.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Does my hon. Friend agree that our trade balances will not be improved by excessive pay increases which are not linked at all to productivity and thus raise unit labour costs, making us much less competitive in world markets?

Mr. Clark: Unit labour costs are certainly a constituent in the competitiveness of British goods and services, and it is on competitiveness that success will depend. I know that Opposition Members have an insatiable appetite for bad news, but the news remains extremely good on the balance of payments front.

Mr. James Lamond: In the midst of all this so-called good news, can the Minister explain why, if we have a surplus on our balance of trade, the pound seems to be slipping all the time against almost every other currency in Europe?

Mr. Clark: The sterling-dollar rate has remained effectively the same for the past six months. The alteration in the rate against our competitors' currencies in Europe will doubtless be widely welcomed by British industry, which will no doubt endorse the hon. Gentleman's statement.

Sir Paul Bryan: Would my hon. Friend care to speculate on the long-term effect on the balance of trade if the Labour party's proposal for the control of foreign investment were put into force?

Mr. Clark: The somewhat homespun remedies peddled by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and his friends would unquestionably have a very serious impact on confidence in the City and on the total of our trade in invisibles, which amounted to nearly £8 billion this year.

Mr. Skinner: Is not the truth of the matter that during the past seven years the manufacturing deficit incurred as a result of the Government's policies has reached more than £4 billion, whereas there was a surplus of a similar amount on 1979? Does the Minister agree that that resulted in the Government having to go to the international monetary markets to borrow $4 billion on 3 September — the highest amount ever borrowed by a British Government since the end of the second world war? Did that not result in the Chancellor of the Exchequer having to prop up the pound at the Tory party conference, using £1 billion that ought to have been used to prop up British industry and get Britain back to work?

Mr. Clark: The hon. Member's trip down memory lane, which was an almost daily occurrence under the Labour Government, betrays his ignorance, which is honourably based on a contempt for these international organisations. The decline in manufacturing trade is based on consumer preference for foreign goods. Until British manufactures are wholly competitive, that preference will continue to be expressed.

Mr. Watts: Does my hon. Friend agree that both the level of imports and the buoyancy of retail trade indicate that there is no lack of demand in the economy, contrary to the view expressed by all the Opposition parties, and that there are considerable market opportunities waiting for British companies to exploit them?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Consumer spending is going up very fast, and that very increase is sucking in imports and giving rise to the imbalance to which attention has been drawn. Until British goods are competitive in all sectors and all aspects, a rise in consumer spending is likely to have this effect.

Mr. Speaker: I call Mr. Robin Cook.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Robin Cook: I am grateful to my hon. Friends. As I am a newcomer to these exchanges, can the Minister guide me as to any other country in the world which has managed to combine an oil surplus with a deficit on its visible trade? Did his office provide the Budget forecast of a £3 billion surplus on current account by the end of this year? Can he name another Budget forecast, even of this Government, which has gone quite so wildly wrong as that?

Mr. Clark: First, I must express my commiserations to the hon. Gentleman for the personal electoral reverse that he suffered. I recognise that that may cast a pall of gloom on some of the judgments that he offers at present. The forecast that he cited is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Minister accept that his complacency in relation to the balance of payments is quite staggering? Does he accept that the forecast, not least of his own Treasury, for the balance of payments deficit in the forthcoming year is somewhere between £2 billion and £3 billion? Does he accept that that is because of the uncompetitiveness of British industry, which has been damaged by Government policy over the past seven years.

and what do the Government intend to do about unit labour costs, oil prices and the exchange rate in order to reverse that?

Mr. Clark: In fact the bad figures arose at a time when in the last two quarters the oil price had been averaging between $12 and $13 per barrel. If OPEC raises the oil price to $18 per barrel, the overall effect on our oil exports will be an increase of nearly 50 per cent. in value. Therefore, that particular ingredient is likely to be corrected in the next year if the OPEC objectives are achieved.

Lack of competitiveness is certainly a serious drawback, as I have said on a number of occasions already, but productivity in manufacturing industry is more than 32 per cent. up since the advent of this Government.

Mr. Speaker: Question No. 4. I call Mr. Robert Atkins [Interruption.] Order. We are making very slow progress and have only reached question No. 4.

Mr. Nellist: That is because a lot of hon. Members asked questions on the last subject. They were waiting for the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins), who has only just come into the Chamber.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Patience is a great virtue in this place.

Copyright Reform

4. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from the automotive industry about his proposals for the reform of the copyright laws.

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): I have received a large number of representations from the automotive industry about the unregistered design right proposed in the intellectual property White Paper.

Mr. Atkins: Is my hon. Friend aware that there is some concern and not inconsiderable anger in the automotive support industry, represented by large and small companies in my constituency, at the proposals in the White Paper? Will he recognise that their fears are based on two counts, because they believe, first, that the proposals will affect competition and the quality of the products that they can provide to the industry and the public, and, secondly, that this will have a deleterious effect on jobs in those small and large companies throughout the length and breadth of the country?

Mr. Pattie: I am aware of the points that my hon. Friend has raised. He will not be surprised to hear that they are being taken into consideration.

Mr. O'Brien: Will the Minister assure the House that serious consideration will be given to the points that have been raised, as there is a general feeling in the industry that the manufacture of component parts for the vehicle industry will lead to further redundancies, factory closures and general unemployment? There is a factory in my constituency which manufactures hydraulics and everybody there—from management to shop floor workers—is worried stiff about the future. Does the Minister intend to withdraw the proposals contained in Cmnd. 9712, allow the industry to prosper and thus remove the fear hanging over it?

Mr. Pattie: I think that the industry will be reassured when we are able to come forward with a suitable compromise proposal, which we are at present discussing with it and which I think will meet most of the objections that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: Is my hon. Friend aware that his comment that the industry will be reassured when he comes forward with proposals will reassure many British manufacturers? Does he recognise that a substantial amount of risk is involved in new investment in new products and that that risk must be rewarded by some form of protection? Does he also recognise that there is limited scope for relaxing his proposals when standard proprietary items are incorporated in an original design?

Mr. Pattie: I agree with my hon. Friend. However, I am sure that both he and the House will not wish me to detain the House on these complicated issues at this stage, other than to say that all these matters are being very carefully considered.

Mr. Loyden: Industry in many cases is very concerned about the implications of the White Paper. Does the Minister not agree that the first thing that should have been done was to indentify the implications of the questions that cause uncertainty in the industry, before the White Paper was produced?

Mr. Pattie: Yes, that is a perfectly fair point. However, we were addressing the fact that it is also important to recognise that a certain degree of copyright protection is needed for original designs. The problem is to balance the respective interests in the motor industry. That is very important.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Is my hon. Friend aware that the only important point for the retail customer is to know what he is buying? The customer should then have freedom to buy what he wants. My hon. Friend must guard against manufacturers who will not supply spare parts, but only replacement units at hideous cost, which is taking the consumer for a ride.

Mr. Pattie: I am obviously aware of the consumer arguments. We must also recognise, however, that there is a perfectly legitimate case to be made on behalf of those who devise the original spare part, component, or whatever it may be, because they have rights, too.

Mr. Ashdown: Nevertheless, these were Government proposals. Will the Minister explain to the House why the Government believe that their proposals will increase freedom of choice and competition in British industry?

Mr. Pattie: Yes, I will. It is important for the welfare of those in the British automative industry that those who originate designs should have a proper, though not an excessive, degree of protection. That in itself will assist the competitive process.

Mr. Jackson: On the question of the reform of copyright law, will my hon. Friend reaffirm the Government's commitment to abolish the licence of right on pharmaceutical products in the course of the next year?

Mr. Pattie: We have said that we wish to abolish that right as soon as the legislative timetable permits.

Electrical Installation Work (Safety)

5. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received about standards of safety in electrical installation work in domestic and commercial buildings.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I have not received any representations to date, either from private individuals or from official bodies, concerning the standards of safety in electrical installation work in domestic buildings. Questions concerning such work in commercial buildings are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

I have, however, recently received a letter from my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) concerning the attempted installation by a private contractor of substandard electric cable in a private dwelling house belonging to one of his constituents. This matter is being examined by the British Approvals Service for Electric Cables (BASEC) and the trading standards department of the local authority concerned.

Mr. Thurnham: In view of the danger of accidents, including loss of life, from faulty installation work, does my hon. Friend consider that those who do this work should be properly qualified and appropriately registered?

Mr. Butcher: As a result of my hon. Friend's substantive question my officials contacted the National Inspection Council for Electrical Installation Contracting for its views on this question. I am advised that there has been no recorded increase in accidents attributable to faulty electrical installation. If my hon. Friend would like to discuss a particular incident in his constituency, I am ready to look into the matter.

Mr. Pavitt: In view of the likelihood of the onset of a wet winter, will the Minister discuss with the Department of the Environment the problem of electrical installation standards in inner city areas where repairs are needed, because a large number of houses are out of date and where, because insufficient sums are available from rates as a result of rate capping, it is impossible to ensure safety for old-age pensioners whose electrical apparatus needs to be renewed?

Mr. Butcher: As the hon. Gentleman will know, that is predominantly a question for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. I hope he will be reassured that electrical installations in domestic premises are subject to the provisions of the Electricity Supply Regulations 1937, which give appropriate safeguards for the proper wiring of customer premises.

Mr. Squire: Does my hon. Friend recognise that in the whole of installation work, be it electrical, gas or plumbing, we lag behind most other countries in our determination to protect consumers through a system of registration which would allow for those who are properly qualified to be recognised and rewarded?

Mr. Butcher: I have consulted some of the bodies concerned and I am convinced that at present the process of self-regulation is working to the consumers' benefit.

National Infrastructure

6. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received concerning investment in national infrastructure.

Mr. Channon: None, Sir.

Mr. Livsey: Will the Minister heed the advice given recently by the CBI to invest in infrastructure and realise that every job created in the infrastructure costs £8,000, whereas every job created through tax cuts costs £25,000? Is it not a disgrace that the Government have failed to invest in the infrastructure?

Mr. Channon: I do not agree with that. The Government's record on infrastructure spending is extremely good. Total public sector capital expenditure is more than £21 billion a year, capital spending on motorways and roads has increased considerably and National Health Service capital expenditure has also increased. I could give the House millions of examples.

Mr. Richard Page: Is it not true that the regions that are at present making their submissions are doing so to obtain money in their bids from the EEC and are unlikely to put the best complexion on these matters? In answer to the whingeing of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey), is it not the case that the shire counties, such as Hertfordshire, have invested hundreds of millions, if not thousands of millions, of pounds in the regions through the redistribution of the rate support grant? Therefore, does my hon. Friend agree that due recognition should be given to the shire counties for the sacrifices that they have made over the years?

Mr. Channon: As I represent part of a shire county, I understand what my hon. Friend is saying. I agree with a great deal of the first part of his remarks.

Mr. Pike: Does the Secretary of State accept that many parts of the deprived regions will be shocked by the complacency of the reply given a few moments ago? We need to spend far more money on the infrastructure to deal with the problems facing us, especially in the north-west and in other deprived regions. When will the Government tackle those problems and get people back to work?

Mr. Channon: I am astonished at what the hon. Gentleman says. In the north-west nearly £1 billion has been spent on regional aid since 1979, the Merseyside development corporation has been created, an urban development corporation for Trafford Park and Salford has been created, there is a commitment to develop Manchester airport, £58 million has been invested in improvements, there are £105 million worth of urban development grants and there has been a 65 per cent. increase in the north-west water services.

Mr. Marland: Does my right hon. Friend agree with the view of all those of us who are regular users of the motorways that the miles and miles of cones that we must work our way around are a vivid example of how much is being spent, not only on motorway repairs, but on improvements in the infrastructure?

Mr. Channon: Motorway cones are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. I agree with my hon. Friend that capital spending on motorways and trunk roads has increased by almost 30 per cent. in real terms. Why are Opposition Members so solemn and sour about it all?

Mr. Gordon Brown: With regard to the submission to the European regional development fund on infrastructure and other aspects of Government policy, will the Secretary of State tell us exactly who is responsible for saying that the prospects for reducing unemployment are gloomy, frighteningly bleak, or impossible until fundamental problems of public investment and expenditure are resolved?

Mr. Channon: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government make no forecast of future unemployment. We do not think that that would be sensible. Opposition Members are determined, not surprisingly, to make trouble for the years ahead. Under the rules of the ERDF, the Government have to provide assumptions that are used for financial planning purposes only, and they are assumptions, not forecasts. It is the same as the public expenditure survey forecast. The hon. Gentleman is trying to create a great deal of fuss about nothing.

Mr. Hanley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the views of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) are typical of the views of the Liberal party nationally? I cannot find any local Liberal organisation that will allow expansion of roads, railways, prisons, tunnels or airports in its own area.

Mr. Channon: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend.

British Leyland

7. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the state of the Government's proposals for the privatisation of British Leyland.

Mr. Channon: The position on Leyland Bus and Unipart was announced to the House on 24 July. Since then, Rover Group has announced agreement in principle to dispose of a majority interest in Jaguar Rover Australia. It is also taking forward the disposal of a majority interest in ISTEL.

Mr. Hamilton: Will the Secretary of State give some security and peace of mind to British Leyland, its workers, dealers and its customers, by giving an assurance that there will be no negotiations before a general election about the sale of British Leyland or, for that matter, Land Rover?

Mr. Channon: There are no such plans. I explained the position on Land Rover some months ago, and there is no change in that position. I have already explained what is happening in a number of subsidiaries of the Rover Group. Our policy remains to seek to return the businesses, together or separately, to private ownership. I am awaiting a report from Mr. Day on the financial structure of the company. I have nothing to tell the House beyond that.

Mr. Madel: Whether British Leyland is or is not privatised, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that the Government will not allow it to engage in unfair competition with existing car and truck manufacturers in this country?

Mr. Channon: Yes, I can give my hon. Friend that undertaking. I well understand his concern about events in his constituency.

Mr. Terry Davis: How will privatisation help to solve British Leyland's real problem, which is a sales problem? When will the Secretary of State ask the directors of British Leyland to do something about the failure of the company's sales and marketing management to sell the vehicles that they are employed to sell, instead of constantly calling for redundancies among the men and women who work in the factories, who have significantly improved both quality and productivity and who are then rewarded with the sack?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman is being most unfair and unreasonable, which is not typical of him. I have asked Mr. Day to do his utmost to try to improve the commercial performance of the Rover Group, which is in everyone's interests. The group is making considerable strides in quality, production and output, and is doing extremely well. I am asking Mr. Day to look at the whole commercial future of the Rover Group and I look forward to receiving his proposals. I am sure that they will be received enthusiastically by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Do the privatisation plans that have been announced mean that the money that will then be released will be available for reinvestment in the Rover Group, bearing in mind the excellent new car — the Sterling — which has a splendid future if it has the right investment, for which Mr. Day is asking?

Mr. Channon: All questions about investment in the Rover Group will have to await Mr. Day's report. I am naturally in agreement with my hon. Friend about the quality of the Rover Group's cars and I only wish that more people, both inside and outside the House, would buy them.

Mr. Nellist: How seriously can we take the Secretary of State's list when the privatisation from British Leyland of Self-Changing Gears in Coventry took place in June without any announcement to this House until it was squeezed out of the Secretary of State in a written answer? Despite promises about the safety of the company in the harbour of Cummins Engines, within 12 weeks of privatisation 20 per cent. of jobs were lost. How seriously can we take the list when that sort of thing happens?

Mr. Channon: Surely all hon. Members know that in order to stay in business a firm has to win sufficient orders. It is unfortunately the case with Self-Changing Gears that its failure to win sufficient orders resulted in job losses.

Mr. Forth: Can my right hon. Friend give me assurances about the proposals for ISTEL in my constituency? Will he assure me that sufficient weight will be given in considering the management buy-out proposals to the strength of the skills of the existing staff and that those skills will be fully weighed against any financial considerations which might otherwise be considered alone?

Mr. Channon: As I told the House, I am awaiting the assessment from the Rover Group of its majority interest in ISTEL. I will, of course, bear in mind what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Hoyle: Will the Secretary of State please confirm that the instructions given to Mr. Day are to talk to everyone with a view to privatising Austin Rover? Why are the Government in such a hurry to sell off an indigenous car manufacturer? Do they not want a British stake in the motor industry, and are they not worried about the loss of jobs?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman is misleading the House, I am sure unintentionally. The instructions given to Mr. Day are to run this company commercially and to get it into a good commercial state in the interests of all concerned. The Government were elected with a manifesto commitment to privatise the group and our policy remains to seek to return the businesses, together or separately, to private ownership. No doubt that will take a considerable time.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend make it plain to private investors that he is genuinely open to all suggestions for the sale, investment or collaboration in respect of British Leyland and that he is not merely marking time until the next general election ?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend will realise from the list that I read to the House of the parts of the Rover Group that are being disposed of that an energetic programme is proceeding on that front. I am sure he welcomes that, and I endorse what he said.

Mr. John Smith: The Government caused deep worry to everyone in the Rover Group when their surreptitious proposals to sell it off to the Ford Motor Company were revealed earlier this year. In view of that, do the Government not owe to the people who work for the Rover Group a solid commitment to see it through to commercial success? Is it not more important to maintain and expand its production than to seek to privatise it? Will the Secretary of State give the House an undertaking that if proposals by Mr. Day are to reduce substantially the volume of production in the Rover Group he will reject those proposals?

Mr. Channon: I had better wait to see what Mr. Day says before I commit myself to reject or accept anything that he puts forward. I do not agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman about a surreptitious attempt to sell off the Rover Group or the effect that such a thing would have on the commercial future of the group. The Rover Group, and other car companies in Britain, must depend for commercial success on quality, price, reliability and delivery. Rover has an excellent story to tell on those points and I hope that it will achieve commercial success, because that is the Government's policy.

Takeover Bids

8. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many takeover bids have been referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in the past 12 months; with what result; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: In the 12 months to date, 14 acquisitions or proposed acquisitions have been referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Of these, four proposals were abandoned and the references laid aside. One proposal was found by the commission to operate against the public interest, three were found not to operate against the public interest and six investigations are still in progress.

Mr. Greenway: May I respectfully point out to the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) that the Ault and Wiborg paint company which he mentioned is in my constituency and not in Brent? He ought to know his own constituency a little better. However, I agree with much of what he said. Is my right hon. Friend aware that many of my constituents are under 90 days' notice while the proposed takeover by Hoechst or Bergers is being investigated? Does he not agree that this is unfair to both parties? I hope that he will refuse to allow that takeover to occur. Meanwhile, will he say whether the referral process could be speeded up, in the interests of all parties?

Mr. Channon: I note the alliance between the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) and my hon. Friend. I can assure my hon. Friend that I will expect to listen to the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading if this merger qualifies on assets or market share. I cannot anticipate the result of the director general's inquiries. My hon. Friend also asked about the delay in Monopolies and Mergers Commission procedures. I am certainly prepared to consider whether there are circumstances in which the commission might be asked to report in a shorter period. The current review will consider that.

Dr. Godman: The Director General of Fair Trading is examining a proposal to take over the British Sugar Corporation. Will the Secretary of State head off that takeover by the Italian company, Ferruzzi? Is he aware that that company seeks, not a monopoly of the British sugar market, but a monopoly of the European market? If it is successful, the interests of the producers in the African, Caribbean and Pacific cane sugar-producing countries will be severely harmed, and so will the interests of those employed in the United Kingdom's cane sugar refineries.

Mr. Channon: I note the hon. Gentleman's views. The proposed takeover of British Sugar by Tate and Lyle and Ferruzzi is being investigated by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. The hon. Gentleman will understand that it would be quite inappropriate of me to comment at this stage or to anticipate the commission's recommendations.

Mr. Gale: Further to the answer given to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), and to set the record straight, will my right hon. Friend confirm that, following its successful defence of the Scottish and Newcastle takeover, during which Matthew Brown suggested that Scottish and Newcastle might wish to close one of its breweries, the first thing that the Matthew Brown management did was to close one of its breweries? Consequently, does my right hon. Friend agree that small is not necessarily secure? Does he further agree with the general principle that it is better to have a large domestic industry that is able to compete with European companies than a fragmented industry that cannot do so?

Mr. Channon: All the questions show that hon. Members have a keen interest in this topic. I shall await their views as to what, if any, changes should take place in our competition policy.

Mr. Heffer: Will the Secretary of State give an assurance that some time, somewhere, this Government will actually defend the interests of British industry?

Mr. Channon: With respect, that question is untypical of the hon. Gentleman, and most unfair.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I welcome the sterling work done by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, but does my right hon. Friend realise that many of my constituents are particularly concerned about the delays in reaching decisions on the Plessey and Allied-Lyons cases? Will he confirm that there has been great concern about the cartel operated by some petrol companies? Is there not a case for the Monopolies and Mergers Commission to look into that?

Mr. Channon: The Director General of Fair Trading has looked at that latter point several times. I have already said that we shall try to find ways of speeding up such decisions, although I think that that will be difficult without further legislation. The GEC-Plessey matter was decided this summer, and I seem to remember that most of the House agreed with the decision reached.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Secretary of State aware that today several redundancies have been announced at the Royal Ordnance factory in Leeds as a direct result of Vickers buying out its sole competitor? Would it not have been better if that takeover had been referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

Mr. Channon: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. I followed the recommendation given to me on that occasion by the Director General of Fair Trading, that there would be no detriment to competition. Consequently, I thought that it was unreasonable to refer the matter to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Airbus Project

9. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has yet received an application from British Aerospace for launch aid in connection with the Airbus A330/A340 project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: My Department received an application from British Aerospace for launch aid in respect of the proposed Airbus A330/A340 programme on 20 October. A detailed appraisal of the application has been set in hand.

Mr. McCrindle: If my hon. Friend accepts that Airbus can be truly competitive with the large American aircraft manufacturers only if it can offer airline customers a broad range of products, is he aware that several of us hope that the Government will react favourably towards the application from British Aerospace, especially as launch aid was provided for the A320?

Mr. Pattie: I note my hon. Friend's remarks. He will recall that the success rate of the A320 programme appears to be very encouraging, offering the prospect of a reasonably early repayment of that launch aid. We understand the case being made about the family of aeroplanes. At present, Airbus is engaged in a marketing operation on the A340 in order to establish the level of airline interest in that aeroplane.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Can the Minister confirm that a decision on the application by British Aerospace is expected before the end of this year? Will he take that decision irrespective of any collaboration with McDonnell Douglas? Will he confirm that the British Aerospace and Airbus Europe decision stands on its own right and will be considered in that light, that the £750 million launch aid is acceptable in principle to his Department and that we can expect a decision before the end of the year?

Mr. Pattie: The hon. Gentleman would not expect me at this stage, when I have just told the House that the detailed appraisal has just been set in hand, to say what level of expenditure is likely to be acceptable to the Government. We have to take into account the market opportunities for one of the aeroplanes in particular.

British Aerospace seeks and expects a decision from the Government in the first quarter of next year, not before the end of this year.

When I met my ministerial colleagues during the Farnborough air show to discuss whether the talks with McDonnell Douglas should be suspended, it was agreed that Airbus had asked for that suspension and that the suspension should take place to give Airbus the opportunity to market the A340 without suggestions that it would go in with McDonnell Douglas.

I believe that there are advantages in the longer term in certain of the other programmes, such as the stretch version of the A320, where co-operation with McDonnell Douglas could be fruitful.

Mr. Stern: Has my hon. Friend seen the forecast of the expected market for aeroplanes of the size of the A340 up to and including the year 2005? Does he agree that the forecasts are extremely encouraging, and will he bear them in mind when evaluating the application for launch aid?

Mr. Pattie: Yes, I have seen the forecasts. Those are precisely the types of factors that we want to take into account to see whether those forecasts accord with the forecasts that we and others are making.

British Leyland

11. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements his Department makes for the monitoring of progress of companies privatised from British Leyland where that company retains an interest.

Mr. Giles Shaw: There are no special arrangements beyond the normal role of the Department in its sponsorship of private sector companies.

Mr. Nellist: I am tempted to ask why not. Coventry Climax was privatised from British Leyland in 1981 and it has lost 80 per cent. of the original 3,000 jobs, with not a penny being paid to British Leyland by the consortium that took it over. Do the Government not feel any responsibility for such a conspicuous failure of privatisation? When the Government promise a secure future for workers, should they not monitor before failure occurs? Why was such monitoring not exercised by the Government?

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman will be interested to know that the British Leyland position in regard to the problem is fully protected. Coventry Climax has been through a difficult time in the sale and marketing of its products and it is currently in the hands of the receiver. It would, therefore, be wrong for me to make any further observation about the existing company.

In relation to privatisation and jobs, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that 1,500 more jobs at Jaguar have been created since privatisation. Its profit record is now £121 million on the 1985 returns, as opposed to a loss of £32 million in 1981.

Mr. Robert Atkins: Does my hon. Friend agree that companies privatised with British Leyland, as well as those that are still within the group — for example Leyland

Trucks — have done everything asked of them by the Government in terms of quality and marketing support, but that, none the less, the market is too small to take the number of products produced? Will my hon. Friend confirm the importance of giving Government support for export sales through loans, credit arrangements and in leading an attack into the market that is so important for companies such as Leyland Trucks?

Mr. Shaw: I accept my hon. Friend's point in relation to Leyland Trucks. He will be aware that there is substantial over-capacity in the trucks business in Britain and probably worldwide. That is why he will, no doubt, welcome, as I did, the arrangements announced by Mr. Day in Paris vis-a-vis the Daf company. In relation to overseas exports, the Export Credits Guarantee Department stands behind many British companies in their fight to obtain a fair share of overseas markets.

Mr. John Smith: As Coventry Climax is now in receivership, and as, at the time it was sold off from British Leyland a bright future was promised to the work force, should not someone who initiated that privatisation give an apology to them for what has happened? In so far as it is now the receiver's proposal to sell off the business, perhaps in parts, is it the Government's intention to permit the receiver to sell to the highest bidder irrespective of the consequences for the west midlands economy of the loss of substantial engineering industries?

Mr. Shaw: I understand the right hon. and learned Gentleman's natural anger at the fact that the privatisation of the company has not proved successful, but I must confess that it surely is right to see that a company can market its goods and services without subvention from the taxpayer. In the case of Coventry Climax, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman well knows, there have been difficulties for it in achieving its sales performance. That could happen to any company, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows full well what the consequences of that would be. The receiver's task is to seek to dispose of assets and to obtain a realistic return for the creditors of the company, and that is in his and the creditors' best interests.

Land Rover

13. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has received any representations about restoring Land Rover to the private sector.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The position has not changed since my right hon. Friend's statement on 24 April.

Mr. Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that, with the problems overhanging the volume car market in Britain, about which we all know, there is really no reason to leave Land Rover in the same embrace? Will my hon. Friend be speaking to Mr. Graham Day about the possibilities of offering that company to the British shareholder?

Mr. Shaw: I understand my hon. Friend's views and I witnessed his robust performance on television recently. However, my hon. Friend and I should await the corporate plan proposals that Mr. Graham Day is now preparing.

Mr. Hoyle: Would it not be better to leave Land Rover where it is, with British Leyland? Does not all this selling off and disturbance, particularly of the profit-making parts, mean that all that will be left is a loss-making rump, parts of which will either go out of business or face vast redundancies? Does the Minister not care at all?

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman must be patient. It is important to see that all parts of the Rover Group are profitable, and I hope that they will be. That would be the ideal objective, hence the massive effort being made by Mr. Day and his colleagues, not just to restructure the company but to make a massive effort on the commercial development of the range of products that they possess. Some of the success stories within the volume car group, including the 25 per cent. increase in the Rover 200 sales compared with a year ago, show that they have been successful.

Mr. Alan Howarth: When my hon. Friend is considering questions relating to the privatisation of Land Rover, or, for that matter, of British Gas, will he bear in mind that the Japanese authorities are not permitting foreigners to apply for shares in Nippon Telegraph and Telephone when it is floated later this month? Does he agree that it is an important point of principle that there should be reciprocal openness in financial markets? Will my hon. Friend and his colleagues be willing, as circumstances may require, to invoke the reciprocity clauses of the Financial Services Bill?

Mr. Shaw: I admire my hon. Friend's ingenuity in tacking that supplementary question on to a question about Land Rover. However, I take his point that there should be a free market in investment as well as in sales.

Telecommunications (Competition)

14. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met the Director General of OFTEL to discuss competition in the telecommunications industry.

Mr. Pattie: My right hon. Friend last met the director general on 16 October.

Mr. Weetch: I thank the Minister for that answer. When he next meets the Director General of Oftel, will he tell him that in the course of a recent adjudication on a competitive tender by British Telecom in the Ivory Coast, one of my constituents, Jonathon Wash, part of the personnel of BT, was killed in doubtful circumstances, and I suspect foul play? Will he, through the Director General of Oftel, prevail on BT to lift the conspiracy of silence on the matter?

Mr. Pattie: I am sure that the first thing that the House would want me to do is to express sympathy to the family of the hon. Gentleman's constituent who has met his end in that way. We have no locus in the matter of requiring BT to make information available to him. However, I know that the chairman of BT reads the proceedings of the House with particular care, and this exchange may well produce the effect that the hon. Gentleman seeks.

Mr. Hickmet: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind that, in the supply of telecommunications equipment to British Telecom, system Y was won on merit by Thorn-Ericson, and will lead to the creation of 700 to 1,000 jobs in my constituency? Will he also bear in mind that GEC, despite having numerous friends on both sides of the House and in high places, failed to win the contract because of the failure of system X? Will he ensure that the Director General of Oftel is not subject to undue pressure from any quarter?

Mr. Pattie: Anyone who has met the director general will know that he is unlikely to take lightly pressure from any quarter. I am sure that it is best to leave the merits of prospective systems to be tested in the market place.

British Shipbuilders

15. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what current proposals he has to privatise British Shipbuilders.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The long-term objective is to return as many of British Shipbuilders' yards as possible to the private sector when circumstances permit.

Mr. Holt: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Will he comment on the rumours that are sweeping Teesside that the Cuban order, which was likely to keep Smiths Dock open, is now going to the Wear shipyards? Is there not time, even now, for Smiths Dock to be reprieved in view of these rumours?

Mr. Shaw: I am aware that rumours have been circulated to that effect, but I cannot comment upon them now because I do not have the up-to-date information. My information was that negotiations on the Cuban order had still some considerable way to go. My hon. Friend will know why it was that British Shipbuilders decided that it saw no further need for the capacity of Smiths Dock. That is why it deemed it right to dispose of it and to sell the assets that it contained.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Will the Minister accept that so far the privatisation of the shipbuilding industry has meant job losses in the privatised sector and has threatened the viability of the public sector? Will the Minister face his responsibilities to an industry which has gained less than 1 per cent. of world orders this year? In the negotiations over the European intervention fund, will he stand up for a better deal from the fund than the one that is foreshadowed in the draft directive which the Government seem prepared to accept?

Mr. Shaw: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall fight extremely hard in the negotiations over the European intervention fund, which I believe to be a crucial component for United Kingdom shipbuilding. I think that the hon. Gentleman should be careful before he suggests that the industry's problems can be solved by shipbuilding remaining in the public sector. He knows well that a number of significant orders have come to sectors that have been privatised. I trust that he welcomes the announcement made today that the Atlantic Conveyor will be stretched at the Scott Lithgow yard.

Mr. Hoyle: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman's point of order arise directly from questions and not amount to a continuation of questions?

Mr. Hoyle: It arises directly from questions, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Hoyle: I seek your guidance, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to be critical, but is it right that an hon. Member should come into the Chamber when a question is being asked and thereafter rise in his place and be called to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, that is perfectly in order.

Later—

Dr. Godman: I wish to raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker, which refers specifically to the last answer given by the Minister of State to my hon. Friend the Member for——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That matter could come into the category of a continuation of Question Time. I do not think that I can take it because, as the hon. Member said, it refers to an answer given by the Front Bench, which patently cannot be a matter for me.

Master J. R. Bickford Smith

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to raise a point of order with you of which I have given you notice. Last December I criticised the senior Master in the Royal Courts of Justice, Master J. R. Bickford Smith, and a firm of solicitors, Elborne, Mitchell and Co., in a debate in this place. I wrote subsequently to the Lord Chancellor and asked him to set up an inquiry. There was considerable correspondence between us and since then I have heard nothing.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to raise three matters with you in relation to the incident to which I have referred. Although I have heard nothing, yesterday the Lord Chancellor replied to the inquiry by way of a planted written question, which was answered by the Attorney-General. The question was tabled by an hon. Member who is a little fellow from one of the Leicester seats. You will know him, Mr. Speaker, because he prattles on but cannot be seen because he is so small.

My first point, Mr. Speaker—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an important matter.

Mr. Sedgemore: My first point is this: is it not a gross abuse of both Houses for the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney-General to conspire in this way to answer a query put by an hon. Member in this fashion?

My second point—it is even more important—is this: the Attorney-General's answer impugns the integrity of a private solicitor as well as myself. I take no exception to the Attorney-General impugning my integrity, if he so wants, on the basis of an unreliable witness who told a whopping great lie and who can be seen most days wandering around the Royal Courts of Justice in his masonic pinny and severed trousers.

I question the use of the parliamentary question and answer procedure. I have always been under the impression that if an hon. Member wishes to criticise another, he either has to put down a substantive motion, something which I have often done, or he has to be prepared to give notice to the hon. Member and debate the matter in the House. I may be wrong about that. It may be perfectly legitimate for the Attorney-General to use the answer to a written question to impugn the integrity of hon. Members, but I am sure you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that it is a matter of importance both in principle and in practice. When I become a Minister, will I be allowed to do it?

My third point is this: in his answer, the Attorney-General impugned my integrity for attacking one of the judges and has said—I believe rightly—that one can attack a judge only by a substantive motion. The only person whom I attacked in that debate was Master Bickford Smith. Master Bickford Smith is not, never has been and never will be a judge. The Attorney-General sought to widen the interpretation by saying that that rule applies not only to judges but to senior judicial figures. I ask, Mr. Speaker, where one draws the line as to who is and who is not a senior judicial figure.

Let us consider the Lord Chancellor's son. He is a barrister and a Minister—a Member of this House. Is he a senior judicial figure? When I was in chambers with him, we used to call him a weak-chinned, bespectacled swot. Be that as it may, I ask you, Mr. Speaker—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. That expression may not be unparliamentary, but it is undignified.

Mr. Sedgemore: I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rule on these matters. I like the Lord Chancellor. Everything that I learnt at the Bar was learnt in his chambers, where I was a pupil to Mr. Justice Maurice Drake.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Member for having given prior notice of his point of order. He has raised a major matter. I should like a little time in which to consider it before I give a ruling.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Further to the point of order——

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Further to the point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. One at a time.

Mr. Bruinvels: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to put the record straight on this matter. Obviously, I am particularly envious that you had prior notice of this matter. I did not. I appreciate that the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) is concerned that a shorter Member than he actually got the right answer, but I refute the fact that I asked a flagrant planted question and that I had showed some interest in this case. I seek a withdrawal of the unfortunate allegation—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Some years ago I heard the phrase "planted question", but I do not know what it means.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance in this matter. So far as I am aware, during the lifetime of this Parliament, the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) has libelled numerous members of the public—professional men—using the cloak of parliamentary privilege. How much is it in order for that to be done? How far does it demean the traditions of the House that that is permitted? How should hon. Members conduct themselves in relation to the matter? The hon. Gentleman today again libelled professional men. If he did that outside the doors of the Chamber, he would face a libel writ that would bankrupt him.

Mr. Sedgemore: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) but, in fact, the private solicitor and I held a press conference this morning. The private solicitor not only bitterly criticised and challenged the lies of Master Bickford Smith but took on the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney-General. It has been done outside. If these people—[HON. MEMBERS: "What about you?"] I have also released to the press my correspondence with the Lord Chancellor. If these people want to take out writs—I know that they will not—they can do so.

Mr. Hickmet: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Master Bickford Smith is constrained by the rules of the Supreme Court from issuing a writ against that so-called hon. Member, as well he knows.

Hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me clear up this matter in relation to what the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) said. We have in this place, and we shall be claiming it after the State Opening next week, freedom of speech. Every hon. Member has freedom of speech. Of course, he has to exercise it with discretion as he sees it, but that is entirely a matter for the hon. Member concerned.

Hon. Members: Make him withdraw it.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) referred to my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) as the "so-called hon. Member". I think that that statement demands that he withdraw it immediately.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear the hon. Member say "so-called hon. Member". We must keep to the rules of the House. We always refer to each other in this place not by our surnames but by our constituencies. If the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe said those words, I am sure that he would wish to withdraw them.

Mr. Hickmet: We are all hon. Members and we have to discharge that obligation which is upon us. The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch knows the best description that fits him.

Hon. Members: No—withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: Order. In the interests of good order, I ask the hon. Member to refer to the hon. Gentleman by his constituency and not as a so-called hon. Member.

Mr. Hickmet: I withdraw.

Prime Minister's Questions

3.43 pm

Mr. Speaker: I have two statements to make. The first arises out of Question Time yesterday. After questions yesterday I promised to reflect on the interventions I had made in an effort to ensure that supplementary questions to the Prime Minister were confined to matters within her responsibility. In subsequent exchanges, the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds), in a helpful way, asked that we should revert to the practice whereby such supplementary questions were prefaced with some remarks which were relevant to the Prime Minister's activities on the day on which the question is put. I agree with this approach and would ask hon. Members to make it clear early in their question that the question concerns matters within the Prime Minister's responsibility.

So far as my rulings yesterday are concerned, I believe that my intervention in the question of the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), which was about happenings in Manchester city council as reported in the Daily Telegraph, was correct. Subsequently, I intervened in a supplementary question by the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham), which up to that point had consisted of a fairly lengthy preamble about the Japanese economy. I now recognise that that preamble was probably intended to lead to a question about this country's economy. In those circumstances, my intervention may have been over-hasty, although I should emphasise that its purpose was to try to make certain that supplementary questions were brief and in order and that hon. Members still hoping to be called would be given a chance to question the Prime Minister. In these circumstances, I hope that the hon. Member for Blackley will accept my apology. I will try, as I hinted yesterday, to compensate him in some appropriate way.

Having said that, I hope that I shall have the support of the House in my efforts to ensure that questions to the Prime Minister deal with matters for which she is responsible.

Later—

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I thank you for your generous statement. A Back-Bench Member rarely receives a statement from the Speaker such as the one that I received today, and I will savour this occasion for many a long month.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I also thank you for your consideration when you intervened on my question yesterday? I fully accept your judgment that I was out of order. I hoped to bring it round, and I hope that I may have a chance to ask the Prime Minister a question similarly in the very near future.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Sir, in respect of your statement, may I say how obleeged I am and how obleeged I am sure the House is?

Mr. Speaker: I thank all hon. Gentlemen concerned for their generosity.

Standing Orders

3.45 pm

Mr. Speaker: I have a second statement to make.

The House's public business Standing Orders have grown over many years. As new Standing Orders have been added, their arrangement has become somewhat confusing. Therefore, the Clerk of the House has, with my authority, rearranged the Standing Orders into a more rational sequence. I am sure that this will be for the convenience of hon. Members.

The Procedure Committee has been informed of the intention to rearrange the Standing Orders and has raised no objections. I must emphasise that the substance and application of the Standing Orders remains completely unchanged. All the Standing Orders have been renumbered. The new numbers will be shown clearly in the new publication, with convenient conversion tables from the old numbers.

I should perhaps draw the attention of the House to one change. Standing Order No. 10 — "adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration" — with which we are all familiar will in future be Standing Order No. 20. The rearranged Standing Orders will come into use on the first day of the new Session.

Mr. Mordecai Vanunu

3.47 pm

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): As this is a good day for contrition all round, may I express my regret that my acute disappointment yesterday led me astray in implying, improperly, that you, Mr. Speaker, have ever been unfair. Obviously, the unfairness lay with me. I apologise for that.

I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the disappearance from this country of Mr. Mordecai Vanunu."

Two years ago, Mr. Dikko, a former Nigerian Minister, was found drugged in the hold of an aircraft. At that time, there was, rightly, an outcry in the House. Now, Mr. Mordecai Vanunu has vanished from a London hotel and, like a rabbit out of a hat, has appeared in Israel. He went through no normal recognised channels, but he was in this country one day and a short time later was in Israel.

Mr. Vanunu took the state's shilling and betrayed its trust. That is odious, but it is not the point of asking the House to become involved in the matter. Civilised countries cannot expect to pluck someone at will illegally from another country as though he were cargo. How did Mr. Vanunu get out of Britain? Mossad seems to be implicated, but no explanation has come from Israel, except that the matter is too secret to be discussed there. However, no matter which concerns a person who suddenly disappears and reappears somewhere else can be too secret to be discussed in this House. I believe that this type of thing should leave a chill, because there is an implication that if the motive is worthy, a country may do what it will in another country. That cannot be right.

I believe that the House should be given all the information that is at the disposal of Her Majesty's Government so that we at least know that our Government have reacted and are acting properly in this serious matter. That is why I have taken the time of the House to call for the Adjournment on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) has asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the disappearance from this country of Mr. Mordecai Vanunu."

I have listened with great care to what the hon. Gentleman has said. I regret that I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10, and I cannot submit his application to the House.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Not on that matter, I hope.

Mr. Marlow: I do not in any way challenge what you have said, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, you are aware of the diplomatic significance of these matters. There was an issue with the Syrian embassy, action was taken with regard to the embassy and there was a statement in the House. The world looks upon this House to be objective. I wonder how we can get a statement, a question or some explanation from a Minister as to what the Government know about what seems to be a sinister issue. Our status in the world and our objectivity in the middle east depend upon the House being able to find out the truth and the reality behind the situation.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): If you manage, Mr. Speaker, to follow the advice that has been given by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) in trying to ascertain some more information for the benefit of the House, would you bear in mind that the whole affair may lead us to Johnson Matthey bank, Abdul Shamji and, who knows, Conservative Central Office?

Mr. Speaker: My ruling is concerned only with whether this matter should have precedence over the business set down for today or tomorrow. As to the wider issues, I do not in any way underestimate what was said by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) or what was contained in the submission of his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark). These are serious and important matters. The hon. Member for Selly Oak must find other ways of seeking to obtain his objective, but he cannot do so, unhappily, under Standing Order No. 10, for the reasons I have given.

Insurance Companies

3.52 pm

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to the commutation of insurance policies and contracts.

I am sure that the House will agree that this week or this month, as in every other week or month, some person will surrender their life assurance policy because they cannot afford to continue the payments, for some other reason which could be justified. The case which prompted me to introduce this Bill was when two people decided to marry, each owning an assurance policy. They decided to surrender their individual policies and take out a joint policy which was more suitable to their needs as a married couple.

The present code of practice applied by assurance companies concerning the discontinuation and surrender of life assurance policies is, in my opinion, ambiguous, does not work, and in no way helps, assists or protects policyholders.

The purpose of my Bill is to give protection to people who enter into an agreement with an assurance company, to ensure that a proper and understandable code of practice is introduced and carried out and that fairness is applied at all times to policyholders. The present code of practice states:

"The intermediary shall draw attention to the long term nature of the policy and to the consequent effects of early discontinuance and surrender."

When asked about the consequent effects in real terms — that is, what the policyholder would lose on surrender after two, three or more years — no one can say what they will be. My experience is as follows. A person takes out a life assurance policy with Pearl Assurance, for 10 years. After making payments for nearly two years, the person requests advice on how to obtain a different policy to cover herself and her husband. After making repeated requests for advice and obtaining no satisfaction, the only course open to her is to surrender the policy. Over the period that the policy was in being £156 was paid to the insurance company. Following surrender £106 is paid to the policyholder. In other words, one third of the money paid to the company by the policyholder, plus interest, is retained by the company. On reflection, it could appear that the insurance company preferred the policy to be surrendered than to give additional advice.

When dissatisfaction is expressed by the policyholder and an explanation is requested as to why so much money is deducted from the payments made, it is said that in the early years of the policy commission to the agent, stamp duty, costs and servicing the business are the real reason for the deduction. Even if one accepts that the point made by the actuary for the insurance company is correct, and that there are initial charges, to take over 32p in the pound for every pound paid is exorbitant and most unsatisfactory.

Some policyholders do face genuine hardship. I witnessed people having to surrender insurance policies during the miners' strike, and there is the case I have just referred to, and last weekend, when I held advisory meetings throughout my constituency, a further case was brought to my notice of a person who lost his job in his early sixties. When his employment benefit period had ceased, he applied to the Department of Health and Social Security for supplementary benefit. He was asked what capital he had and what other investments he held. Being the truthful person he is, he declared that he held a life insurance policy. He was told to inquire what the income would be from the asssurance policy if it had to be surrendered. When he had obtained the full information and reported back to the DHSS, he was told to surrender the policy, and for a year or so he has had to provide for himself and his wife on the income from his assurance policy and his savings. When I asked my constituent about his assurance cover he naturally replied that the cover ended when he surrendered the policy.

[Mr. William O'Brien]

One can see that that case introduces a different dimension, in which the Secretary of State for Social Services becomes involved. However, I repeat that such action towards policyholders puts them at the mercy of insurance companies and the discretion of the actuary or any other person who decides how much should be paid to policyholders when the policy is discontinued and how much should be retained by the company.

I could quote other cases and examples. I make the plea that there should be some protection for those people by law against insurance companies which, without explanation, deduct over 30 per cent. from payments made on life assurance policies.

If an actuary of an insurance company makes a judgment about how much should be deducted from payments for a life assurance policy, regardless of how long the policy has existed for, the insurance company should make a statement showing what the money that is being retained covers. If the policyholder is not satisfied with the information received, or if answers are not forthcoming, he should be able to appeal to the Registrar of Friendly Societies with confidence because of information that he will have obtained if my proposals are accepted.

We should also consider more information being given to people who intend to take out assurance policies. More information should be given during the interview about the consequences of early surrender or if the policy is discontinued. More information about what a person would lose if the policy were discontinued could be given, rather than just leaving it to the intermediary to draw attention to the consequences.

My Bill refers to the money paid by the policyholder. He should know how his money is divided and who receives what payment for what service. I beg the House to accept the Bill because it is in the best interests of policyholders and offers a more democratic procedure for assurance company practices.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. William O'Brien, Mr. Walter Harrison, Mr. Terry Patchett, Mr. Alec Woodall, Mr. Ron Lewis, Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse, Mr. Doug Hoyle and Mr. Allen McKay.

Insurance Companies

Mr. William O'Brien accordingly presented a Bill to amend the law relating to the commutation of insurance policies and contracts: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday next and to be printed. [Bill 232.]

Orders of the Day

Housing and Planning Bill

Lords Reason for insisting on their amendment to which the Commons have disagreed and disagreeing to the amendment made by the Commons in lieu thereof, considered.

Lords Reason:

The Lords insist on their amendment to insert a new clause before clause 1—Exception to the right to buy with respect to dwelling houses for persons of pensionable age—and disagree to the amendment proposed by the Commons in lieu thereof for the following Reason:

Because the said Commons amendment fails to provide adequate safeguards for the stock of local authority rented accommodation specially suitable for people of pensionable age.

4.2 pm

The Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction (Mr. John Patten): I beg to move, That this House doth not insist on its disagreement with the Lords amendment.

The issue here is the exclusion from the right to buy of non-sheltered housing for the elderly, which is a serious matter. The House will recall from our debate last Monday that the Lords amendment would do two things. First, it would simplify the test of suitability which houses and flats must meet it they are to be exempted from the right to buy. Secondly, it would take decisions away from the Secretary of State, where they now lie, and put them in the hands of local authorities.

The Government made a reasonable and constructive response to the first of those proposals. We accepted the case for simplifying the test but, on the second issue, we felt unable to agree for the reasons that I explained. The Government amendment, which was carried in the House on Monday, would have ensured that decisions remained with the Secretary of State. That is the point at issue between us.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): It was.

Mr. Patten: By insisting on its amendment, the other place is insisting that decisions on exemption from the right to buy should be taken away from the Secretary of State and put in the hands of local authorities.

The Government, recognising the strength of feeling in another place, have reconsidered this matter, but I have to say that we remain absolutely convinced that decisions should rest with the Secretary of State. We are, however, at a very late stage in the Session and there are many important provisions in the Bill, some of which are eagerly awaited by many thousands of tenants who want to buy their own homes. Deadlock now would result in serious delays in the implementation of those provisions.

Against that background, we have reluctantly decided, in the interests of ensuring that the Bill is enacted quickly, not to insist that the Commons amendment be reinstated.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): The Government have lost.

Mr. Patten: I shall make the Government's stance absolutely clear. We are determined that as many tenants as possible should have the right to buy. It is tenants who have lost from the amendment. We are determined that tenants should be able to exercise their rights, and that includes elderly tenants. We have accepted from the start that there should be some limited exclusions but — I choose my words carefully — the Government are not prepared to see elderly tenants denied the right to buy simply on grounds of age. That would be wrong, but I fear that, whatever its good intentions, it will be the effect of the Lords amendment.

The Lords amendment puts decisions in the hands of local authorities. Some will do their best to administer the test fairly. I recognise that, and they will be councils under all forms of political control, but there will be others who will not administer it fairly. They will use their discretion unscrupulously to exclude elderly tenants generally from the right to buy. That is the opinion not just of myself but of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), who acknowledged it in last Monday's debate when he said:

"I also accept what the Minister said, in a round about way, about some local authorities being unreasonable. I do not deny that. Some local authorities, given wide discretion, would be wholly unreasonable. There is no doubt in my mind about that."—[Official Report, 3 November 1986; Vol. 103, c. 704.]

So concluded the hon. Member.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Read the next sentence.

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to put on the record that which he wants to put on the record if he catches your eye, Mr. Speaker. The Government cannot accept the circumstances that I have described. [Interruption.] I feel that we have the intelligentsia with us on the Opposition Front Bench today. We are talking rather than trying to shout people down. Opposition Members should listen because 350,000 elderly tenants could find themselves excluded from the right to buy. That is monstrous and we cannot accept it.

I give the House a firm undertaking that we shall return to this issue as soon as the opportunity arises. We shall seek the earliest opportunity to put decisions back in the hands of the Secretary of State where they belong. In the meantime, my message to elderly tenants is that if they are thinking seriously about buying their homes, they should apply now. Until the new provisions come into force, the Secretary of State's jurisdiction continues and elderly tenants can be sure of a fair hearing from us.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): I have the impression from what my hon. Friend said that the Government might introduce legislation to put right what the other place has changed. How can he be certain, as any amending legislation would have to go to the other place, that that legislation would go through unless our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was prepared to put some of us in another place? If not, she will still be short of a majority when such legislation goes to the other place in the next Session. I accept that some councils may cause difficulty, which the Government should not tolerate, but will the Government allow a fair period to see how councils behave before taking the action that my hon. Friend is proposing?

Mr. Patten: We shall of course monitor extremely carefully what happens in the coming months once the Bill passes into law. As for my hon. Friend's first point about transmigration to another place, I shall draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East) rose—

Mr. Patten: I do not wish to detain the House. I shall not give way again.

The Government cannot regard this outcome as satisfactory, but our debates have served one useful purpose for Conservative Members. They have clarified the position of the official Opposition and of the alliance parties who in the debates were represented by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

I have already quoted the comments of the hon. Member for Perry Barr. His party is prepared to support an amendment that he acknowledges will result in abuse of tenants' rights. He went on, of course, to suggest that tenants will have redress in the courts. I believe that was the substance of the succeeding sentence. But how many elderly tenants would even contemplate that?

We had an equally revealing contribution from the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, who on Monday, speaking with the full authority of the alliance, made a formal statement of alliance policy. He said:

"we should like increased local discretion over exemptions and discounts."—[Official Report, 3 November 1986; Vol. 103, c. 711.]

According to the hon. Gentleman, that is official alliance policy, and it is an extremely revealing statement. The alliance is in favour not just of local discretion over exemptions from the right to buy — the issue raised by this amendment — but also over rates of discount. The whole notion of tenants' rights is now given a new meaning — rights are what one's local council decides one should have. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) was quite right to describe the hon. Gentleman's statement as a "revelation". Tenants will now know what to expect from the alliance.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): What about the abolition of the Lords?

Mr. Patten: That is not a matter for me.

It is quite clear that none of the Opposition parties cares about the wish of many elderly tenants to become home owners. Even worse, they seem to care precious little about fairness and consistency in the application of rules. The Government care. We are not prepared to stand by and watch tenants cheated of their rights by bureaucratic arrogance simply on grounds of their age. I repeat the undertaking that I have given. As soon as there is a suitable opportunity, we shall return to this issue. We shall seek to put decisions back in the hands of the Secretary of State, where they belong.

Mr. Rooker: I honestly thought that the Minister would have had a little more grace in accepting the second defeat on this issue suffered by the Government in another place. Frankly, the hon. Gentleman exaggerated the situation out of all proportion.

This is not a general exclusion for elderly people, and he knows it. Elderly people have no fear in general that they will lose the right to buy. A figure of 350,000 has been mentioned, yet in the last two years the only argument has been about 900 applications, out of which 300 exclusions have been granted. That is all that has brought this about. It is therefore a travesty to say that this is a general exclusion. It is not.

The Minister also pleads lack of time. I understand that. On more than one occasion I virtually said that if he got stuck for time, the Opposition would facilitate the Bill provided that the Government got rid of the clause that removes security of tenure for 5 million council tenants. That offer was never taken up.

4.15 pm

In addition — it may not be his responsibility — between Third Reading in this House on 24 April and Second Reading in the House of Lords on 30 July, nothing whatever was done about the Bill. Therefore, there is no excuse for having left the Commitee and other stages of the Bill until November.

The Minister is right that many people are waiting for the new benefits — leaving aside the argument about security of tenure — that are available in the Bill. Many of them were promoted by the Opposition and redrafted by the Government. Many people and many local authorities will be waiting for the start of a new urban regeneration grant. Therefore, we do not seek to delay the Bill. The Government have chosen to give in to the Lords, even though they did not have to. They could have challenged the other place again, and, although they have chosen not to do so, they have made their decision in a way that is somewhat less than graceful.

As I said on Monday, I am under no illusions, and neither should any other hon. Member be. If local authorities act unreasonably, they should be condemned. The point is that the criteria under which they must act are set out more clearly in the amendment than previously to determine whether a property is particularly suitable for an elderly person. We are talking not about elderly people, but about properties that are particularly suitable for them. The means of deciding whether such properties are particularly suitable is to look at the list of factors in legislation that must be taken into account. If any local authority strays outside those factors, it will be acting unreasonably, and I and any other hon. Member concerned about fairness and justice will condemn it.

It is true that, at the end of the day, our constituents can have recourse to the courts. But, as I said on Monday, so far as I am aware the only reason for the House of Lords insisting on this a second time is that its previous attempts to achieve fairness were seen by the Secretary of State to operate unfairly.

The other place has made it clear that it does not trust the system that has operated hitherto — under which there was no opportunity to go to court on a test of unreasonableness. We gave examples where houses and bungalows designed and modified specifically for elderly people, and which met all the factors, were allowed to be sold even though Parliament decided otherwise. That is the problem, and that must be the reason why the House of Lords has insisted on going the whole way.

The Government have raised a deliberate red herring. There is no general threat to elderly people, even to those living in ground floor accommodation in a tower block. Unless such dwellings meet all the factors in law, elderly people will not be deprived of the right to buy.

The argument in the last two years has revolved around 900 applications and 300 exclusions. It is a travesty to talk about 350,000 dwellings, and it does the Minister no justice whatever.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): I agree with the Minister that alliance policy would indeed be disastrous for elderly people, particularly on Merseyside, which happens to include Knowsley, North. However, I assure him that my local councils — Lancaster city council and Wyre borough council, which I have the honour of sharing with my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Sir W. Clegg) — will administer these tests fairly, as they have always done, and my elderly constituents will not suffer.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I ought to point out that the amendment that was carried in the other place did not have narrow political support. Had that been so, it would not have been carried. In our discussion last Monday I pointed out that the original amendment had the support of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities — admittedly Labour-controlled — of the Association of District Councils, which is Conservative-controlled, and of all the professional bodies that are concerned with housing. The reason for that degree of all-party support is contained in the reason that the other place has given to the House of Commons for sticking to its guns.

The Lords reason says that, as the Bill left this House on Monday evening, it failed "to provide adequate safeguards for the stock of local authority rented accommodation specially suitable for people of pensionable age."

It is impossible for this House to dispute that assertion. When the number of elderly people is growing, it is absolutely essential to ensure that an adequate supply of good quality specifically purpose-designed accommodation is provided for them.

I accept the Minister's point that one has to be even-handed. We have to ensure that there is an adequate supply of rented accommodation. But we must also be as sure as we can that the elderly are not unreasonably deprived of their right to buy. I accept that on occasions it is difficult to achieve the correct balance, but the form of the legislation as it left the other place provides a reasonable compromise. The elderly will not be treated differently.

I accept that the Minister made a fair point when he said that we should not adopt a different attitude towards the elderly. Therefore, elderly council tenants who wish to buy should be treated in the same way as other council tenants who wish to buy. Tenants who wish to buy their homes but who believe that they are being treated unfairly or unreasonably by the local authority have the right to take advice and go to court. I do not think that elderly tenants who wish to buy their homes should be treated differently.

The Minister said that local authorities will abuse their position. Some local authorities may do so. In the light of experience, some local authorities will adopt a political view. However, it is hard for some hon. Members to accept that because certain local authorities dislike the right to buy they will act unpleasantly, unreasonably and unjustly for political motives.

We have been told that Ministers who are passionately in favour of the right to buy will act absolutely independently, impartially and justly, without any other motive than the reality and the justice of the case. But Ministers are politicians, too. They are motivated by political concerns. Because of what has happened in the past — the large number of sales and the way in which detailed issues have been dragged into the argument — we are entitled to be suspicious of the suggestion that Ministers are completely impartial and just.

My last point touches on what was said by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). The Minister seemed to be determined to make the worst of a bad situation. He ought to have been more gracious. The gap between us is not nearly so large as he tried to make out in his extremely political and antagonistic speech. He seems to have been told, "If you're going to go down, you'd better go down with all guns firing." The issue is not so important as to lead him to change his normal attitude towards these issues.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): The hon. Gentleman has referred to the gap between the two sides of the House on this issue. We have heard the point of view of the Social Democratic party. Will the hon. Gentleman be asking his Liberal colleague to put the point of view of his party?

Mr. Cartwright: The position of the two parties on housing for the elderly is exactly the same as the position of all those who serve on the organisations to which I referred, including members of the hon. Gentleman's own party who are represented on the Association of District Councils, and all the independent experts who are concerned with housing. The hon. Gentleman should not try to drag political red herrings across this point.

To return to the Minister's determination to extract the last bit of party politics that he can out of this issue, I am sorry that after six years of argument we have not achieved stability. We could have achieved stability on the basis of what was done by the other place, but we have been told that we shall face more uncertainty. At an unspecified future date, the Government intend to legislate again. Instead, therefore, of providing stability for the elderly, the Government have introduced a further threat. It is strange that, on an issue as sensitive as this, a Government of this complexion should be saying that the man in Whitehall knows best.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): It is rare that I should be congratulating the same Minister twice within the space of 48 hours. I hope that the Treasury Whip will note that. Having congratulated the Minister on Monday night for accepting an amendment that redefined homelessness, for reasons which the House accepted and which I do not intend to go into now, the Government's judgment in this respect also is absolutely sound. I expect that all right hon. and hon. Members have received letters from constituents who are anxious to benefit from one or other of the Bill's provisions. It would be wrong, therefore, to jeopardise even slightly the possibility of that legislation passing into law.

I admire my hon. Friend the Minister greatly, but I think that, although I heard what he said about the activities of a number of local authorities, he should look carefully at the way in which the legislation is used by local authorities. He should not prejudge what will happen. He may find that very few authorities are as mendacious as he may fear, in his heart of hearts, they may be, when confronted with this legislation. If very few authorities go against the spirit of the new Act, the House will not want further legislation on this issue. It will be left to my hon. Friend and the Government, as always, to introduce further legislation, should this turn out to be bad law, leading to abuse. Therefore, I ask my hon. Friend to keep an open mind.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): It is interesting that the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire), who takes a deep interest in housing matters, should have adopted a different line from a number of other Conservative Members. I assume that it is very different from the line that is taken by the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) who will no doubt be trying to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) said, the truth is that the Government have surrendered without any grace. In all the circumstances, the other place acted wisely and I have no regrets about the decision that it reached. It will be ironic if the more Right-wing Tories here urge their party to enter the next election with a platform of abolishing the House of Lords. It would be a new twist in British politics, one that we shall watch with considerable interest.

It was interesting to note that the Minister referred almost with contempt to local government and local democracy. He seems to have no confidence in local authorities, even perhaps Conservative-controlled local authorities, in this particular matter. It has already been said that if anybody thinks that a local authority has acted wrongly he can go to court. The ultimate judge, therefore, will not be the local authority. That should be clearly understood.

Many of the elderly constituents understandably want to live in bungalow-type accommodation, especially if it is adapted for use by the elderly. Due, in the main, to the Government's policy, no contracts for local authority housing of any kind in the borough of Walsall have been entered into since 1979. That means of course an ever-lengthening housing queue. If local authorities such as mine had been able to build the type of accommodation which we are discussing, I might have adopted a different attitude to this Lords amendment to which the Government have agreed.

What is important is not whether this type of accommodation should be sold to the sitting tenant, but that local authorities should be able to carry out their housing responsibilites as they did before 1979. Why should they not be able to build much more of this bungalow-type accommodation which is so urgently necessary and many other forms of accommodation, in view of lengthening waiting lists, the position on bed and breakfast accommodation and the scandal of homelessness? The Government have no authority to start lecturing local authorities. Local authorities are asking for the financial means and HIP allocations to carry out their housing responsibilities properly.

I welcome the amendment. It will help in a small way to protect some such accommodation from being sold and, because of Government policy which prevents local authorities from building, I have no regrets about that.

4.30 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): This debate takes place because of what occurred in another place at 23 minutes past 4 o'clock yesterday. There are nearly 1,200 Members of the other place. Yesterday by 148 votes to 124 the other place — [Interruption.] I am recounting the plain truth. It is characteristic of Opposition Members to quarrel with the truth, but I shall recount it. We are having this debate because of the decision in another place.

My hon. Friend the Minister advised the House that we should accept the view of another place and the issue which the House must decide is whether or not to accept that advice. You will have studied carefully, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I have done, the list of those who voted against the Government's advice in another place yesterday afternoon. There was a quarter of bishops—the Bishops of Carlisle, Ely, Rochester and Southwark — and the new recruit to the Social Democratic party, the Duke of Devonshire. They were joined by the former Prime Minister, beloved of Opposition Members, Lord Wilson of Rievaulx.

The view taken by another place was that it is wiser and safer for elderly people who wish to buy the homes in which they live to put their trust in local authorities, including Labour-controlled local authorities, than in my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister. That is the essential difference between the view taken by another place and the view taken by this House on Monday.

Mr. Dobson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gow: No, I shall not give way. I do not wish to make too long a speech or to be led astray by the hon. Gentleman.

Do we believe that the test whether a house or flat is particularly suitable as accommodation for an elderly person will be applied more fairly, impartially and reasonably by the Secretary of State or by certain Labour-controlled district and borough councils?

Mr. Rooker: What about judges?

Mr. Gow: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) says, "What about judges?" He is right that it will be open to an aggrieved tenant to go to court if he seeks to exercise the right to buy but is turned down by his district council on the grounds that the house or flat is especially suitable as accommodation for elderly people. But going to court is a costly and protracted business. It is simply not good enough to say to a tenant and prospective purchaser in that situation, "If you have a capricious, unreasonable, unfair local authority, all you need do is to go to the county court."

As I said in the debate on Monday, when all Secretaries of State and Ministers for Housing have been asked to determine whether a house or a flat falls within the criterion laid down by Parliament, they have taken that decision immensely seriously and have applied their minds conscientiously and fairly to that decision.

Mr. Dobson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gow: I said earlier that I would not give way.

The amendment that has been insisted on by another place will injure the prospects of fair treatment for elderly people who wish to buy their homes. My hon. Friend the Minister gave his advice to the House with great reluctance and I shall follow his advice with even greater reluctance. The other place is not nearly as closely in touch with the real world and with how matters operate in our constituencies. The other place, out of touch as I believe it to have been on this issue, with four right reverend prelates voting against — [HON. MEMBERS: "Divide the House."] I wish that hon. Gentlemen would listen instead of shouting.

Another place has failed to understand the world as it is. The four right reverend prelates and the noble Duke have not had direct experience, as some of us in this place and on this side of the House have had, of the wishes of elderly people, who should not be penalised simply because they are elderly. Nor have they understood the reality of the deep hostility of some Labour-controlled councils to the concept of the right to buy.

I welcome the assurance by my hon. Friend the Minister that at the first suitable legislative opportunity we shall seek to correct the error made by another place. With even greater reluctance than my hon. Friend, I shall acquiesce in the decision of another place.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): We have listened to two of the most ungracious speeches from the present and former Ministers for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction that can have been heard in either House since the legislation was introduced. It comes ill from the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), in the same speech, to complain first that there is a House of Lords making decisions when his party, above all, wants to continue it in its present form, and then that the House of Lords decides that it has more trust in the courts than in the Secretary of State. If the hon. Gentleman is willing to sustain the argument that the courts cannot be trusted, that is certainly a novel development in the Tory party.

Mr. Gow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: I will not give way.

Mr. Gow rose——

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: I will not give way. The hon. Lady has not given way to me on previous occasions.

This matter has come before Parliament as legislation on three occasions. In 1980, when the Government wished to apply similar right-to-buy rules to old people's dwellings as applied elsewhere, their Lordships passed an amendment which then came back to the Commons, and to which the Government proposed a variation that was then passed by this House. That new wording was returned to another place and their Lordships accepted it. Since then, my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), my hon. Friends the Members for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon), and, in another place, the noble Lord Wigoder, have argued that dwellings for old people should be examined with special care because of the relative shortage of such accommodation.

In 1984, in the Housing and Building Control Act, the Government again attempted to introduce the right to buy for that category of old people. The other place disagreed and passed an amendment which came back to the Commons and was overruled. On that occasion, my noble Friends Lord Evans and Baroness Stedman were part of the group in another place who insisted that they were right, and the Government were defeated by one vote. The Government then proposed a variation that was more accommodating to the views of another place, and it was eventually accepted.

The views and arguments of another place have not become any less strong since then. As my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) said, their Lordships made it clear that they rejected the Government's view because the Commons amendment failed to provide adequate safeguards for the stock of local authority rented accommodation specially suitable for people of pensionable age. Yesterday was the second occasion on which the issue was debated in another place. This time their Lordships insisted not by a majority of one but, with members of the Labour party, both alliance parties, the Conservative party and the Bishops' Bench — including my local bishop, the Lord Bishop of Southwark—by a majority of 24 that such accommodation needed to be protected.

The reason for such protection is simple. If there was anxiety in 1980 and 1984 about the stock for old people being depleted, there is more anxiety now as there is less stock, more old people and the constraints under which local authorities work are considerably greater.

Mr. Dobson: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that in coming to the conclusion that they would rather leave discretion with local authorities than with the Secretary of State their Lordships may have borne in mind the fact that the current Secretary of State for Environment, in his previous incarnation as Secretary of State for Transport, was more than once ruled by the courts of this land to have acted irrationally, unreasonably and unlawfully?

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Gentleman, a fellow London Member, is right. He, I and other hon. Members remember well that many of those matters related to the London Regional Transport Act 1984. There was great controversy over that because the Government originally insisted that there would be no concessionary passes for pensioners, but eventually they were forced to give in.

The arguments put in another place were overwhelming. I sincerely hope that the Government do as the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) suggested and are slightly more graceful and attentive to the arguments, the facts and the realities. I hope that they realise that if they are going to criticise the other place on anything, to criticise their Lordships on something that applies specifically to old people is perhaps inappropriate as, given their average age, their Lordships probably know more about the problems of old age than we do.

Their Lordships were very clear and the Government have, at the end of the day, accepted their decision. It would have been better if the Government had done their research and accepted the overwhelming arguments to protect the interests of old people in the first place. It cannot enhance the Government's prospects of recruiting millions of elderly people to their side when they are so ungracious in eventually accepting that old people's dwellings need special protection.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): I quite understand that my hon. Friend the Minister has come to this decision with a pistol at his head. Like my hon. Friends, I fully understand his genuine concern for the feelings of those who would be deprived of the benefits of the Bill if, because of a ping-pong match over this clause, it failed to become law.

However, I welcome what my hon. Friend said today about the possibility of bringing further legislation forward. Together with many of my hon. Friends, I believe that there will be plenty of examples of Socialist authorities looking for every chance to cheat old people out of the opportunity of buying their homes.

It is all very well for my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) to say that if only one or two authorities indulged in such behaviour it should not be necessary to bring legislation forward, but I take the opposite view. If the Conservative party is the party of one nation, the old people in Haringey and Brent deserve the same opportunity to buy their homes as the old people in Conservative-controlled local authorities.

4.45 pm

There are two arguments against the decision of the other place. The first relates to the question of unreasonableness. The example from Socialist authorities of direct labour organisations shows us the direction in which those authorities would go. The convenor of the Association of Direct Labour Organisations — Councillor Senior of Sheffield—said that they are trying to obstruct the law in every way that they can. That is what Socialist authorities are about. I would not put my faith in the reasonableness of Labour or alliance-controlled authorities.

The second major argument against their Lordships' position relates to the remedy. I do not suggest that the courts would be anything but impartial in their interpretation of the law. However, the point is not that they would be impartial, but that people would have to go to the courts in the first place. That would be a lengthy and expensive process. That fact would be used by Socialist authorities to intimidate and deter old people from taking advantage of the right to buy. Not only would those whom their Lordships intended should have that right be unable to buy their own houses, but many others would not attempt to do so through failure to understand where the line was drawn.

I am not surprised that the other place voted as it did. After all, the Peers concerned are all members of the landlord classes. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) reeled off a list of distinguished prelates, and we all know the faults of the Church Commissioners as landlords. He drew our attention to a noble Duke. Of course, the biggest racketeering landlords of all are the Socialist authorities, which have failed to provide service to their tenants and at the same time have sought every opportunity to deprive them of the one thing to which they have looked forward — an end to their serfdom by buying their council houses.

This is a black day for the old people who are tenants of local authorities. I look forward to a brighter day in the near future when my hon. Friend the Minister will bring forward fresh legislation that will enable us to fulfil old people's aspirations as we set out to do in the 1979 manifesto and the 1983 manifesto, and no doubt will in the next manifesto.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I apologise for having missed the earlier part of the debate, but I was elsewhere in the House.

This is a very black day for the constitution. The other place is ill-advised in its action. We have heard the merits of the issue which has been debated. It is the prerogative of the other place to send issues back to this House for reconsideration. I do not believe that it is the other place's prerogative — it is not democratically elected and I cannot foresee a way in which it could be—and nor is it right or proper for it to interfere with the rights of this elected Chamber to introduce proper legislation on the basis of a majority won in a general election.

Opposition Members might well take account of this issue in case they ever form the Government again, though

[Mr. Tony Marlow]

I doubt that they will. The Opposition should take account of what their Lordships have done on this issue and think what such action might do to some of their pet programmes that they wish to foist upon the nation. This is a black day, but every black day and every cloud has a silver lining. The silver lining is, I believe, that it will give yet more power to my hon. Friend's elbow to bring before the House next Session a further housing Bill. Such a Bill is vital and relevant and I look forward to it.

Mr. Rooker: By leave of the House, I should like to make two important points. Because of the extremely unfair and partisan way in which Conservative Members have approached the issue, they seem completely unaware that all over Britain dozens of Conservative-controlled district councils have expressed extreme unease about the way that the Government have operated the rules. Those councils have complained about the loss of housing stock that is especially suitable for the elderly. They are not talking just about general housing for the elderly, and it is not an issue that affects only Labour-controlled local authorities. It affects Conservative-controlled authorities as well, and Government Members would do well to take that on board.

My second point is that every other aspect of the right-to-buy legislation protects every citizen through recourse to the courts. That applies to everything save this one issue. Conservative Members should not say that the concept of going to the courts is rubbish because that remedy is available to most citizens, at any rate for all the rights protected by statute. What is so special about this one narrow issue that it has to be decided by ministerial prerogative? That case has been found wanting in the past.

We shall take on board the castigations delivered by the other place. I was careful in what I said on Monday about the other place because I did not want to upset the noble Lords. I and my hon. Friends share the view that because the noble Lords are not elected the other place is undemocratic. However, it is part of our constitution within which the Labour party seeks to work.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House doth not insist on its disagreement to the Lords amendment.

National Health Service (Amendment) Bill

Lords amendments considered.

New Clause

HEALTH AND SAFETY LEGISLATION

Lords amendment: No. 1, after clause 1, insert the following new clause—

"—(1) For the purposes of health and safety legislation—

(a) a health authority shall not be regarded as the servant or agent of the Crown, or as enjoying any status, immunity or privilege of the Crown; and

(b) premises used by a health authority shall not be regarded as property of or property held on behalf of the Crown.

(2) In this section—

"health authority"—

(a) as respects England and Wales, has the meaning assigned to it by section 128 of the 1977 Act; and

(b) as respects Scotland, means a Health Board constituted under section 2 of the 1978 Act, the Common Services Agency constituted under section 10 of that Act or a State Hospital Management Committee constituted under section 91 of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984; and

"the health and safety legislation" means—

(a) the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974 and the regulations, orders and other instruments in force under it; and

(b) the enactments specified in the third column of Schedule 1 to that Act and the regulations, orders and other instruments in force under those enactments.

(3) Section 125 of the 1977 Act and section 101 of the 1978 Act shall have no effect in relation to any action, liability, claim or demand arising out of the health and safety legislation.

(4) This section shall have no effect in relation to anything done or omitted before its commencement."

4.53 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to consider Lords amendment Nos. 5 and 7. I should inform the House that these amendments involve privilege.

Mr. Newton: In line with your indication, Mr. Deputy Speaker, of what is acceptable, I should like to speak to amendments Nos. 5 and 7. In doing so I hope to restore that happy sense of harmony and unanimity in the House in response to our dealings with another place. Those dealings were rudely sullied by those hon. Members who spoke on the Housing and Planning Bill. In this case I hope that there will be agreement between both sides of the House about what I am recommending — the warm acceptance of a number of amendments made in another place to some aspects of the Bill.

Amendment No. 1 is a new clause inserted in another place together with some tidying up amendments that were inserted by the Government towards the end of proceedings in another place. The amendment seeks to remove from health authorities Crown immunity in respect of health and safety legislation, in the same way as clause 1 of the original Bill removed it in respect of food legislation.

In its new form, it defines the health authorities affected and the legislation, but it does not contain regulation-making powers originally envisaged in the amendment moved in another place. That is simply because it turned out to be unnecessary to have such powers, as they are already available in the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974. The application of the clause in its broader form is limited to events occurring after its commencement and applies in the same way as clause 1 of the original Bill about food legislation.

We have taken a further significant step in the legislation about Crown immunity affecting health authorities. We have gone significantly beyond the original proposal which, as the House will recall, arose in the aftermath of the Stanley Royd hospital inquiry into the outbreak of food poisoning. We have gone significantly beyond the Government's decision at that time to remove Crown immunity from food legislation, and we accept the argument put forward in the other place that that removal should also apply to health and safety at work legislation.

It might have been more difficult to say that at a much earlier stage, but now it seems to be an entirely sensible move and I welcome it. It represents a concordat not just between this House and another place, but also between the Government and those Opposition Members who expressed anxiety about the position. It is a useful piece of further progress and I hope that it will receive enthusiastic or at least warm-hearted support from hon. Members on both sides of the House.

The other two amendments are technical. Amendment No. 5 provides for clause 1 in the food legislation and Lords amendment No. 1 in the health and safety legislation to commence operation three months after the date on which the Act is passed. That short delay is necessary to allow health authorities to be advised of the changes in the law and in working procedures and to enable them to undertake any necessary training. As will be readily apparent to hon. Members who have looked at amendment No. 7, it simply extends the long title of the Bill to reflect the insertion of the new clause on the wider removal of Crown immunity. It provides cover within the long title of the Bill for Lords amendment No. 1.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): This is a bad day for cockroaches, because it sees the extension of the health and safety legislation to all hospitals and properties of health authorities. This bad day for cockroaches comes about because the Government were outvoted in the other place. We are being asked to agree with the Lords in the said amendment. The Opposition certainly agree with the Lords because we earlier moved amendments on the same lines. We suggested them on Second Reading and moved amendments in Committee and on Report, but the Government used the Whips to vote them down. I suspect that we are happier supporting the amendment than are Ministers—or, perhaps I should say happier than their predecessors would have been had they remained in office long enough to carry out the duties being undertaken by the present Ministers.

It must be re-emphasised that hospitals are supremely dangerous places. They are full of germs and viruses, dangerous drugs and dangerous waste. Patients are especially susceptible to infection because they are ill and in need of special protection. The people who work in hospitals and people visiting patients need similar protection. Until the Lords exercised its force majeure, the Government did not intend to do anything to help. They intended to keep Crown immunity for health and safety offences and they lifted it only from kitchens. That was a daft compromise because the well-informed cockroach faced with the Government proposal could simply move from the kitchen to the operating theatre in order to be in a safer environment.

Crown immunity has never been advocated in order that there should be more prosecutions. Nobody is enthusiastic about lawyers making money out of this proposition. Personally, I am not enthusiastic about lawyers making money out of anything. But the object of the exercise is that the threat of prosecution should force health authorities to take their obligations more seriously. The Association of Environmental Health Officers sent the DHSS a report on 1,000 hospital kitchens that had been inspected. Apparently, 60 per cent. of them, more than 600, had been in breach of regulations, and 97 of them would have been prosecuted if that power had been in the hands of the proper authorities.

But we are now going beyond kitchen hygiene, to applying the full rigours of the law on health and safety. The Government were very complacent in claiming that the law was operating even though prosecutions were not possible. Lord Young sent a letter to Mr. David Basnett, then general secretary of the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union, on 27 November 1985, which said:

"The Commission tell me that the Health and Safety Executive have looked carefully into the eight cases which you put forward relating to the operation of the Health and Safety at Work Act 1974. In three of these cases, the Executive were unable to substantiate your evidence. Two of these involved alleged exposure to asbestos. They did confirm however that in four of the five cases the Health and Safety Executive would have prosecuted under the Act were it not for Crown immunity."

That suggests that when that union sent a list of eight cases, 50 per cent. of even that small number would have resulted in prosecutions if that possibility had existed.

I do not want to detain the House, but certain points now need to be put to Ministers, as we are for the first time facing the extension of health and safety legislation. The extension of the power to prosecute and the necessary response from health authorities will cost a lot of money. It was estimated that it would cost £600,000 to do up the kitchens at the Stanley Royd hospital to a proper standard. The health authority across the river estimates that it would cost no less than £1·5 million to do up the kitchens at St. Thomas's hospital. But these figures refer merely to applying the food hygiene legislation. In the time available, we have not had an opportunity to obtain estimates on how much it will cost health authorities to meet the health and safety legislation. But it is clear that it will cost tens of millions of pounds, in addition to the £100 million or so for extending the food hygiene legislation.

Before deciding whether to support the amendment, we need to know whether the Government have estimated the costs that will arise from it. If so, what additional funds do the Government propose to provide to health authorities so that they can protect themselves from prosecution? It is no good any Minister, new or old, saying that such a sum will be allowed for in next year's Estimates, so that hon. Members will not be able to indentify it. Similarly, Ministers cannot say that it is all right, because that spending has already been allowed for in this year's allocation. This legislation has only just come from the other place, but it will be implemented in this financial year.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): We are, of course, looking at clause 2, which refers not so much to kitchens as to other Health Service premises such as laboratories. Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the large sums spent by many health authorities in the 1970s as a result of the Howie report on laboratory conditions? The health authority that I served on was obliged to spend a lot of money on bringing laboratories up to very high standards.

Mr. Dobson: Perhaps some health authority laboratories are of a high standard, but not long ago I was told by the consultant in charge of the laboratories at Worcester royal infirmary that the place was full of dangerous pathogens which were a threat to the staff, and that they broke practically every health and safety regulation in the land. Indeed, he subsequently resigned because he was so perturbed about it. Hospitals consist of much more than laboratories, and there are many places within hospitals that have come nowhere near meeting the requirements of the health and safety legislation.

If the amendment is accepted, the legislation will come into operation on 5 or 6 February 1987, which is in this financial year. Health authorities will break the law if they do not put right before then anything that is wrong now. I know that clause 1(8) says but if the law is not being complied with on the day that this part of the Bill comes into operation, the law will be broken. Health authorities will be open to prosecution for anything wrong from that day onwards.

"This section shall have no effect in relation to anything done or omitted before its commencement",

What efforts have Ministers or their predecessors made to ensure that the 97 kitchens that would have been open to prosecution according to the list submitted by the AEHO are brought up to standard? Have Ministers guaranteed those health authorities earmarked funds in order to meet the requirements before 5 or 6 February? If not, can the Minister be joined as a defendant if the health authority is prosecuted? After all, Ministers will have knowingly failed to allocate the sums necessary to ensure that health authorities comply with the law.

Perhaps Ministers are still covered by Crown immunity, even if health authorities are not. If Ministers do not come up with the funds, it may be to their advantage to be covered by Crown immunity, because any sensible health authority would attempt to join them in defending any action. What will the impact be on all those shifty private contractors who moved into the cleaning business? All over the country official reports produced by the health authorities who were forced to bring in those contractors have mentioned substandard cleaning targets and have said that targets have not been met. In one month last year Office Cleaning Services at Addenbrooke's hospital approached only 65 per cent. of the target standard of cleanliness in the operating theatres there. The truth is that standards have declined as privatisation has increased. The reports produced by health authorities provide evidence of that all over the country.

Health authorities that fall foul of the health and safety legislation as a result of contractors being imposed on them by ministerial fiat along with lower standards, because Ministers are not providing the necessary funds, will no doubt wish to join Ministers in defending any action brought against them by the Health and Safety Executive.

I congratulate all those involved in the campaign to remove Crown immunity. Ministers stood out against this sensible proposition, but it is now acknowledged as being eminently sensible by the new Minister. The Health Service trade unions conducted a long campaign. In recent years, the AEHO also played a major part in the campaign as did the Royal College of Nursing and the British Medical Association.

I pay particular tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) for his constant harassment of Ministers, and anyone else in his sights. Agreement is almost universal that Crown immunity should be lifted in full. We in the House of Commons should have made the decision ourselves. That would have led to a more efficient use of parliamentary time. It should have been accepted when first put forward. We won the arguments but lost the votes. Now it looks as though we shall win the votes as well.

On a sad and serious note: but for the outbreak of salmonella poisoning and the deaths which followed at Stanley Royd hospital, none of these changes would have been proposed by the Government. One of my hon. Friends lost a relative in that outbreak. Nothing can bring back those who died, but many of the people involved will gain some satisfaction from the thought that as a result of what happened measures are, at long last, being taken which should reduce the possibility of another such outbreak.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): The Minister for Health made as good a job as possible out of a very weak case. He tried to assert that the Government are in favour of the proposed amendments, although any reading of the debates in another place shows that only a few weeks ago the Government were against the amendments. Ministers spoke out very strongly indeed against them. The Minister tried to put his best face on it. My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) has just made a powerful speech in which he made a number of points that must be answered. I hope that the Minister for Health, or his sidekick, will respond.

For all the diplomacy shown by the Minister — he should go to the Foreign Office — this is the one hundredth crippling and embarrassing defeat for the Government. It is a significant defeat. The amendments are a landmark in the battle to erase Crown immunity from the face of all establishments where it now reigns. The Government's acceptance of the amendments is very reluctant.

Cash must now be found. The Minister's speech must be followed by the provision of abundant money. These are not cheap amendments. They will cost many millions of pounds. We cannot prevent accidents and protect the safety of Health Service workers for nothing.

The campaign began with John Edmonds of the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union and the deputation which I took to the Secretary of State for Employment on 18 June 1985. Since then early-day motions and parliamentary questions have been tabled. The Minister said that the amendments go further than the original proposition. He is not quite right. My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras has played a leading part in the campaign and will agree that throughout we have always demanded the removal of both food hygiene and health and safety regulations from Crown immunity. We were all disappointed that only kitchens were included at the beginning. That was the thin end of the wedge. We have made it clear that we are seeking wide extension of the removal of Crown immunity. The bodies involved in the campaign include the environmental health officers, the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union, the British Medical Association and the Royal College of Nursing. Their efforts laid the basis for success.

5.15 pm

If anyone doubts the need for the change he should check parliamentary answers, which show a 20-fold difference in the incidence of health and safety enforcement notices between Crown and non-Crown premises. That shows the need for the amendments.

It is imperative that the new law be enforced. The quota system for disabled workers is often not enforced. The Minister knows that, as a former Minister responsible for the disabled. We shall fight to ensure that this new law is enforced because if it is not it will be brought into disrepute. We give notice to the Government that when the amendments are accepted and the Bill enacted we shall demand enforcement of the law.

Although the proposed change goes further than the Government originally accepted, it is only the beginning. Much more remains to be done. Even when the Bill is enacted, over 10,000 Government premises will still be protected by Crown immunity from food and hygiene regulations and from health and safety regulations.

We want the removal of Crown immunity to be extended to such places as prisons, defence establishments, Department of Health and Social Security offices and Ministry of Defence kitchens.

A fortnight ago I visited the forces in West Germany and I pay tribute to what the Ministry of Defence is doing, but I want Crown immunity to be removed from Ministry of Defence kitchens. I shall press for that. This anachronism should be swept away.

This is only the second step. The first step was kitchens. The second step is these amendments. We shall press for the new law to be implemented and then we shall press for the law to be extended to all the areas which I have mentioned.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I agree with the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) that the amendments are only the first step. I endorse what the Government have done and I warmly welcome the extension of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act provisions. I agree with the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South that we should now consider some other opportunities to remove Crown immunity. Initially I was not prepared to be as ambitious as the right hon. Gentleman, although I agree with him in principle.

I have looked at reports of the debates in the other place relating to the amendment and the extension of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. I was concerned that the health and safety at work provisions covering waste, medical, nursing, dental, veterinary, pharmaceutical and other practices, as well as human and animal tissue, excretions, drugs, medical and medicinal products, swabs, dressings and similar items, are included and are therefore changed in so far as the amendment affects the Bill.

What worries me is that large areas with a slightly wider extension start to impinge on the provisions of the Control of Pollution Act 1974. Some of the latter overlap the provisions of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. Debates in another place on the amendment suggested to me that the noble Lord Ennals, who introduced the amendment, thought in his original drafting that the conclusions of the 11th report of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution, asking for a review of wider issues such as incineration, fencing and other matters relating more directly to pollution, would be covered by the amendment. However, from a strict reading of the amendment and the Bill, I understand that unhappily, that will not happen as a result of the Government's acceptance of the amendment. I ask the Government to look at that and to reconsider the recommendations of the 11th report of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution as soon as possible.

However, I welcome the amendment unreservedly as a step forward. I should also like to underline the comments of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). It would be remiss if the House did not cross-examine the Minister a little more about how he and his Department will cope with the undoubtedly increased demands, whether financial or administrative, which have been visited upon them. I accept that they may not have been able to work out the fine detail of the circulars and the guidance that they will give, but the Minister is obliged to give us a little more information about how he proposes to implement the Bill, and what will happen in practice in February next year when the provisions start to bite.

References were made in the other place to newspaper reports that a certain amount of leeway would be allowed to health authorities in that replies could be made within 28 days, and that they would be able to plead poverty as a defence against proceedings or notices that may be raised against them. The Minister should comment on that because it concerns my hon. Friends and me. The costs of implementing the provision may well be substantial but they must be faced.

Another difference between the noble Lord Ennals' proposals and our discussions this afternoon is the inclusion in the noble Lord's amendment affecting regulation powers. Those powers have been deleted in the amendment. The Minister may be able to tell us that perfectly adequate provisions exist under present legislation and that, therefore, the regulation powers are not necessary. I hope that that is the case, and that the Government are not trying in some way to emasculate the Lords amendment.

Mr. Newton: Perhaps I can clear up that point by a brief intervention. The hon. Gentleman may have missed what I said when opening the debate. The powers had been left out, as they were already contained in the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978.

Mr. Kirkwood: I am grateful to the Minister. I suspected that that was the case and apologise if I did not catch the Minister's earlier remarks.

The general thrust of the amendment is acceptable to us. It is the first stage in what I hope the Minister will accept as a continuing march towards a more open and less protectionist environment within which Government Departments operate. I warmly endorse what the Government are doing and they are supported in this by myself and my right hon. and hon. Friends

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): My right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) commented in passing—I think that all hon. Members will pay tribute to him for his work on this matter—that the Government have come, rather reluctantly, to this position. I can tell my right hon. Friend that there is more joy in heaven over one sinner coming to repentance than over 99 who need no repentance.

My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) made a powerful speech. The amendment is really a long-stop. The points made by my hon. Friends underline the fact that by removing Crown immunity a situation arises where, if things go wrong, a penalty will be incurred. However, things ought not to go wrong. I am pleased that we have at least got this far. It used to be possible for employees to gain severe damages in the courts if their ears had been damaged because of inadequate controls over the level of decibels to which they were subjected. It was not until heavy damages were awarded by a court against a company that there was a tremendous change in the level of decibels allowed under Common Market legislation, and also in the way in which the problem was dealt with in this country.

I rejoice that it is a long-stop. However, the amendment should concentrate the minds of authorities, administrators and, under the Griffiths arrangements, the new general managers a little more upon the important points made regarding the health and safety of people in hospitals.

A case in point is hepatitis B, which was such a disaster in renal dialysis units and which led to deaths of nurses in Edinburgh. Without the provision that we are now discussing, authorities have tightened up, and safety procedures are automatically in place in renal dialysis units. This means that the incidence of hepatitis B has been virtually eliminated. However, the danger is there and the fact that the new amendment will enable the regulations to be tightened up will be of some value.

My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras referred to the damage caused by privatisation. When the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Services inherited the file from her predecessor, she will have seen long correspondence from me about what happened when Crothalls and Pritchards were the cleaners at Westminster hospital. She will also have received the report by the Riverside health authority. I hate to bring personal matters into this, but my wife was the unfortunate person who had to scrub out the lavatory because it was unhygienic. Nothing concentrates a Member of Parliament's mind upon cleanliness more than having to take into a hospital the necessary cleaning equipment to ensure that infection does not set in. Sadly, I have to report that on a second operation my wife got a further infection from precisely the same origin. The nurses and all the staff concerned naturally had sterilised gloves and instruments, but the bath and toilet facilities were rife with infection.

With privatisation monitoring is very loose. Previously a ward sister was in charge of her ward and was the captain of a tight ship. As a result of privatisation, she has to go through a number of procedures in relation to cleanliness, food and laundry before she can obtain satisfaction and the right standards of cleanliness.

Following the acceptance of this excellent additional safeguard, will the Minister look at the mechanisms whereby we can arrive at a position where Crown immunity will not have to be dispensed with because problems will not arise? At the moment, the proverbial coach and horses can be driven through the method of monitoring cleanliness in public places, wards and out-patients' departments. That applies in particular to geriatric hospitals, where the problem of incontinence arises and laundry is put out to outside contractors who do not have the same standards as a hospital hygiene officer.

In the light of this debate, those procedures should be revamped and revised. As a good Labour party member for more years than I care to remember, I never thought that I would thank the good Lord for the House of Lords. However, as in so many cases these days, we are most grateful for what happens in the other place, which enables the Government to concentrate their minds on a reform that has been long overdue.

5.30 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): On Second Reading of the National Health Service (Amendment) Bill, which followed a Bill that had been sponsored by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and others, including myself, we were given some dispensation over Crown immunity as a result of the outbreak of food poisoning at the Stanley Royd hospital, Wakefield. On Second Reading, some of us, including myself, suggested that it would be helpful if that immunity were extended to hospital premises and activities other than those purely in respect of food poisoning. It seemed clear that it would be difficult to determine where an outbreak had begun and ended, to make sure that people were properly and consistently protected, and that the Crown could not fall back on what in the event would turn out to be a spurious immunity. We wanted further protection for the patients in a given hospital.

In my constituency of Stafford we had the terrible tragedy of legionnaires disease which caused the death of 37 people. The cause of that has been partially reported on by a public inquiry for which I called and which I was delighted the Government agreed to set up. During the course of that inquiry it became apparent that there was defective machinery and that cooling towers needed to be replaced. They have now been replaced and for that we are extremely grateful to the Minister, the Government and the regional health authority. That has, so far as can be judged, ensured that such a tragedy will not recur in my constituency.

On one occasion I was sitting with members of the press who had gathered for a press conference. Although they did not know it at the time, every person in the room—representatives from virtually every newspaper in Britain—was liable to catch legionnaires disease because at that time nobody knew the cause of the outbreak. Therefore, there was a serious risk to a large number of people.

I welcome the amendment. I appreciate that the scope of the Bill precludes the extension of the abolition of Crown immunity to matters outside NHS hospitals. I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister for not being here when he opened the debate. I regret that I was caught up in another meeting. However, I feel strongly that these provisions are of great importance. They go a long way to removing, for practical purposes, many of the difficulties that can arise in hospitals. The health and safety legislation is extremely broad. It covers a wide range of activities. As time goes on, it will be discovered that the amendment goes a lot further than many people may have thought in the first instance.

In 1978, the Health and Safety Executive wrote a report on Crown immunity and required the Government to abolish Crown immunity in a wide range of matters. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister is well aware of that report. However, we are dealing here with the NHS and the Government have properly gone as far as they can in this legislation. I congratulate Ministers, not only on what the Government have done in respect of this legislation, but on their many achievements since they took office.

I should particularly like to thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary for coming to Stafford recently to see the hospital in action in the aftermath of the terrible rail crash tragedy on the outskirts of Stafford. Many people in that hospital expressed deep appreciation for the time and care that she spent, which helped enormously to restore confidence in the hospital in the aftermath of the legionnaires tragedy.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): The hon. Gentleman must get the record right. First, it is not the Government who have seen the light. That was forced upon them by the other place. Secondly, the hon. Gentleman might care to explain why he voted against the Bill on Report.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman is making a fairly cheap point. At that time we had every reason to suppose that we had gone a long way towards achieving the principle of the abolition of Crown immunity in respect of health authority legislation. The reality is that at that time we had got as much out of the Government as we had hoped for. We wanted more. We expected that in due course we would get more, and in private discussions it was suggested that we might well get more. Therefore, it would have been churlish at that point not to have accepted what was on offer.

The hon. Gentleman may be prepared to concede, if he is good enough to look at my speech on Second Reading, that I called for an extension of the abolition of Crown immunity. Furthermore, that was taken up by the House of Lords and the provisions that we are discussing today mirror exactly the provisions for which I called, which were as much as could have been provided for within the scope of the Bill. I have no reason whatever to complain, and it is churlish of the hon. Gentleman to deny the Government credit for accepting the amendment. We are used to reasonable debating points and I do not deny the hon. Gentleman credit for trying to make one, but the trouble is that he is failing.

The real point here is that the Government are already in a dialogue with the other place on the consideration of Lords amendments. I was a member of the Committee which considered 589 amendments to the Financial Services Bill and it is by no means unusual for the Government to be given credit for accepting amendments.

Mr. Maxton: Does the hon. Gentleman seriously believe that if the other place had considered the Bill three months ago, which would have given the Government time to return to the House with the clause that we are now considering and still have time to reject it and return it to the other place before prorogation, it would not have rejected it?

Mr. Cash: My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has been congratulated on allowing sufficient time to enable the Government to see the wisdom of the amendment. The Government deserve to be congratulated on the way in which they have dealt with this matter.

The problem of viral hepatitis was raised quite properly by the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt). When the application of the exemptions to health and safety legislation are fully understood, having regard to section 4 of the 1974 Act, it will be appreciated that it is not confined to matters such as viral hepatitis B, which is a serious disease, and embraces the problems of AIDS. The Minister may or may not wish to comment at this stage, but he will know that there is an early-day motion in my name and the names of about 90 other hon. Members of all parties that calls for better provision for education about AIDS through television.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Question is whether the House should accept the amendment.

Mr. Cash: Indeed, Mr Deputy Speaker. Where matters were to arise in which AIDS was known to have been transmitted within the context of the health and safety legislation—in other words, there being grounds under the 1974 Act for someone to sue the Crown because AIDS had been contracted—I believe that the Bill's provisions would be of considerable benefit to any potential litigants.

Mr. Dobson: Surely people have always been able to bring civil actions against health authorities, or any part of the NHS, in circumstances which might result in death or illness.

Mr. Cash: I am not disputing that there are circumstances in which a person would be able to set up a claim for damages where AIDS or any other disease had been transmitted through the use of facilities of an NHS hospital. I am saying that the basis on which it could be done is being widened. It is extremely important that the public should know that the Government are dealing with the problem of AIDS, among other things, extremely seriously. I think that I have dealt sufficiently with the issues that I wish to raise, and I wish finally to congratulate Ministers on everything that they have done to ensure that the Bill is enacted.

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): I shall take only a few minutes of the time of the House. I wish to contribute to the debate because I spoke on Second Reading and I was a member of the Committee which considered the Bill. In Committee I argued the case for the extension of clause 1 into other areas. I was interested to learn how the Government could continue to prop up a system that is logically indefensible, and it seems that they have sought to make virtue out of necessity. When I read the final speech of defence from the Government's spokesman in another place, Baroness Trumpington, I noticed that she fell back on the argument that the voluntary procedures had worked well over the years. Indeed, the Crown notice system has worked well, and from the system's inception about 330 notices have been issued. In every instance there was ready compliance and none of them had to be referred to the Secretary of State.

5.45 pm

I have no sympathy with anyone who would wish to resist the amendment and I have some sympathy with one or two of the remarks that were made in another place. Since the health and safety at work legislation was placed on the statute book, there has been accumulated a good deal of experience of putting safety legislation into operation in hospitals throughout the country. When I telephoned East Anglia this morning to brief myself on what is happening in the area, I was pleased to learn that the local health authority has become much more safety-conscious in recent years. This is because shop stewards and management have worked hard to identify and pinpoint matters of concern. In so doing they have eradicated many of the problems, and that is an encouraging feature to note. Much hard work has been done thoughout the country.

About 96 per cent. of the speech which I prepared will have to be abandoned, to my relief as well as everyone else's, because of what has transpired. I constructed an elaborate argument which I called Morton's fork. It went something like this: if the situation is serious, the Government will have to do something about it because it is serious; if there has been a good deal of improvement, it will not cost the Government very much to act accordingly, so they can very well take the appropriate action.

I do not think that there will be a rush of litigation. I discern that there is much good will on the part of those who are involved in the problems that we are discussing. Tribute should be paid to trade unions and management for the way that they have co-operated in many areas. I conclude by saying that the Minister's statement at the beginning of the debate should be welcomed in all parts of the House.

Mr. Newton: I am pleased that the debate is coming towards its end in slightly happier terms than when it was introduced by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) at the outset. I hesitate to describe the manner of his introductory remarks as his characteristic charm. They contained a degree of abrasiveness which I thought went beyond the tone that I had hoped to set in introducing the debate on behalf of the Government.

The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) must be one of the most reasonable of hon. Members—I hope that this will not be a killer blow to him—on both sides of the House. I can see from the expression of Labour Members that that is regarded as a fatal charge. In an important respect, the hon. Gentleman has given the answer to some of the rhetoric of a rather routine character with which the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras sought to embellish his speech. He suggested, for example, that the problem is yet another one that can be solved only by the Government finding a large and unspecified sum to be thrown at it.

The Government's view is exactly that which was set out in the concluding remarks of the hon. Member for Ipswich. No one can pretend that everything is perfect —if it were, we would not be bothering to have this debate — but there is no reason to doubt that most health authorities have responded to the pressures of the Crown notice system and successive waves of guidance and have made substantial progress towards improving the position that obtained a decade ago. If that were not the position, and if I were to respond to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras in the terms he used, I should be tempted to ask what the previous Labour Government thought they were doing in 1977 when they allowed cockroaches, to take up the hon. Gentleman's phrase, to continue having their field day for another decade without seeking to take the action that is now being urged.

Mr. Dobson rose—

Mr. Cash rose—

Mr. Newton: I shall give way first to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash).

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that the report which was produced by the Health and Safety Executive in 1978 came at a time when the then Labour Government could have taken the appropriate action, which they refused to do?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend reinforces my argument. Out of courtesy, I should let the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras have his say.

Mr. Dobson: I cannot expect the Minister to plough through the previous debates on this matter but, had he done so, he would have noted that my view is that the Labour Government were wrong in their judgment at the time. They introduced what they regarded as an improvement in the system, which, until this year, the present Government regarded as adequate. Ministers are on record as saying so, despite mounting evidence that it was not satisfactory. That mounting evidence was not available to the last Labour Government, although I think that they misjudged the matter at the time.

Mr. Newton: In view of the entirely generous acknowledgement by the hon. Gentleman of his views of the action of the Labour Government, I do not wish to pursue this point further. We are now back on the track that I hoped we could have stayed on. We all now recognise that in certain important respects, of which the most obvious was food legislation — we have now extended acceptance to health and safety legislation — the previous situation could not be regarded as entirely satisfactory. It is right to have made these moves. They are now represented in the combination of what the Government put into the Bill in the first place and what they have accepted in response to continuing pressure, including that in the other place in the past few days, which I put before the House at the outset in welcoming terms.

There was a reference to repenting sinners in one of the more jocular contributions to the debate. Neither my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland—the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang)—whom I should not wish to call a sinner in any case, nor I can conceivably be described as sinners in this context because we were metaphorically unborn at the time.

Mr. Dobson: The first words of the financial memorandum of the Bill, as originally published in April this year, state:

"Clause 1 had no implications for public expenditure."

The Bill as drafted did not extend the lifting of Crown immunity to health and safety legislation as a whole. Does the Minister still say that the rigorous application of health and safety legislation and the liability to prosecution will not cost a penny? That is what the Bill states.

Mr. Newton I am saying no more than was said by the hon. Member for Ipswich in the last speech from the Back Benches.

Mr. Dobson: My hon. Friend did not say that no extra money was needed.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Member for Ipswich specifically referred to health and safety legislation rather than to food legislation. He said that as a result of the activities of trade unions, to which he rightly paid tribute, and the seriousness with which the 1977 changes had been taken by health authorities, substantial progresss had been made in respect of health and safety requirements. It is on that basis that I, too, wish to say that there is no reason to suppose——

Mr. Dobson: My hon. Friend did not say that no extra money was needed.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Member for Ipswich specifically expressed doubt whether large sums of money were needed, on the basis that he thought that significant progress had already been made. In that respect, there is total unanimity between the hon. Member for Ipswich and myself from the neighbouring county of Essex. That is our view of the position.

Mr. Kirkwood: I wonder whether we could put the question the other way around. Supposing an unforeseen problem arises and money is required to comply with the provisions of the new amendment. What view will the Government take? Does the Department expect the local health authority, whatever it may be and in whatever context it finds itself, to find the money from its existing budget?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will understand that I am not prepared to be drawn into speculation about hypothetical situations of that kind beyond saying that, in the Government's view, the amount of money spent on the National Health Service ought reasonably be expected to be sufficient to ensure reasonably clean kitchens and reasonably safe working practices. In the first instance, should a problem of that kind occur, we would expect it to be examined by the district health authority — if necessary, in co-operation or discussion with the regional health authority—before it was suggested that the only way in which it could be overcome was by some further substantial sum of public money being found.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) referred to the Control of Pollution Act 1974. He has sought to raise this point in various ways, and I recognise that it might be worthy of consideration in the longer term. He will understand that we have sought in a pragmatic way to meet those problems which had clearly been revealed as carrying a degree of urgency and proper public concern and to respond to continuing discussion in both House about other aspects. None of that rules out further changes in future. Equally, I must say, for the benefit of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire and the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), that it cannot be taken as committing us to further changes in the future, still less to my committing my colleagues in other Departments to a certain view of parallel problems. I note the point raised by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire. I do not dismiss it out of hand, but it is manifestly not a matter with which we can deal by further legislative change at this stage.

The hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) urged us to ensure that the mechanisms for avoiding any consequences arising from the removal of Crown immunity in these respects are applied. I agree with him. Indeed, one point that did not emerge during this debate —it lent a slightly artifical flavour to some comments is that it was clear from the Stanley Royd inquiry that the primary failure was that of hospital management to manage well. Whether we have Crown immunity or no Crown immunity, Crown notice systems or local environmental health officers crawling all over the place, if management is not equipped to manage hospitals properly, whether in respect of catering or cleaning, things will go wrong.

One thing that I hope will unite all hon. Members is the need —we all expect that these proposals will create a little pressure — for good quality management of the provision of these services and the application of proper standards, whatever the law may be. We are seeking to achieve that by a variety of means.

Mr. Ashley: Although the Minister said that he could not commit himself to further legislation, may we take it that he would be favourably disposed to extending the abolition of Crown immunity?

Mr. Newton: The right hon. Gentleman and I have known each other long enough to know the terms in which we conduct these exchanges. I will not attempt further to interpret for him the demeanour I have sought to show at the Dispatch Box. I shall leave him to draw his own conclusions from the way in which I have approached the subject.

Mr. Pavitt: The Minister, when responding to a comment I made, said that the mechanisms should be applied. That is not the point I made. My point was that the present mechanisms are inadequate. I asked him to revise the mechanisms in the light of the new situation that has developed in the past three years. I asked the Minister to look at the mechanisms and at the gap between present monitoring in certain areas in the ward and possible monitoring to ensure that the mechanisms are effective.

Mr. Newton: Essentially, the hon. Gentleman described in different terms what I meant by management. It is a responsibility of management to ensure that proper standards, and in particular those standards required by legislation, are applied. That process sometimes involves monitoring—it can involve various processes—but it is certainly a responsibility and function of management. If management is not operating well, we shall not achieve the objective. I do not think there is anything between the hon. Gentleman and myself on this point.

I regret that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford was not present when the debate started and that my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) was not able to be here either. Now that they are present, I am able to pay tribute to the part they played in this argument over many months. I express my gratitude to them and to other hon. Members on both sides of the House for the way in which they have welcomed the proposals in their different ways, even if they have not entirely congratulated the Government on the proposals that we hope will shortly become law.

Question put and agreed to. [Special Entry.]

Clause 2

PHARMACEUTICAL SERVICES

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 4, line 27, at end insert—

"(5) The regulations shall be so framed as to preclude—

(a) a person included in a list published under subsection (2)(a) above; and

(b) an employee of such a person; from taking part in the decision whether an application such as is mentioned in subsection (2)(c) above should be granted or an appeal against such a decision brought by virtue of subsection (4) above should be allowed.".".

6 pm

Mr. Newton: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 3.

Mr. Newton: I think that the House is familiar with the background to the amendments in terms of the Government's general propositions on changes in pharmacy contract arrangements and the provisions in the original Bill. The amendments reflect the further consideration of views expressed in another place on the right role for contractor pharmacists, both in family practitioner sub-committees which will make decisions on applications for new NHS pharmacy contracts and in the bodies which will hear any appeals against those decisions. The effect of the amendments is to confine the right to take decisions on new pharmacy contract applications to those members of sub-committees or appeal body members who are not already in possession of, or employees benefiting from, an existing NHS pharmacy contract.

I should say in making clear this change in the decision-making process—the voting position—that we are not intending or suggesting in the amendments any alteration in the size of the sub-committee or the appeal body, which in both cases will remain at six members plus a lay chairman. There will be three non-pharmacist members and three pharmacy members, of whom one should be a non-contractor pharmacist. However, the two contractor pharmacists will now play only an advisory role. They will not vote on applications and, indeed, will be required to withdraw from the proceedings before the sub-committee or the appeal body reaches its decision on the application.

The third of the three pharmacy members, at both levels, who will not be an existing contract holder, will be appointed from a list of nominees provided by the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain—as the ethical body for the whole profession—from branches of the profession other than community pharmacy. I must make it clear that the amendments do not preclude that third pharmacist — the non-contractor pharmacist — from having a vote or from taking part in the final decision on applications. As my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State made clear in the other place, the Government will consider further whether it would be right for this third non-contractor pharmacist to be purely advisory or whether he or she should be part of the decision-taking membership. We shall make an appropriate provision one way or the other in the regulations to be made under this clause once the Bill is enacted.

I hope that on this rather tangled subject I shall carry the House with me in recognising that the amendments placed in the Bill in the other place by the Government meet a major anxiety expressed not only in the other place but in this place at certain earlier stages of the proceedings to exclude from actual decisions on new applications for contracts those who, whether rightly or wrongly, might be thought to have a vested interest in the outcome. We have concluded in the light of consideration that this is the right course and that the decision-making structure which we now envisage will fairly reflect the interests of local communities in the provision of new NHS pharmacy services and a pharmacy in its wider professional sense. Contractor pharmacists will remain involved to offer advice from their own perspective on local pharmaceutical needs. That advice will no doubt be seen as important and valuable, but contractor pharmacists will not, in the end, be able to take part in the actual decisions that are made once that advice has been given.

I should like to make clear our intentions towards regulations. We intend to clarify the composition of the FPC sub-committees and the appeal bodies which will deal with applications for new pharmacies. In the first place, we intend to exclude dispensing doctors from partipation, for reasons which I think will be obvious. Secondly, we intend to ensure that no more than one of the three non-pharmacy voting member positions can be filled by any single family practitioner committee contractor profession other than pharmacy. In other words, we intend to make sure that no more than one of those places can be filled by, for example, a non-dispensing doctor or a dentist. The aim is to ensure that the interests of the consumer will be still further strengthened and that the withdrawal of the contractor pharmacists' votes will not create a problem of balance between the different contracting professions. We seek a fairly delicate balance, as I suspect any hon. Member who has ever had cause to look into this problem will realise, and we think that we have probably got it about right in these proposals. I would not wish to pretend that I think that that view will be unanimously held by all those concerned with this difficult matter.

Mr. Weetch: If, in the course of time, this elaborate structure which the Minister has built up is found not to work or to work in an unsatisfactory way, will he not hesitate to intervene again, identify the problem and put it right at a later stage?

Mr. Newton: In the light of my experience of this subject in the past two months since I became Minister for Health, I can certainly say that I should hesitate to intervene again, but I say that in a slightly jocular spirit. Of course, if it turned out that these arrangements did not fulfil the objectives set for them or in some way they proved unsatisfactory, I would be prepared, as one who is, I hope, a reasonably sensible and pragmatic man, to look at them again. We believe that, as matters stand, this is a reasonable balance to have struck, which will work in fulfilment of the objectives set.

Our assessment remains that the FPC sub-committees and appeal bodies as now constituted will take responsible and informed decisions which balance the National Health

Service's interest and the taxpayer's interest in restraining NHS pharmacy costs with the need for good local access to services. We certainly would not have accepted further changes that diverted us from those long-term objectives.

As I have said, it is a difficult and delicate balance in view of the differences between some of the contractor professions and the different perspectives of other groups concerned with these issues. We have sought to find a fair and reasonable balance, and I think that we have achieved that. On that basis, I commend the proposals to the House.

Dr. Marek: These proposals were the subject of much concern in Committee. The principal worry was that some members of family practitioner sub-committees might have an interest in deciding who would or would not be able to open a pharmacy in a particular area. Hon. Members on both sides of the Committee shared that concern, as did those in the other place. The then Minister, the right hon. Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Hayhoe), gave an undertaking to look at the matter again and, following the keen interest shown in the other place, we now have a set of proposals which are vast improvements on the originals.

I am sure that it would be possible to pick holes in the proposals. It is possible that sometimes they will not work as well as they could. I was pleased to hear the Minister's response to my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) that if, at some time, the proposals were seen to have faults, he would look at them again and perhaps correct them. Having said that, it is an important principle that people who have an interest in the opening of pharmacies should not make decisions on them. That raises questions about what happens in the other sub-committees of the family practitioner committees. I am sure that I would be ruled out of order if I went into any detail on that, but the principle is that in this sub-committee the people who make the decisions on opening pharmacies must not have an interest in the matter. What does that mean for the other sub-committees of the family practitioner committees? The principle contained in the amendment is right.

The regulations have yet to be considered. I hope that they are phrased so that the original committee will decide the matter conclusively, not in nine cases out of 10, but in perhaps 49 cases out of 50. We do not want the committee to go through all this and decide who may set up a pharmacy and then have a rerun, in many cases, at the appeal stage. The right to appeal should be kept simple. One should be able to appeal only on very few principles —for example, if something has been done wrongly or if the decision which has been taken is one to which a reasonable person could not hold. However, people should not be allowed to appeal if the only reason for doing so is that, on the balance of probabilities, the decision might have gone the other way. That will depend on drafting of the regulations. In another place, the wording was debated. Their Lordships wondered whether the onus should be on the committee to show that the application should not be granted or on the applicant to show that the committee should grant him permission to open a business. I ask the Minister to consider the matter seriously, because I hope that he will agree that unnecessary quangos are not wanted. If they are not wanted, nor are unnecessary appeals. If unnecessary appeals are not desired, we must get the original committees right so that they reach decisions which are manifestly seen to be fair.

I hope that the decisions and the reasons for them will be made public. I hope that the community health councils will be involved in the decisions and will make representations, because only through an open system can we ensure that the original sub-committee decision will be the right one. We can then tighten the rules on the appeals side.

With that, I cautiously welcome the Lords amendment. It is a big improvement on the previous position and Labour Members will not seek to divide the House on it.

Mr. Weetch: I wish to voice some of my misgivings about the position that still obtains in the Bill. My speech will also give me the chance to question the Minister on matters about which I am still unclear.

I regret the absence of the Adam Smith lobby on the Government Back Benches, because earlier in debate on the Bill they made much thunder about the loss of opportunity for people to enter the pharmaceutical services market and offer them to the public. I expected that, now that the Bill had reached its last gasp in the House, they would be here for a bravura finish, but they have almost entirely fled the field. That is regrettable because there are still some comments to be made in this area, where the Government are doing something pretty serious to the supply of pharmaceutical services.

Under the clause, the supply of pharmaceutical services will be organised according to the principles of regulation as opposed to open entry and unregulated competition. That is a pretty odd approach to be taken by a Government who are dedicated to free enterprise. I do not object to that approach, but it contains, at least at first sight, some philosophical contradictions. The main virtue of the provision is to avoid over-supply and the increase in cost to the taxpayer from the Government having to pay on-cost expenses to too many suppliers. In aggregate, this will increase the unit costs for pharmaceutical supplies throughout the country.

I accept the Government's approach as sensible, but if people are restricted from entering the pharmaceutical profession to supply services, it is for the Government to ensure that any system of appeal is absolutely watertight.

It is a bad step to allow local opinion to determine the matter as that will be influenced to a great extent by people who stand to lose or gain from the regulation of the supply of the services. The Government's statement that a national appeals system could not be set up because it would be overloaded with bureaucracy and be slow and cumbersome fills me with great dismay. If the Government cannot set up such a system without strangling themselves with red tape, it is a pretty sorry state of affairs.

Out of the blue this week on two large estates in Ipswich —the Chantry estate and the Gainsborough estate— and not in response to any inadequacy of the present service, because the two established chemists involved are models of good suppliers, it was proposed that two new suppliers set up in business when there is already adequate provision. Why should that be? The new suppliers are entering the market before the curtain comes down when the Bill comes into operation. In Ipswich, at least, someone is trying to slide under the door at the last minute to offer services so that he will be in position before the Bill affects what he proposes to do.

I have received two letters this week from separate existing suppliers who argue that they will be damaged because they can cope adequately with the existing demand. Therefore, those two estates do not need any more suppliers. The existing suppliers argue, as do the Government on a general principle, that the increasing costs which the taxpayer will incur through supporting the new entrants will not result in an improved service over the status quo. Therefore, it is difficult to understand how new entrants can be justified. Is it true that throughout the country new suppliers are trying to enter the system at the last moment before the die is cast on the legislation? Is that the case? Have there been many examples elsewhere?

If these new entrants succeed in entering the market for new services, although extra supply is not needed, will they be told to go or will they be allowed to remain for ever now that they have slid under the door at the last minute? If they are subsequently told to go, will they be compensated? Have they come in at the last minute to collect the compensation at the eleventh hour?

I wonder whether the Government can give me some guidance on all those points. While the Minister is replying, I shall be taking down a draft reply that I can use for the two chemists who have written to me this week. I will then be able to say that the reply came straight from the horse's mouth. For the moment, I shall content myself with that.

Mr. Kirkwood: I agree with what has been said in this short debate about the changes contained in these amendments. This legislation is implementing an important step. It is a vast improvement on the rather ham-fisted attempts that the Government were trying to foist upon the profession in Scotland about a year ago when they tried to tag some provisions on to the back end of a miscellaneous legal Bill that applied to Scotland. The House of Lords was quite right to sling the whole lot out.

The worry that was expressed in the House of Lords at that time was the fact that that could be construed, to a certain extent, as a restraint on trade. As the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) has said, we must try to avoid that at all costs. However, we have to balance that against the other needs and requirements of the Health Service. We must be fair—equally we must be seen to be fair—to all parties involved. Although it has taken us a little time, this amendment is a substantial improvement and has every prospect of success.

I am slightly worried about the question of the success or otherwise of the system. Of course, that can be raised when the regulations are brought to the House. However, it is important that the Department should carefully monitor the membership changes that we are making to the committees and the impact that that will have on the system as it works in practice after the Bill has been implemented. I do not know what machinery, if any, exists to do that. I am fresh to this Bill and did not serve at any of the earlier stages. It may be that that point was considered in Committee.

However, I share the anxiety expressed earlier about the machinery that the Government will use to ensure that the appeals procedure is not only working well but is seen to be working well. Steps must be taken to ensure that the way in which decisions are taken by the individual appeal committees is, by and large, consistent throughout the country. Of course, I understand and accept the problem that was referred to earlier about establishing a national appeal system. However, if we end up with a patchwork quilt of differing standards of decisions that would be a matter of concern. I listened carefully to the Minister when he said that he would not stand back and ignore that. However, how will the Minister know whether the system is operating satisfactorily?

The hon. Member for Ipswich indirectly touched upon the question of what steps are to be taken in the course of the appeal process to notify other interested parties—consumer groups, community health councils and so on—that applications are being considered and that the appeals are being heard. Looking at the provisions on the face of the Bill, I am not clear as to what procedures would be necessary in order to notify the public and interested parties about how this new committee and appeal system is working from day to day so that representations can be made by appropriate people at the appropriate time. It may be that those points can be considered when the regulations come before the House. I accept that. However, if there are views in the Department about those major areas, it would help the House in considering the amendment if the Government could say something about them.

This is an important and significant step and should not be taken lightly. I do not think that the Government are taking it lightly. The appeals procedures put in place by this amendment are a vast improvement and I endorse them on behalf of myself and my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Mrs. Currie: We hope that the change in the amendments before the House will be welcomed on both sides. They present an excellent example of the revising role of the other place and the importance of the careful negotiations that have taken place between the Government and the pharmaceutical societies concerned. I should say that my brother-in-law is a retail pharmacist in north Devon and, although I have no financial interest in the business that he runs so efficiently, it does mean that I appreciate the role of the retail pharmacist, especially in rural areas, and the excellent work that they are able to do.

The clause as amended produces a balance between the two wide possibilities that might be considered, the first being a free-for-all that some members of the other place have advocated. Indeed, the Office of Fair Trading has drawn our attention to the problem that comes from restriction of trade. The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) also drew our attention to that. There is a case for saying that there should be a complete free-for-all and that retail pharmacies should be treated like any other retail business, subject perhaps only to planning permission. The fact is that retail pharmacies are not retail businesses like any other. They provide health care and they are, at least in part, funded in order to provide that health care with taxpayers' money through the National Health Service. Therefore, we have an obligation to ensure an adequate provision of health care as far as possible throughout the country and to be guardians of the public purse. The amendments before us and the clause they amend do that adequately. We have taken careful note of the points that have been made.

The amendment is specific on the decision-making process, the system by which we might get appropriate decisions made. One way of doing that would be if the Elephant and Castle was to decide. However, that would fill all of us on both Front Benches and everywhere else with complete horror. We have enough to do with all the decisions that do come to us. Therefore, it is appropriate that the family practitioner committees and the system that has been established for a long time should be the way it is done.

While allowing retail pharmacists to sit on the panel of the FPC sub-committees to decide and discuss appeals, we felt, and it will be agreed if the House accepts these amendments, that they should not be able to vote. The extension of that exclusion to dispensing doctors will redress the balance. In our view, that is natural justice. The people who serve and vote on the committees must be seen to be independent. There must be seen to be no conflict of interest and, as was pointed out in the other place, we must ensure that there is no danger of subsequent court action as a result of any failure to disclose. That is what has happened. Whether another pharmacist on the panel who is not in retailing but is qualified and working in another area, such as in hospitals, might be able to vote is still a matter for discussion and will be dealt with in the regulations.

We share with the hon. Members for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) a passionate dislike of red tape and we are determined that in drafting regulations we will take note of what has been said in this House and the other place. We share the determination that the system should be simple, speedy and acceptable to all concerned with the interests of the patients being absolutely paramount.

The hon. Member for Ipswich asked about the appeals system. The matter was also raised by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire. The proposed new arrangements for allocating pharmacy contracts include an appeals system that is in line with the FPCs' functions, which can operate quickly and will include important safeguards against bias, as we have already discussed. But one of the changes that was agreed by the former Minister for Health after debates was that membership of the appeals panel should be drawn from a national list instead of a regional list, and that the national list should be approved by the Secretary of State for Social Services. The changes aim to balance the need for consistency and experience, which is what the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire was aiming at, the need for independence in decision making and the need to deal promptly with appeals, bearing in mind local circumstances. We believe that the appeals system satisfies the concerns expressed by Opposition Members.

6.30 pm

The hon. Member for Wrexham wanted to know about regulations governing procedures of FPCs in other professional work. He may not be aware of the regulations laid down in statutory instrument No. 213, governing the membership and procedure of family practitioner committees. It was laid before Parliament on 28 February 1985. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows this already, but let me remind him that the statutory instrument says that, subject to the provisions of the regulation,

"if a member has any pecuniary interest, direct or indirect, in any matter and is present at a meeting of the Committee at which that matter is under consideration—

(a) he shall at the meeting and as soon as practicable after its commencement disclose the fact that he has such an interest; and

(b) he shall not take part in the consideration or discussion of that matter or vote on any question with respect to it."

Dr. Marek: Of course, I am aware of that, but the amendment seeks to introduce a slightly wider implication, that if one is in the same profession, one should not be making a decision on an application. As I am sure the hon. Lady knows, doctors and all sorts of people on FPCs may not have a pecuniary interest, but they are in the same area, and they are making decisions.

Mrs. Currie: What we are trying to do is tie down the measure as hard as we can for the pharmacy profession, in the light of current interests and discussion on the placement of pharmacists. But the regulations are there. We merely want to ensure that, in the case about which we are concerned, with the amendments before us, we tie them down as hard as possible. We expect those regulations to be adhered to as they are set down.

The hon. Member for Ipswich wanted to know about pharmacists opening up in his area recently to beat the regulations and the law that we are trying to create, and asked about compensation. He was kind enough to call me the horse's mouth. If he wants a considered reply from the horse's mouth, it would help the horse enormously if he were kind enough to provide some details of what has happened in his constituency in the past few days. I should be pleased to see them. I can say in general terms that the arrangements for pharmacists coming in before the new arrangements start were agreed as long ago as May 1985. There has been some increase in the numbers of new pharmacies — indeed, the increase has been steady in recent years, which I think many hon. Members will welcome, following a decline during the 1970s. I am advised that there has been no evidence of large increases to beat the new arrangements. I should be glad to hear if that is not so, or if there is any evidence to the contrary.

With regard to compensation for leaving the contract, I refer the hon. Member for Ipswich to the question tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris), which was answered on 25 July this year. My hon. Friend asked what safeguards the Secretary of State "intends to introduce into the new pharmacy contract to prevent a pharmacist who has received compensation from a closure from opening a new pharmacy."

The answer was:

"During the debate in Committee on the NHS (Amdt) Bill I agreed to look again at the system of payments to pharmacists who wished to relinquish their NHS contract, or to relocate their business to areas where they could better serve patient needs, to ensure that the system will work as intended and that there are adequate safeguards against abuse.

The proposed system already has a number of important safeguards. It will operate for two years only and small pharmacies only will be eligible; there is no opportunity for someone to open a pharmacy and then quickly close it to obtain a payment".

Those are exactly the circumstances hypothesised by the hon. Member for Ipswich. The answer continues:

"Under the new arrangements a new National Health Service contract will be granted only where it is necessary or desirable for patient services, so new pharmacies will be opened only where patient needs dictate . . . Both the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain and the Pharmaceutical Services

[Mrs. Currie]

Negotiating Committee have been consulted and both have given the assurance that they will be playing an active role to make sure that the system operates as intended."—[Official Report, 25 July 1986; Vol. 102, c. 735-6.]

I hope that that deals adequately with the point made by the hon. Member for Ipswich.

Mr. Weetch indicated assent.

Mrs. Currie: I see the hon. Gentleman nodding assent.

Overall, a great deal of work has gone into the amendments and the clause.

Mr. Kirkwood: I wonder whether the hon. Lady can help me tonight. Perhaps a little more time is necessary. Under the new machinery of the amendment, do the Government have any direct method of finding out quickly that the system is not working if it happens locally in different parts of the country?

Mrs. Currie: I have no doubt that we shall be watching closely what happens. As I mentioned a few moments ago, the two main societies involved, to which retail pharmacists belong, the PSGB and the PSNC, will be co-operating with us actively to ensure that the regulations are followed. In other words, if a problem comes up quickly, we expect to be notified quickly so that we can ensure that the regulations are followed. But I am sure that the amount of work and negotiation that have gone into the clause and the amendments, and the effort that has been made to ensure that the system is fair to the pharmacist, the taxpayer and, most of all, the patient, will produce a better system than the one we have now.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 3 agreed to.

New Clause

CO-OPERATION IN PLANNING OF SERVICES FOR DISABLED PERSONS, THE ELDERLY AND OTHERS

Lords amendment: No. 4, after clause 3, insert the following new clause—

"—(1) After section 13 of the 1978 Act there shall be inserted the following sections—

"Co-operation in planning of services for disabled persons, the elderly and others.

13A.—(1) The duty under section 13, in relation to persons to whom this section applies, includes—

(a) joint planning of—

(i) services for those persons; and

(ii) the development of those services, being services which are of common concern to Health Boards and either or both of the authorities mentioned in that section;

(b) such consultation with voluntary organisations providing services similar to those mentioned in paragraph (a) as might be expected to contribute substantially to the joint planning of the services mentioned in that paragraph;

(c) the publication, at such times and in such manner as the bodies who have made joint plans under paragraph (a) consider appropriate, of those joint plans.

(2) This section applies to—

(a) disabled persons within the meaning of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation Act 1986;

(b) persons aged 65 or more; and

(c) such other categories of persons as the Secretary of State may by order specify.

Joint Liaison Committees

13B.—(1) The Secretary of State may, after consultation with such Health Boards, local authorities, education authorities, associations of such authorities and other organisations and persons as appear to him to be appropriate, by order provide for the formation and as to the functions of committees, to be known as joint liaison committees, to advise Health Boards and local and education authorities on the performance of such of their duties under section 13 as consist of co-operation in the planning and operation of services of common concern to Health Boards and such authorities.

(2) An order under subsection (1) may contain provisions relating to the role of voluntary organisations in joint liaison committee.".

(2) Section 15 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 is hereby repealed.".

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Ian Lang): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 8.

Mr. Lang: This new clause is an important step in the development of joint planning in Scotland. Its introduction follows a commitment given by the Government during the passage of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986. I am glad to see that the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) is here, having returned hotfoot from collecting his "Man of the Year" award earlier today.

The new clause achieves two purposes. First, it sets out the duty that the health boards and local authorities have for co-operation in joint planning of services. Secondly, it confers on the Secretary of State for Scotland a new power to enable him, if necessary, to produce regulations for the statutory direction of the process of joint planning.

Amendment No. 8, which amends the long title of the Bill, is necessary so that it can apply to arrangements for joint planning in Scotland. When the new clause was introduced in another place, it was generally welcomed, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): I apologise to the Minister for not speaking in the previous debate. I gather that he had a speech prepared for it, too, which he was obviously longing to make.

I am a little disappointed that it is the hon. Gentleman who is moving the amendment because we in Scotland are disappointed that our Minister responsible for health is now in the other place, and cannot answer questions in the democratically elected House of Parliament, as was the case until the recent reshuffle. It is interesting to note that this amendment was moved in another place by Baroness Trumpington, not by Lord Glenarthur, who is the Minister with responsibility for these matters—I gather luckily, and much to the annoyance of his predecessor, the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay)—because he was at a conference in the Bahamas at the time.

We welcome the new clause. We must congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on it, just as we must congratulate him on being one of the 12 men of the year. I am sure that we will find that his work on this subject will be suitably rewarded in the House as well. It was due to his efforts that the English Bill was brought about and it is to the Government's credit that they have brought forward the clause.

Scotland has not done as well as England in regard to joint planning, especially between health boards and local authorities. Successive Governments have been remiss in that respect. Far too many people in Scotland are institutionalised. I refer especially to the mentally handicapped at hospitals such as Lennoxcastle and the Scottish national hospital at Larbert, who ought to be living in the community. Recent reports have shown that conditions in some of those hospitals make removal of patients from them very necessary. It is only by joint planning such as is proposed that patients can be brought out of those hospitals. It is no use having a commitment to putting patients back into the community if all that we do is put them under the care of a general practitioner who has time only to feed them valium and keep them quiet. They must be given proper support by the combined efforts of the Health Service, health visitors, housing authorities and social services departments. The Bill at least starts us along the road in that direction.

Just last week I spoke at a conference on dementia at Crieff hydro. I was the amateur among the experts, but it is clear that there will be an 80 per cent. increase in the number of people aged over 85 in Scotland during the next 20 years. If, as is the case now, one in six of those people suffers from dementia, we must work on the principle that they should be kept in the community for as long as possible, but we can do that only if we have joint planning arrangements.

It is essential that we include all relevant organisations, including regional and district authorities. We want social work care provided at regional council level and district council involvement through sheltered housing.

What finance do the Government intend to put in? There is little point in setting up joint committees which will make a lot of plans if, for lack of money, nothing happens locally and patients do not receive the care that they need. The system will not work unless we have extra home helps, lunch clubs and meals on wheels, and more social workers involved with the elderly and the handicapped. There has been a decline in the number of home helps, lunch clubs and the number of people going to them in Scotland during the past six years. There must be resources as well as a commitment to the idea. I hope that the Minister will take some time to deal with that.

I assume that there is some way in which to amend the Bill's financial memorandum. The proposed new clause is not included in the financial memorandum, but nobody can say that it has no financial implications. I assume that the Government will deal with that problem unless, of course, they maintain that there is no financial implication. If that is so, we are passing just a load of verbiage. Although this is the way forward when it comes to looking after the disabled and the elderly, the Government must recognise the financial commitment if it is to mean anything.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I thank the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) for their generous comments. I think that it was Harold Macmillan who said at a difficult time for his Government that, in politics, a few kind words go a long way. I feel exactly as he did.

The proposed new clause will be warmly welcomed by many of the people who supported the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986. It represents a new principle in Scotland. It also represents a step forward. Many organisations such as the Care in the Community Scottish Working Group, the Scottish Society for the Mentally Handicapped and the Glasgow Forum on Disability will welcome the principles enshrined in the new clause, although they might not quite consider the details line by line as exactly what they wanted.

I do not, however, want to be churlish. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Cathcart that the principle of joint planning has been in operation in England and Wales for more than 10 years. The evidence seems to be that it is working and that a democratic input into decision-taking has been welcomed. It appears to make sense and to lead to efficiency and effectiveness. It must be good for it to apply to Scotland.

There are a few matters on which I should like some clarification. Paragraph 13A(1)(b) speaks of "organisations providing services". Do the Government have in mind advice, the giving of advice, consultation and organisations in Scotland which perform a very useful role? Will they be regarded as providing services in the Scottish context as I understand is the case in England and Wales? Paragraph 13A(1)(c) mentions "the publication, at such times and in such manner as the bodies who have made joint plans under paragraph (a) consider appropriate".

Will the Minister take on board the suggestion that there should be an annual report? People involved in the Health Service, social services, mental health care and others might then feel that these matters could be considered at least annually.

Paragraph 13B(1) mentions liaison. Will the Minister confirm that that word refers also to planning so that people who know about the problems which ought to invite joint planning are involved?

My hon. Friend the Member for Cathcart rightly mentioned Lennoxcastle. I should have preferred to say this in the presence of the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay), but it seemed that the Government were throwing money at that problem. There had been a great deal of criticism of Lennoxcastle. The staff were doing an excellent job, but some of the things being done there could not be defended. As a result of a television programme, the Scottish Minister responsible for health announced that much more money would be spent, but there seems to have been very little consideration of the Government's approach to community care. It seems wrong for the House simply to commit itself to the principle of community care when we have the opportunity to phase out a large Victorian hospital that does not fit in with modern attitudes to community care. It seems to me and to many others that the Government are simply throwing money at the problem.

If joint planning took place in Scotland to the extent that it takes place in England and Wales, those involved with these problems on a day-to-day basis would argue that perhaps there is a better way to spend the money. If resources are limited—and we can have a wider debate about that—the Government are gravely mistaken if they simply make them available to the health board without taking account of the views of the voluntary organisations and social works departments that are called upon to advise on finding solutions to these problems. It would be interesting to know precisely what the Secretary of State intends to do about regulations.

Subsection 13B(2) refers to "voluntary organisations". I hope that that genuinely means that the consumer groups that assist with the problems of mental illness, the mentally handicapped and those with learning difficulties will be involved in the joint planning process. It would be a great pity if organisations such as the Scottish Society for the Mentally Handicapped — which has done a quite outstanding job — and which recognise the need for genuine community care were not involved in the Government's proposals. I am not suggesting that that is the Government's thinking, but it would be helpful to know exactly where they stand.

The parents of profoundly mentally handicapped children, speaking from their experience, have much to say about these matters, as do the organisations that deal with the mentally ill. Many patients themselves are capable of expressing a view. They all want to see progress on joint planning. In an endeavour to be helpful, I hope that the Government, who were slow to accept the principle of joint planning in Scotland, will accept the view of another place and this House that joint planning in Scotland is essential if resources are to be used effectively, if we are to provide the best possible service for patients, if patient care is to mean anything and if community care is to become a reality.

Despite their earlier misgivings — clearly expressed when the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act was debated on Second Reading—I hope that the Government will unreservedly commit themselves to the principle of making joint planning work in Scotland.

Mr. Kirkwood: I reinforce what has been said by the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) and I associate myself with the remarks made earlier about the part he has played both in this regard and in steering through his Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act. I understand that a significant award has been bestowed on the hon. Gentleman this very day in that he shares the "Man of the Year" award with 11 others. I do not know which other 11 men could possibly measure up to the hon. Gentleman's qualities.

The amendment is welcome, and I am happy to endorse it. However, it is only a limited reserve power. What circumstances do the Government foresee before implementing it?

It was said earlier that the situation in Scotland is not as far advanced as in England. That is perfectly true. That is my experience, and it is not for want of trying by those who wish to make the system work north of the border. The Government do not seem to be actively promoting the idea of joint planning as energetically as they could, and they certainly have not been providing the finance through the health boards and the joint planning system to make it work properly.

This measure, described by Baroness Trumpington as "a useful sanction", is all very well, but I hope that it is only a token of things to come and that it will presage a change in emphasis by the Government by putting resources into the system north of the border.

The hon. Member for Monklands, West spoke of the lack of publication of joint annual reports. I endorse that. There should be publication of some type of annual report. I do not mean that there should be a vast bureaucracy or expenditure, but regular reports on progress in the implementation of joint plans and details of changes and additions to any existing joint plans would be helpful so that we can chart the progress being made in the different regions of the country. That is a minimum requirement before we take decisions about whether or not to implement these reserve powers.

Secondly, there should be mandatory guidelines, or better still a code of practice, on the establishment and operation of joint planning and liaison committees. That would also be a minimal requirement to allow the spirit of the amendment to take effect and flourish.

Thirdly, there is concern about the definition of "voluntary organisations". It would be a shame if it were restricted to voluntary groups that contributed financially to the process in Scotland. It should be extended to include consumer and other voluntary groups that act as representatives. That may be possible at a later stage through regulations that are spawned as a result of this primary legislation. At present the definition is fairly vague and I hope that the Government will interpret it widely.

All this entirely depends on resources. I am prepared to give this change a cautious welcome on behalf of my hon. Friends, but the Government should understand that they are hastening slowly in respect of community care and joint financing north of the border. I hope that the amendment will spur them on to greater efforts in the future.

Mr. Lang: By leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The House has given a welcome to the new clause. I am grateful for that, even though, in the case of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton), his welcome was somewhat grudging.

My hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay) very much regrets his inability to be here today. As the hon. Member for Cathcart knows, my hon. Friend is in Brussels where he is engaged upon agricultural matters, for which he also has responsibility. The Government agree that there is a need for joint planning, and I hope that the new clause makes that clear. The Government also agree with the hon. Gentleman on the need for care in the community, another useful point that he raised in the debate.

The hon. Member for Cathcart asked about the involvement of regional and district councils. I confirm that both regional and district councils are involved in joint planning in all health board areas. The clause is not, however, about spending but about making statutory provision for the formation and function of joint liaison committees. It is about the planning and the arrangements for these committees rather than about cash considerations. Joint liaison committees already exist in all areas. There should not, therefore, be any appreciable increase in cost.

The hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) referred to voluntary organisations. I assure him of the Government's commitment to encouraging the very significant contribution that is made by the voluntary organisations to the provision of community care. If he looks at circular NHS/18 of 1985, he will find in paragraph 31 and onwards the Secretary of State's commitment to the provision of community care.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the terms of the provision that might restrict the extent of voluntary organisation involvement. The Government are very much aware of the considerable amount of work that is done by the voluntary sector and recognise the part that it plays in the joint planning process. Joint liaison committees are encouraged in the existing guidance on joint planning to involve the voluntary organisations. It is important to allow for some selectivity to prevent committees from foundering through sheer weight of numbers. It is desirable that committees should have the opportunity to structure themselves in a way that best reflects local interests so as best to use the expertise of those who are most closely concerned with the issues. The intention of the clause is to provide for that kind of discretion.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to public accountability. Provision is made for the publication of plans. It is important that this should be done and that the plans should be made available to the public. Clearly, however, it would be counter-productive to have detailed discussion on every minor change to the plans. We do not want great bureaucratic arrangements to be established. Instead, we want to recognise the need for public involvement. It is important to get the broad principles right and then to get on with the job. With the implementation of this clause, I hope that the hon. Gentleman feels that the last brick in his edifice falls into place.

Finally, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) asked what factors the Government might use in deciding whether or not to activate their statutory planning power. We have made it clear, as he recognised in his speech, that this is a reserve power. We would expect to use it only if there were inordinate delay in progress, or if the plans that were produced failed to address the issues that had been put to the joint liaison committees. It is important that the present arrangements should be given a reasonable time within which to produce results. The Scottish Home and Health Department has written to boards to obtain information on progress. Following the passage of the Bill, the intention is to issue guidance to reinforce the Government's commitment to joint planning.

With those comments, I commend the clause to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 5 agreed to. [Special Entry.]

Clause 6

SHORT TITLE, ETC.

Lords amendment: No. 6, in page 8, line 10, at end insert—

"(4A) Each of the following provisions of this Act—

(a) section 2 above; and

(b) to the extent that it inserts section 13B of the 1978 Act into that Act, section (Co-operation and advice in relation to disabled persons, the elderly and others) above, shall come into force on such day as the Secretary of State may by order made by statutory instrument appoint in relation to it.".

Mrs. Currie: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Dr. Marek: There is a little more to say about this amendment. Unfortunately, no date has been given for its implementation. The Minister can decide when to implement it. He could have said that it is to be implemented within three months. If no financial expenditure is involved, it would have been very nice if the Minister could have said that it would be implemented within three months.

A headline in The Independent caught my eye today. It says:

"Patients 'suffering' in community care scheme."

The first two paragraphs of that article say:

"Psychiatric patients are becoming homeless and suicidal through the Government's care in the community programme which is subsidising private residential and nursing homes through benefit payments of £200 million a year, according to the housing charity, Shelter. Shelter says the patients become victims of unscrupulous landlords because both the National Health Service and voluntary bodies do not have the funds to support them after they are discharged from hospital under the programme. It claims one landlord is receiving about £1 million a year through social security benefits."

The article then says:

"Shelter says a draft of an Audit Commission report, to be released in December, supports its view that the process is merely subsidising private landlords."

The article says that former patients had been found

"living in mixed-sex, multi-occupied rooms, some with dangerous, illegally connected electricity supplies. In one case, CoHSE reported that a confused, sixty-year-old woman who had not eaten for two days had retreated into a tiny room at the top of a dilapidated staircase. Her two electric fires were running from an adaptor which was illegally connected to a 5p slot meter."

This is an important matter. We should not leave it just at that, by being asked to agree this amendment formally and then leaving the Minister either to implement or not to implement these powers. They should be implemented quickly. The speedy implementation of this amendment would benefit the elderly and the mentally ill.

I realise that the Conservative party believes in the rich and that it believes in the poor. It believes in one standard of health service for the rich and in a lower standard of health service for the poor. Therefore, I do not have very much hope that the Government will accede to my request, but I should be grateful for the Minister's comments.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security sought to move this amendment formally in the hope of accelerating the business before the House. I am bound to say that I think that the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) has stretched the boundaries of the debate—I would not say beyond order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but very near to the edges of order.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland made it very clear that the Government's aim is to secure arrangements over joint planning in Scotland through co-operation between health boards, local authorities and other organisations without the need for statutory intervention. However, to affirm the Government's commitment, my hon. Friend has introduced these proposals by which, subject to a commencement order, the Government can provide for the statutory regulation of joint planning, if it has been clearly shown that the present voluntary arrangements have failed.

It follows from that proposition, which I understand underlies that part of the Bill, that one would need to know what the circumstances were before specifying the date for a commencement order. In that sense, the hon. Member for Wrexham is asking for something that Ministers cannot give to him at this stage, because the circumstances under which a commencement order would be used have not arisen.

I make those comments on a matter that might be thought primarily to be for my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland. It became clear during his remarks that the hon. Member for Wrexham had that clause in mind. In fact, the commencement order provisions that were moved by my hon. Friend relate to other parts of the Bill as well. I shall happily make some observations about our thinking on the other clauses, but I sense that the House is not particularly interested in hearing a further ministerial speech on the subject.

Cereals (Co-responsibility Levy)

7.9 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I beg to move,

That the Cereals Co-responsibility Levy Regulations 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 1233), dated 14th July 1986, a copy of which was laid before this House on 15th July, be revoked.

For once I am reasonably confident that the House, perhaps even the Parliamentary Secretary, will agree with me. I mention the Parliamentary Secretary because his right hon. Friend the Minister, who is no doubt necessarily absent from this debate, said as recently as last Thursday:

"I would much rather not have had the co-responsibility levy."—[Official Report, 30 October 1986; Vol. 103, c. 439.]

Today we are giving the Minister an opportunity to get rid of that levy. I suggest to the Parliamentary Secretary on this his maiden appearance that he has an opportunity to make a clean break with his recent colleagues in the Whips Office and to vote against this ludicrous levy tonight. I shall be extremely surprised if any hon. Member speaks in favour of it. I should, perhaps, declare an interest as I am a cereal producer and must pay the levy.

The one point of general agreement is that something must be done about cereal surpluses. The Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce in the United Kingdom had 4,777,446 tonnes of cereal in store last month and the position might have been considerably worse if Spain had not had to import substantial quantities of grain this year. It has been estimated that there will be 80 million tonnes of cereals in intervention stores in Europe by 1991. Therefore, it is abundantly clear that there is a need for urgent action to curtail the production of cereals and to help farmers to restructure their businesses in ways which will bring production nearer to the likely level of consumption. At the same time we must give proper consideration to the requirements of consumers and the rural economy.

That will be an extremely complicated task and the only effective, fair way of achieving those objectives is based on a quota system. It is absolutely certain that the co-responsibility levy is a completely pointless diversion from the business of controlling cereal surpluses. Apart from anything else, it just will not work.

The co-responsibility levy on milk has no impact on the production of milk. Indeed, instead of solving any of the problems of that industry, it has been yet another irritation for dairy farmers. In the case of cereals, it is worth looking at the Austrian experience. In Austria a co-responsibility levy on cereals was introduced in 1979. It has since been increased year after year up to a swingeing £25 a tonne this year. Yet the production of cereals has continued to increase. Therefore, there is no evidence that this type of levy will act as a disincentive to cereal growers. On the contrary, the marginal levy might act as a spur for marginal increases in production.

The term "co-responsibility" is one of many examples of linguistic pollution to come to us from the European Commission from time to time. It is intended to imply that the levy will pay for the cost of the intervention system and all that goes with it. It will not. The European Community's gross expenditure on cereals in 1986, including intervention and export refunds, will be £2·53 billion while the levy is supposed to yield only £323 million, so the levy will cover only about 12 per cent. of the costs of the cereals regime, and I suspect that that is an optimistic estimate.

This may be the first instance of an attempt to crack a sledgehammer with a nut and on this occasion it is a fairly unpalatable nut. There are no grounds for hoping that the levy will control the production of cereals. It seems unlikely to make any significant contribution to the cost of operating the intervention system.

But that is not the end of the story. The levy is not only useless but positively disruptive. It is riddled with discriminatory anomalies and may well turn out to be so discriminatory that it will be illegal. The Minister knows that the levy is being challenged in the courts by the European Federation of Animal Feed Manufacturers, which includes the United Kingdom Agricultural Supply Trade Association, better known as UKASTA.

It may be worth briefly exploring the way in which the levy is supposed to operate. When a load of barley or wheat is sold from a farm, the merchant who buys it will deduct 337·3p a tonne in levy from the price paid for the grain to the farmer. Incidentally, that ·3p must have been puzzling for many people's accounting systems. I understand that it arises from the conversion from ECUs to pounds sterling. It is merely the first of many complications.

The grain merchant then has various options. He may have to dry it, perhaps from 20 per cent. moisture content as it comes off the farm down to 12 per cent. That would extract moisture from the grain equivalent to 10 per cent. of the original weight, so 34p of the original levy on the tonne of grain would evaporate. The merchant would get the benefit of that much because he would have deducted it from the price paid to the farmer. That is the first of several instances where bigger farmers have an advantage over smaller farmers in the levy system.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): I should correct the hon. Gentleman on that. There has been a ruling now that the levy is to be paid on the dry weight, not the wet weight, so what the hon. Gentleman has said is not strictly true.

Mr. Home Robertson: It may not be strictly true, but in effect it is true, because that is what is happening. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman can talk until he is blue in the face, but merchants are deducting the levy from the weight of the grain that is transported away from the farm. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can explain how that can be undone.

That is one example of the way in which this system will militate against smaller farmers. In general, they do not have the drying equipment to enable them to get rid of the moisture in the first place.

To return to this theoretical batch of grain, if it is barley of malting quality or wheat of milling quality, the merchant will either sell it to a British maltster or miller, or export it, perhaps, to Germany. The British maltster or miller, as a leviable cereal user, would have to collect the levy from the merchant and pay it on in due course to the United Kingdom authority, which would forward it to the authorities in Brussels.

The bureaucracy and paperwork involved in all those transactions represent a great deal of expensive hassle to all those involved in trading in grain. That must act as a disincentive to people who should be encouraged to use grain produce here in the United Kingdom. The position is one stage worse if the grain is being exported within the Community, especially into Germany, because recent fluctuations in exchange rates mean that the effective levy on British grain would be £4·60 a tonne instead of £3·73 a tonne. That will presumably make it more difficult to export our grain to the Community. That is yet another disincentive to use our grain and yet another factor which could drive even more grain into intervention.

Life gets even more complicated with feeding grain. Some feeding grain may be sold on to someone who will mill it and feed it to his livestock somewhere within 15 miles of his mill. He would then be exempt from paying the levy. Theoretically, the levy should be paid back to the original producer since his grain has found its way to an exempt user. Generally, that simply cannot be done. No doubt even the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) will understand that point. When feeding barley or wheat from several farms is stored in bulk together in a merchant's silo and some of it goes to an exempt user, there is absolutely no way of establishing which producer's grain has reached the exempt end user. So that element of the levy which has been collected from the farmer will never be paid to the European Community. It will simply disappear into the system.

I spoke to one large user of feeding grain yesterday who told me that he has £15,000 of levy paid into a special bank account and that he does not know what to do with it. Since it is related to grain fed on his farm within the exemption criteria, that money is not due to be paid on to the authorities as levy. Since there is no way of establishing who produced the grain and paid the levy in the first place, it cannot be repaid to the producer. That is a genuine problem.

I imagine that similar things must apply to a number of big, integrated operations. People such as Bernard Matthews may be in a similar position. What justification can there be for devising an exemption scheme that can give substantial advantages to certain big farmers who have large integrated enterprises that produce grain, mill it and feed it to livestock and poultry, while penalising small grain producers and discriminating viciously against feed milling and compounding businesses? What on earth have these people and their customers done to deserve such disruption and unfair discrimination?

Not surprisingly, mobile milling and mixing operations are doing a roaring trade, processing feed on or near farms in order to exploit these loopholes. We could go on to discuss—and no doubt we shall—other aspects of this dotty system, such as the retrospective levy on grain traded before the system was introduced.

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, to a degree, he is preaching to the converted? Even my right hon. Friend the Minister has said that he does not like the system. Bearing in mind the time limit on the debate, rather than hear more about the problems, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will tell us the Labour party's proposals that might be acceptable to the other 11 countries and possibly reassure British farmers and their interests.

Mr. Home Robertson: I am delighted to hear that the hon. Gentleman and, apparently, the Minister will vote against the levy. However, he must bear with me for a minute or two.

It is important to understand just how daft the system is. I referred to the fact that the levy is retrospective on grain that was traded before the system was introduced. There is the question of the levy that has to be paid on screenings that are taken out when cereal seed is dressed and the apportionment of levy on feed mixes, which include whole grain. When you eat your muesli for breakfast tomorrow morning, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you may care to ponder on the fact that the whole grain is not subject to levy while the milled grain has been subject to the levy. Then, of course, there is the whole business of getting exemption certificates on grain carried over from the previous year, which is likely to get even more complicated if the levy rate is varied next July, as seems likely. The hassle involved in this scheme is out of all proportion to what it is worth.

I suspect that the whole elaborate bureaucratic farce would do credit to the authors of "Yes, Minister", especially since the Minister has said that he is opposed to the idea of a co-responsibility levy. However, the officials at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food have really excelled themselves this time. They have devised such a moronic scheme that it has actually been adopted as a blueprint by the European Commission and recommended for use in other European countries.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Before the European countries pursue the model that my hon. Friend has described, and in reference to the point made by the hon. Member for Shewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway), is my hon. Friend aware that after watching a programme on Central Television at the weekend, which presented a story of malpractice and fraud, I tabled a series of questions last night in which I suggested that the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food should remove the document and examine the whole policy and management of intervention grain in this country forthwith?

Mr. Home Robertson: I know that my hon. Friend has tabled a series of questions on this subject. He is quite right to suggest that the whole intervention system is wide open to abuse.

Speaking of abuse, I should like to refer to the way in which other countries operate within the cereals regime. For instance, we understand that the Italians have not been quite as daft as to accept this system. Instead of going to such frantic lengths to collect levy on 75 per cent. of cereals, the Italian Government have done a deal with the Commission, whereby they will simply pay a lump sum equivalent to the levy on 22 per cent. of their cereal crop. They will not bother to collect the levy from their producers or consumers. Perhaps the Minister can confirm that. In this instance, I suggest that the Italians have treated the whole idea of the co-responsibility levy with the contempt that it deserves.

I want to summarise briefly the points about the levy. It is hitting consumers as much as it is hitting producers. The psychological effect is equivalent to regarding it as a tax on grain. The levy will make it more difficult to dispose of grain. Secondly, the levy will not reduce production, so it will probably have the net effect of increasing the size of the grain mountain. Thirdly, as I have already explained, it will not cover the cost of the intervention system and the export subsidies. Finally, as I have tried to demonstrate, it is an administrative nightmare, fraught with anomalies that discriminate unfairly between producers and consumers.

There are alternatives. If we must have a levy—and we may have to have one—it should be based on acreage, or it could be collected like the Home Grown Cereals Authority levy on all farm sales, which would at least be a tax on production rather than consumption. Better still, the intervention price could be cut, which would have the combined attraction of saving taxpayers' money and penalising those producers who are growing grain that cannot be marketed.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Home Robertson: No, I will not give way. I know that the hon. Gentleman and many other hon. Members wish to participate. I have already been generous in giving way, and I am concluding my remarks.

The levy is nonsense. The industry knows that it is nonsense, and it has been universally condemned by the representative organisations of the farming, grain trading and processing industries and those who use cereals—specifically I can cite the National Farmers Union, UKASTA and the British Poultry Federation, which has briefed all hon. Members on this point.

The Minister knows that the levy does not make sense. The House will do all concerned a great favour by flinging out the regulations tonight and telling the European Commission to come back with more intelligent proposals.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Donald Thompson): I thank the House for its warm reception—I hope that it is as warm when I finish my speech. I shall not speak for as long as the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), as I know that many of my hon. Friends wish to take part in the debate. As the hon. Member for East Lothian understands, I regret that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is in Europe chairing the Council.

The hon. Member for East Lothian sketched the European problem. However, the world is full of cereals. The picture has changed dramatically over the past decade. China and India are now food exporters; Canada, Australia, the United States of America, Europe and other countries could produce even more, if it could be sold. The tragedy of the Third world is one of distribution and political will. That tragedy is our problem tonight and every night, but it is not the subject of this debate.

Even in my working lifetime we have imported wheat from Russia and the Sudan. Russia will not be an importer for ever. We are debating the narrow issue of Europe and the changes that were agreed at this year's price fixing. We are debating one part of one change only—the co-responsibility levy. This is not the Second Reading of a price-fixing 1986 European Bill. We are debating the regulations. The Government have accepted responsibility for the collection of the levy. Voting against the regulations concerning the mechanics will help no one.

The distortions supposedly seen by some in the new market are different, depending on their viewpoint. Voting against the regulations will change no one's viewpoint outside the House. The Government have made their position clear in Europe. Voting against the regulations will not stifle that clear voice. It will not help our negotiators in Europe, because the path has been laid out before us and to vote against the administration of the levy will be seen – because that is all that it is – as a purely United Kingdom matter.

To achieve their objective the regulations lay down a number of administrative requirements. They provide for the operation of a register of cereal processors by the Intervention Board. They enable the board to recover the levy in cases of non-payment. They require the keeping and production of necessary records, and they provide for the necessary powers of entry and for offences.

The regulations do not deal with the key issue of who pays the levy, the circumstances under which it is payable, or how much it should be. That does not mean that the Government are not listening to the many points of view and the valuable ideas expressed in the debate. Many of those points were foreshadowed in the speech by the hon. Member for East Lothian and I am sure that he has read the brief that was sent to all hon. Members.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Presumably the Minister is here to answer questions on something about which we will not be allowed to vote. Can he tell us why it is legitimate to tax the consumer for the faults resulting from the over-production of the producer?

Mr. Thompson: It is not a tax on the producer or the consumer; it is a co-responsibility levy.

The hon. Gentleman makes up his own mind when he wants to vote and then decides which side he wants to vote for. I am sure that he will put his question more clearly later. As I hinted, the co-responsibility levy was not the Government's preferred option although the hon. Gentleman will not find any quotes from me on the matter.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): Can my hon. Friend clarify one point? Is it not right to argue that the co-responsibility levy, warts and all, formed part of an overall package of appreciable savings to the Common Market and that that is welcome?

Mr. Thompson: I have always wanted to say, "I am coming to that" and I can tell my hon. Friend that I am coming to that. As I said, the co-responsibility levy was not the Government's preferred option.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Perhaps the Minister would stop being so apologetic for this proposal. The taxpayers of Europe are paying £150 million a week for the dumping, destruction and storage of food surpluses and, according to the EEC, the consumer is paying £13 a week more for his food because of the CAP. Surely it is right that producers should carry some responsibility as set out in this proposal.

Mr. Thompson: That is a turn-up for the book. I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. This proposal represents the first real progress we have seen to bring cereals into a better balance. The order sets out the initial framework, and a better balance will be achieved in three ways. First, charging the levy on sales into intervention means that the effective level of support is reduced. It is like a cut in the intervention price in its effect on producers. In combination with the other measures adopted at the price fixing, it is part of a package which led to a marked reduction in support levels. Secondly, we were able to avoid the discrimination against the United Kingdom which is often inherent in co-responsibility levy systems. Finally, given the importance which the Commission and some of the other member states attached to the idea, it was an essential part of a satisfactory price package for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I am listening with considerable care to the excellent argument that my hon. Friend is deploying. It would help Government Members who have agricultural interests if my hon. Friend could tell us why so many of the organisations that represent agricultural interests are opposed to the levy. As we have been told, the British Poultry Federation has issued a circular to all hon. Members urging them to vote against this order. It would help us quite immensely if my hon. Friend could tell us why there is so much opposition to the order.

Mr. Thompson: Many people are opposed to it because it is untried and new. The levy will not reduce production unless it is taken in conjunction with other things. The Community needs to adopt further measures, some of which were hinted at in the debate. Our countryside, our farmers and producers must be protected but there must be other measures as well. By and large, the outcome of the 1986 price fixing for cereals is quite an achievement.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): The hon. Gentleman is handling a difficult brief with a great deal of humour. May I try him again on the question put to him by his hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) who said that all the poultry businesses are against this? In all the circulars that I have received the authors are arguing, at least in Scotland, that this will disturb the free market and disturb competition. It is not being operated uniformly. What is the Minister's reaction to that? The Minister would agree that his party is more wedded to the free market than mine. I am told that this is not a Scottish problem but an English problem. The Minister says it is a United Kingdom problem, but that is not the case because industrialists in Scotland say it is purely an English problem because in Scotland there is a net deficit.

Mr. Thompson: The representations received by the hon. Gentleman are received by all hon. Members. They come down on both sides, some supporting the case of the millers and some the case of the users. I shall come to that shortly. There are serious doubts in the minds of farmers and others, but the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that I cannot deal with them all tonight. The most important of these is the discrimination felt to be caused by exempting from the levy the grain processed into animal feed for stock on the same farm, but charging the levy on grain used by commercial compounders. We have done our best to ensure that the farms exempt from the levy on grain which they process are genuine farms. The value of the output of the feed compounding industry last year was £1·8 billion. People processing on the farm will have exemptions valued at probably less than 1 per cent. of that.

There is a strong cry for equality of misery and we have heard that cry during the debate. There may be other ways of proceeding and we shall certainly need to look carefully at the issue and its development. It is realistic to assume that the levy is here for some time. It is favoured by the Commission and by some member states because it is putting money into the coffers of the Community to the tune of £400 million. Our figures differ but not much.

The mechanism will not remain unchanged. We must look for changes that ease the burden on producers and traders in the United Kingdom. A certain, though limited, distortion is inevitable in any levy system. As I said earlier, that is one of the reasons why we have never been enthusiastic about the principle. Serious problems have arisen mainly because of the haste with which the system was introduced. In an ideal world the Community would never have set its timetable in the way it did.

Many issues needed clarification and many difficulties remain, notably the question of how to fulfil the requirement that the levy, although collected at the processing stage, should be passed back to the producer. I will not go into these now, because I want to hear what hon. Members have to say about them. With the co-operation of the industry, we have been able to sort out many problems and we shall certainly try to continue this process.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I am grateful for this brief opportunity to protest against these proposals on behalf of many of my constituents, and many in the Province of which my constituency is a part, who will suffer as a result of them.

Tonight is one of those miserable occasions to which the House has become accustomed since it resigned its powers in order to become part of the EEC, when a Minister says to the House, "I don't like this proposal. I know you don't like it either. Probably no one likes it. But you'll have to put up with it because I brought it back from the EEC." It is not surprising that in a debate beginning at 7 pm the Government have taken the unusual step of deliberately curtailing so unpleasant an occasion to an hour and a half, perhaps mistaking it for one of the Northern Ireland Orders in Council.

This is a bad tax on three grounds. First, it is unjust; secondly, it is foolish; thirdly, it is damaging. The tax is unjust because it treats differently those who are producing and consuming, according to whether they belong to the same commercial organisation. That is a blatant injustice upon the face of the proposals, and is, I understand, the cause of the main complaint against them. That, at any rate, should be eliminated in any alternative that the Government succeed in putting in the place of these proposals.

The tax is self-defeating, because it operates to reduce the base which it leaves subject to taxation. The very operation of the tax will encourage those forms of production, and those links between production and consumption which enable the tax to be avoided. As a result the level of the levy will need to be increased year after year as the period that the Minister foresaw goes on. It is a self-defeating tax, or at least a self-augmenting tax, which is perhaps the worst sort of tax.

The tax is damaging, in that it will strike against both milling and producing interests in so far as they are separate. Take, for example, in Northern Ireland one milling undertaking which directly employs no fewer than 1,600 people and is in contract with over 200 poultry producers, maintaining 6 million poultry. Both the users and producers in that relationship will be damaged and discriminated against by this measure. Inevitably, the result will be the repression of certain forms of production and certain forms of employment. That is not something that can be accepted in the rest of the United Kingdom. It is certainly not acceptable in Northern Ireland, and I shall join with those who vote against the regulations this evening.

Sir Peter Mills (Torridge and Devon, West): In considering this measure, we must be honest and frank and say that the way in which the co-responsibility levy is being introduced and put into practice will make a terrible mess of things. Anomalies abound. Moreover, as has been said, there will be attempts to get round the levy. Indeed, that is only natural in the farming world.

This problem is entirely the fault of the EC. It was warned by my right hon. Friend the Minister, and no blame can attach to him. When the package deal was being worked out, he warned that there would be problems, and we are now seeing the results, which are not good. However, the original proposals were far worse, and would have been very unfair to British agriculture. The 25-acre exemption from paying the levy would have meant that the European countries were let off while we were penalised.

Unfortunately, this measure is part of the package deal. At the price review, the other parts of that deal were very good. For example, we wanted to continue the beef premium, and the devaluation of the green pound was certainly necessary. The sheepmeat regime continued, and we clearly wanted that. The Opposition and some of my hon. Friends do not seem to understand that the Minister had to steer a balance between what is desirable and what is negotiable. If the Socialists came to power and kept Britain in Europe, the same problem would still arise.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Peter Mills: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to make my speech, I am sure that he will have a chance to make his in a moment.

If we are dealing with many other Ministers and want a package deal, something, somewhere, must give. But having said that, changes will have to be made. The mechanism is not working correctly, and I believe that my right hon. Friend the Minister should be told that at the next price review there will have to be a change. In the circumstances, this measure was right, but it is wrong in practice.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir Peter Mills: I hope that my hon. Friend will have a chance to speak shortly, and that he will forgive me if I do not give way.

The most serious problem is the disadvantage to stock farmers who do not grow corn as against those who do. The difference amounts to £3·37 per tonne. A pig producer or poultry dealer who makes a small margin of profit will be put at a great disadvantage compared with the farmer who grows his grain, feeds it to his stock and does not have to pay the levy.

An old NFU friend of mine, Don Avery, of the Northern Chick Growers Association, says that it will cost his group of 140 members £250,000 extra. That is very unfair. In the south-west of England, the situation is even more serious, because we do not grow so much grain. It is purchased and brought into the area, and so we are at a disadvantage.

I shall quote from the mill manager of Dalgety Agriculture Ltd. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister can answer either at the end of the debate or in a letter the five serious points that he raises. The manager says:

"1. The levy has not reduced the price paid by processors and the consumer gains no benefit—it is therefore a tax on consumption.

2. It does not reduce the price to the livestock feeder who is already under pressure.

3. It encourages integrated production on the large arable units of the east at the expense of the family sized farm in our area."

That is the south-west.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Will the hon. Gentleman be voting against the regulations?

Sir Peter Mills: The hon. Gentleman must try to listen to my speech, feeble though it may be. He can then decide whether I am right. The manager continues by referring to

"4. The complete shambles that has been created in terms of administration to collect the levy."

That too must be altered. Finally, the manager says:

"At the end of the day it has done nothing to reduce production and increase consumption."

Thus the principle is wrong and so is the practice. Urgent changes are required. I believe that my right hon. Friend the Minister should return at the next price review—it cannot be done here and now—and ensure that the levy is deducted from the intervention price. That seems to be fair to all, and easier to administer.

This is only one aspect of a bigger package deal for dealing with surpluses. We have to move on. We must either set aside further price reductions at the end or encourage alternative crops. [Interruption.] Hon. Members bleat at me and ask what I would do. Action must be taken at the next price review. If hon. Members understood what has been happening, they would know that that is the solution. A further package must be agreed. I hope that the Minister will accept my view, which I believe to be the view of many of my hon. Friends, that the package is not working and needs to be changed. We accept that a package deal was agreed and that there are advantages, but there must be change.

Mr. Thomas Torney (Bradford, South): I draw attention to the effect on the poultry industry of our agreeing to the levy. The Government have failed to fight hard enough for the needs of the poultry sector, which uses a tremendous amount of our cereal production. The Minister led the poultry industry to believe that there would be total exemption from the levy, but that will not happen in practice.

The legislation is bad because, although it operates in the interests of some, it could drive others out of business. Some poultry processors have to pay on all their grain, some are totally exempt from the levy and some are in between, paying an average per tonne depending on the percentage of throughput which is exempt.

There is considerable distortion of competition, which ranges from zero to £3·37 per tonne. Given the huge amount of feed tonnage used by the poultry sector, this amounts to a great deal of money and causes considerable disadvantage between British processors.

The levy, as enshrined in European legislation, is intended to run for five years. After talks with Commission officials, the industry formed the opinion that if collecting the tax were successful it would be increased. The distortion of competition will therefore be increased.

As recently as 30 October the Minister said that neither he nor the House of Commons liked the levy. Thus, a vote against the order will not be a defeat for the Government, but an expression of support for the Government in restricting the levy planned in Brussels.

The levy is supposed to dissuade cereal producers from creating surpluses. It will have the reverse effect. It will stimulate production to pay the cost of the levy.

It is a bad principle that the customer should be penalised because the producer over-supplies. Normally, over-production results in lower prices. That is in the best interests of both the poultry and cereals producer. The United Kingdom poultry meat and egg industries have been systematically attacked by continental producers. According to Ministry of Agriculture figures, it seems that once again the United Kingdom has a worse deal than other EEC countries because our producers will have to pay more in levy.

The competitive position of poultry meat and egg imports will be weakened and the jobs of poultry meat and egg workers will be put at risk, as will those of workers in the cereal sector.

The levy is discriminatory between member states which have difficult internal rules. It is discriminatory between producers because some are exempt and some are not. It is discriminatory for the poultry industry because it uses so much cereal, so support prices will remain high when world prices are falling.

The effect on the farmer of a 3 per cent. co-responsibility levy is the same as a 3 per cent. reduction in support prices. However, a 3 per cent. support price reduction would have preferred effects. It would be equal for all cereal producers in the EEC and the United Kingdom and it would cut the work of the intervention board which runs the bureaucracy to collect the levy. It would represent a saving on export restitution where grain is exported and it would encourage poultry meat and egg producers, and processors, to use grain instead of cereal substitutes.

If hon. Members vote against the levy tonight they will be voting not against the Government, but against the EEC which wants to introduce a levy which no one else likes or wants.

7.56 pm

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): It is a pleasure to see the heavyweight presence of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State on the Front Bench in a speaking rather than a speechless role.

There are many major and detailed arguments against the co-responsibility regulations. The retrospection and exemptions cause unfairness and will continue to do so. Purchasers of grain are uncertain whether they are exempt from the levy. It benefits neither the producer nor the consumer, and it is bureaucratic. However, I realise that the levy produces temporary benefit for the European Community budget.

I am against the concept of the co-responsibility levy, not because it will achieve no purpose, but because it will worsen the problem with which it seeks to cope. An example was given to me by a senior member of the National Farmers Union in my county. He tells me that in Austria a co-responsibility levy has been imposed since 1979. The wheat surplus has increased from 80,000 tonnes to 1·2 million tonnes in the seven years since.

Of course, the co-responsibility levy amounts to a price cut for producers, but it is not enough to be an incentive. It is the opposite. It is an incentive only to increase production to counter the financial loss which stems from the co-responsibility levy. I believe that the problems of increased surplus production will be made worse rather than better.

The basic problem which the Community faces is that grain production has grown from 100 million tonnes to 140 million tonnes per annum in the last 10 years, whilst consumption has remained static at about 120 million tonnes. As the European Commission has said, unless drastic action is taken, about 80 million tonnes will be in intervention store by 1991. The cost of that will be unbearable.

The solution proposed by my right hon. Friend the Minister is a voluntary set-aside system. I agree that any set-aside system would be better than none, but I fear that the time for a voluntary set-aside system is past. A voluntary system will not be adequate to cope with the problem facing us. A voluntary set-aside system could, of course, be accompanied by price cuts, but it is my guess that the level of price cuts necessary to reduce production would be unacceptable to other countries within the European Community, let alone to farmers in our country.

It would be necessary to have a compulsory set-aside system plus quotas. I know that quotas create huge problems, but without them agricultural science and productive farming will steadily increase the total output. A voluntary set-aside system will alleviate the problem, but only temporarily. Therefore, we must consider a compulsory system, plus quotas.

However, I am prepared to accept that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has done his best to deal with a bad job and remove some of the rougher edges from the co-responsibility levy. I am therefore prepared to support the Government on the basis that next year my right hon. Friend will be fighting with his colleagues in the Council of Ministers to produce a better regime to cope with grain surpluses.

8.1 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) because I very much agree with his view on a long-term solution. I am happy to forestall the intervention from the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), "What would you do?", by saying so. The proposals described by the hon. Member for Devizes were advanced in a White Paper published by the Social Democratic party in December 1985, and were also advanced by alliance spokesmen in the debate last January. So our proposals providing an alternative means of dealing with the endemic problem of surplus cereals within the Community have been well worked out.

I should like to welcome the Minister to his new office. His performance tonight has been amiable. However, it left more questions in our minds than it gave answers, which is becoming a pattern with Ministers who speak for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. They say that they want to hear what the House has to say, but they go away and do almost the opposite of what the House said should be done.

The origins of this fiasco should be laid not at the door of the Minister, but at that of his superior whose absence tonight is quite understood. However, the Minister cannot escape blame for the imbroglio into which he has plunged almost all sectors of agriculture by his actions.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food described the needs of the cereals industry in a speech that he made in Berlin in January of this year. He set out his philosophy quite clearly in that speech by saying that he rejected the quota approach. In fact, he said that he favoured a free market approach. His actual words were:

"The alternative to the quotas is to expose the industry to more market forces."

Whatever the Minister has achieved since January, it cannot be said that he has exposed the industry to more market forces. He has introduced a form of penalty which is more damaging than a simple price cut. Indeed, it has no benefits for consumers or producers and few for taxpayers.

Mr. Hunter: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maclennan: No, time is limited and it would be unfair to the hon. Gentleman's colleagues to give way.

Perhaps the most serious thing that the Minister said was that it is realistic to accept that we shall have to live with the co-responsibility levy for some time. That is not necessarily the case, and would not be so if the Minister and his colleagues in the Council of Ministers took a trenchant stand and fought for a more rational system. We need only consider milk. Co-responsibility levies were quickly proved to be a wholly inadequate way of dealing with milk surpluses. The European Community came round to the recognition that quantitative limits on price support would be an appropriate and effective way of dealing with the problem of milk. The Minister will never get it right if he sets his face permanently against that approach.

However, the Minister introduced the co-responsibility levy reluctantly, and has, in a sense, tried to wash his hands of all responsibility for it. In a statement issued in mid-July after the regulations had been drawn up, he said:

"A levy had to be accepted in order to achieve a sensible and effective settlement on cereals as a whole."

Nobody who trades in or produces cereals believes that the last price fixing resulted in a sensible and effective settlement on cereals as a whole. Nor did consumers of cereals, for example—the livestock sector—believe that the settlement was sensible or effective.

The price paid for this mess seems to have been high. It has been a system which, in the short term, greatly distorts trade. Cereal users who process on-farm can enjoy an advantage that is not available to other cereal users.

Mrs. Elizabeth Shields (Ryedale): It does discriminate because those hit hardest by the levy are those livestock farmers who do not grow their own cereals. Many have small family farms and are now at a competitive disadvantage——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I hope that the hon. Lady realises that this is a short debate and interventions must be genuine and short.

Mr. Maclennan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mrs. Shields) for making that point.

The distortion is not only between different types of users, as she rightly said; there is also a regional distortion in that those who depend on grass and cannot process on-farm are suffering considerably. That is especially true of parts of Wales and the west country. Nor can it be said that the distortions are operating only on the farms. They are also operating in respect of different types of merchants—the compounders and processors are being hit hard. Nor can it be said that this has been operated with equity throughout the European Community, because under the arrangements which are operating to exempt small producers in Spain, about 90 per cent. of cereal users are totally exempt from the operations of the levy.

What will be the long-term effects of this? If the levy were to be kept at its present level, the distortions would grow as people adapt to what has happened. There would be more on-farm processing. There would be more vertical integration. There would be more use of mobile units and mixers. That would be extremely undesirable because economies will not come from that. There will be considerable diseconomies and considerable unemployment in the area of processing.

Mr. Hunter: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maclennan: No, I shall not give way because, as I have already said, the debate is short.

Is all this misery worthwhile? Will it produce the results? Will it succeed in reducing the mountain? Austria has been given as an example already. The Community is unlikely to introduce a truly penal level that hits deeply, but at any conceivable level the operation of the levy would not reduce the mountain. It will simply continue to exacerbate the distortions in trade.

We must ask what the Minister will do about the anomalies that have emerged. Will the industry have to live with this for the full five years? We have been told that we must live with it for some time, but what do the Government want? Do they want to abolish it or live with it? What amendments are being discussed with the Council to remove the anomalies? Does the Minister intend to introduce an audit system to ensure that any levy deducted from growers is passed on to the Intervention Board, as has been advocated by the National Farmers Union? Does he intend quietly to acquiesce in, or even possibly to advocate, an increase in the levy in order to tackle the cereal surplus problem?

Those questions must be answered and they should be answered tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful for the brevity of the Back-Bench speeches. I remind the House that the debate will finish at 8.39 pm and that the Front Bench spokesmen hope to catch my eye at 8.35 pm.

8.11 pm

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): Last Thursday the Minister of State told the House that the cereal forecast for this year is 24·6 million tonnes. Therefore, the size of the problem is well known to hon. Members.

An interesting breakdown was given in the agricultural review. Within the cereals production for 1985 was 11·9 million tonnes for wheat, 9·6 million tonnes for barley and 0·576 million tonnes for oats. Therefore, the scale of the wheat problem in particular is put in perspective. Cereal production in Britain represents 19·4 per cent. of the gross agriculture output.

Britain's particular problem in relation to our membership of the EEC is that we produce 21 per cent. of the Common Market's wheat production and 24 per cent. of barley. Therefore, we are a major contributor to the problems that we face in the Community.

Of the different groups who have been represented so far in tonight's debate, I was fortunate enough to meet representatives of the Shropshire branch of the Country Landowners' Association on Monday. As my hon. Friends will know, the CLA is particularly worried that the levy is being imposed retroactively on contracts entered into before the levy was introduced. That is a most unfair way of treating the agricultural community. One wonders whether it is legal.

The reason given for back-dating was to prevent fraud, but that is unacceptable. Fraud should be dealt with in the normal way with the guilty party being prosecuted. The measure should not have been introduced retrospectively across the board, catching the innocent producer.

The Shropshire branch of the NFU made its views clear to me on that issue, as it does on many issues relating to agriculture. It feels that the levy will be impossible to operate fairly, and I think that that view is shared by both sides of the House. The levy will inevitably cause an imbalance for arable and livestock farmers and the exemptions will be difficult, if not impossible, to monitor. I hope that when my hon. Friend the Minister replies he will explain the Ministry's opposition to a proper audit on the deduction of levy from growers because that is a point of considerable concern to the industry.

UKASTA believes that this is an effort and expense for both trade and Government which is not justified and will leave the present problem unresolved. It is particularly concerned about the lack of consultation and preparation. I can only wish it well in its legal action against this unfortunate and hopeless measure.

The Commission's objective of a policy for quality is unlikely to be obtained. I do not think that any hon. Member thinks that it will curtail surpluses. Again, we do not believe that that will save some of the costs of sustaining those surpluses.

Therefore, we must look at the problem into which the Government have got themselves. They sought a package of measures, including price restraint and set-aside, which were not acceptable to the other 11 member states. There again, the options supported by the other 11 would have been far worse for Britain if our Ministers at the negotiating table had not been strong minded and had not fought off the proposals. The House and the Opposition must recognise that. Indeed, the industry must recognise it and give credit where it is due.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, speaking in the House last week, said that he did not like the measure. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, in his spirited defence of the Ministry tonight, has repeated that view. Therefore, that view is shared on both sides of the House. Bearing in mind the advantages that came out of that package, particularly the beef premium, we shall move forward at the next round of negotiations.

The Opposition must not try to kid the Conservative party that their motion tonight achieves anything. It has not split the Conservative party on the Back Benches and that will be reflected in the Division. Equally, as I know only too well from my meeting in Shrewsbury on Monday, it does not fool the farmers. They are aware of the problems that exist and that something must be done. Undoubtedly, we are faced tonight with a great deal of EEC gobbledegook, which is not welcome in Britain, but at the moment we have no way of getting out of it.

My message to my right hon. Friend would be to urge him in future to do it the French way—when the matter goes back to the negotiating table, make sure we follow the advice from Shropshire and put Britain's interests first, second, third and fourth in future negotiations.

8.16 pm

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I am not sure what is more demeaning of Parliament—a Minister who tells us that we cannot vote against this measure because it will be a meaningless gesture, or Tory Members of Parliament who tell us how much they are opposed to this and how damaging it will be to agriculture, but are not prepared to vote against it.

We are debating an important development in agriculture policy. It is a reflection of the low priority that the Government have increasingly attached to agriculture that we are having to encapsulate all the speeches and arguments within one and a half hours.

When the Minister says that it is realistic to assume that the measure will be with us for some time, by gum, he is right. First, we know that it will not necessarily stay at £3.37 a tonne. It could become an even greater imposition on our industry. Secondly, we have been down this road before. We have had the milk co-responsibility levy. In passing, may I say to our Front Bench that we shall be more enthusiastic about cereals quotas when we see them having an effect on the milk surplus after all the traumas we went through on that.

Not one hon. Member has argued that this measure will solve the problem—the common agricultural policy. That is costing us—all the member states of the Community—about £15,000 million a year, the bulk of it being wasted in intervention and storage and export subsidies.

Mr. Hunter rose—

Mr. Strang: The measure will not cut the cereals surplus, which has been rising and which is costing us so much money. There seems to be a consensus on that. Yet, apparently, we are not going to reject it, judging from some of the speeches of Conservative Members. It is an imposition on our industry for a number of reasons. First, it discriminates against small farmers. In the main, small farmers use compounders while the larger farmers tend to be able to undertake their own compounding and mixing. Secondly, it discriminates against the feed compound industry, as the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and others have argued. It is an industry that is providing a valuable service in terms of processing and employment. It is also a serious imposition on our pig and poultry industries as it is understood that about 70 per cent. of the cost of production in these industries is accounted for by cereals.

The position of certain operators in the poultry industry will be undermined arbitrarily. We have had a successful poultry industry over the years, but it has been crippled progressively for various reasons that I shall not develop now. It can be said, however, that in this country we took a lead in the poultry industry. If a large proportion of an enterprise's poultry production is within 15 miles of its feed compound unit, it will not pay the levy on that element of the cereal input. The bulk of large producers, however, have most of their production more than 15 miles away from the feed compound unit, and these may be the most efficient producers. Through this measure, we may be discriminating against the best companies that we should be encouraging to expand.

The measure is an attack upon the poultry industry because it will in practice discriminate against British poultry producers. My hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) has said that Italy will not operate the proposed system and instead will chip in roughly the sum that the Commission reckons would be raised. In other words, Italy will forget about it. I am not sure how many Conservative Members have been to France recently or have spoken to those who have. We are always the first to develop our bureaucracy and intervention systems. We shall police the system and ensure that it is operated effectively, but is anyone pretending that the French will do that? Of course they will not. We know that and our industry knows that. That is why the measure discriminates against our producers and attacks our industry and our jobs.

The effect on trade outside the Community is not all that important because of the high cereals prices. The export subsidy to shift grain from the Community is about £80 per tonne. I note that the Minister is nodding his head. He will be aware that the world price of grain is about a third of the price at which it is being traded within the EEC. That goes back to the deal which was struck between the German and French Governments long before we joined the Community. It is a grotesque system. As I have said, about 70 per cent. of costs in the pig and poultry industries is accounted for by cereals, yet the cost of production is about three times the world price. Against that background there is no chance of our poultry industry making any impact on world markets.

This measure is nonsensical and it is not good enough for Conservative Members merely to make speeches that are critical of it. We want it to be defeated this evening.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): As a member of the trade, perhaps I might correct one or two of the anomalies that have developed this evening. First, the impression has been given—sadly by both sides of the House—that the trade is in utter chaos because of the co-responsibility levy, that our trade feels discriminated against in certain sectors and that prices have made us uncompetitive. That is not true. The trade does not like the levy and we support the Minister in his opposition to it. I support and welcome the spirited speech of my hon. Friend the Minister which was made in difficult circumstances.

There is no chaos but there would be if the levy were to be increased next time round, and that is my greatest fear. There has been some talk that the levy could be doubled, and if that were to happen the impact upon our producers and consumers would give effect to the fears that have been expressed this evening. The effect on the compound industry could be catastrophic. The number who mill and mix on their own farms would increase, and that would mean a serious loss of employment in the compound trade. My hon. Friend the Minister must resist any increase in the levy this time round.

An increase in the levy would encourage the use of Third world substitutes, and there is no doubt that cheap substitutes exist. If we price ourselves out of the market by putting our prices for feed wheat and feed barley above those that the trade has to pay for Third world substitutes, there would be a massive switch to those products. That would be a catastrophe for the compound industry and for feed users and for those who grow the grain.

If the levy were doubled, as has been rumoured, the evasion which has been hinted at tonight on the part of various producers would be encouraged. At present, there is no evasion and the trade is living with £3·37. It does not like the levy and farmers do not like it, but we are living with it. If the levy were increased, the impact upon the trade would be severe.

One of the reasons why we have got away with it, as it were, this time is that the price has risen for market reasons. Producers in the southern Mediterranean region had a disastrous harvest and they need our grain. As a result, the price is high. Had the price been low, the effect of the £3·37 levy would have been felt. If we had had wheat and barley on the farms at £90 a tonne, the £3·37 levy would have had a very much greater impact.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to resist in the price review any increase in price. Indeed, we would like to see a reduction in price if possible. Secondly, he must change the system whereby the levy is paid at the point of sale. I agree with the hon. Member for East Lothian that the fact that the levy is paid at the point of processing means that in some instances it will not be paid. In some instances, merchants may hold the money and never pay it over, or may do so only unwillingly. If we are to have this awful system, my hon. Friend must try to alter the point of sale. I hope that on these two matters my hon. Friend will get the message through to his right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I join those who have criticised the measure that is before us, and my criticism can be boiled down to four reasons. First, I do not like the retrospective element. That is not the way that we do things in the United Kingdom. It is entirely wrong also that we should have only and hour and a half to debate such a major change. Secondly, extra policing will be required by the Ministry. We have introduced the horrible co-responsibility levy, and if the centres of operation of a farm are more than 15 miles apart the undertaking may not mill its own grain without paying the levy, but how will this be monitored? I know that many farmers, not necessarily large ones, have specialist operations that are much more than 15 miles apart. That distance is nothing, especially in the midlands where we have an excellent road system. We in Britain do not like passing regulations that we cannot enforce or monitor. I do not imagine that my hon. Friend the Minister contemplates a large increase in the Ministry's inspectorate as a result of this measure, but I think that he will get it, however. I hope that he will pay especial attention to that consequence.

Thirdly, will it be a fact that any farmer who mills his own produce will have to have a CCL 9 before he can continue to do so? Will he be exempt without an application for a CCL 9?

I shall vote for the measure. I know that the Minister fought against it in Brussels. It is part of a package, but it will be a sad day for farmers when we have a co-responsibility levy such as this. It would be better, as has been said before, and possibly will be said in future, to have a straight price cut. That is the simple approach for the House to adopt.

8.30 pm

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): I congratulate the Parliamentary Secretary on his appearance at the Dispatch Box. He has had his baptism of fire—not that there has been much fire from the Opposition. It is clear, looking at the empty Labour Benches, that he will have to consider what is said behind him rather than what is said in front of him.

I have the privilege to represent the constituency in Britain with the highest number of pigs. Indeed, there are more pigs than people. To serve that industry, a number of important compound feed merchants have developed. In our area, there is considerable concern about this levy. The main criticism, as many hon. Members on both sides of the House have said, is that it is unfair. It is not even-handed between one producer and another and, therefore, it distorts the market.

The first matter to which I should like to draw the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary concerns large pig breeders who have been buying considerable quantities of feed from efficient compound manufacturers. They will be put at a distinct disadvantage in competing with pig farmers who mill on the farm. This is discrimination. To make matters worse, I understand that there is an anomaly in the definition of "producer". It was originally assumed that the word meant a producer of cereals, but I understand that it was subsequently resolved that the definition included a livestock producer who did not produce cereals.

The second serious matter is the effect of the levy on the compound feed manufacturer. Undoubtedly, there will be an incentive to expand milling on the farm. This will affect the throughput of manufacturers, their profitability and, inevitably, if the levy continues, employment. It might be said that at £3·37 a tonne, the impact will not be great. The feeling on both sides of the House is that this levy will not achieve the objective of reducing surpluses. At the time of the next price review, there will be considerable pressure to increase the levy substantially. There has been talk in the trade of the levy going up to £10 or £15 per tonne. That would be catastrophic. The distortions and the anomalies will have a frightening and unfair effect on people in the farming and compound feed manufacturing industries.

We realise that the Government fought very hard against this levy. We appreciate that it was part of a package. There is not much that we can do about it at this stage, but we strongly urge my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary and his colleagues, when they go back to the negotiating table, to get rid of the levy and sensibly attack subsidies by policies of set-aside and of price reduction. That course is very important, and I urge it upon my hon. Friend.

8.32 pm

Mr. Donald Thompson: By leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I say that time is short, so I will not have an opportunity to reply to all contributions to the debate. Much of the trade comment in recent weeks and some comments during the debate suggested that we would be better off without a levy. That may be so, but the Council agreed that it would be introduced. In view of its potential value in supporting the Community budget and the positive support that it enjoys in the Commission and in other member states, it would be unwise to regard its immediate elimination as a likely option.

I listened carefully to the debate. I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister to the wise words of my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) who was supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) and also —I thank him for his nice words—by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sunderland (Mr. Maclennan). The hon. Gentleman mentioned co-responsibility levies. The co-responsibility levy on milk continued for a long time and was not adequately supported by other measures. As I said earlier, we must make sure that we support this co-responsibility with other measures, many of which have been trailed during the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway) mentioned retrospectivity and the legal action that is in train. He also mentioned audit. The brief on the audit matter that hon. Members received may have misled them. That matter still lies on the table. We are ready to discuss some sort of realistic, cost-effective, simple audit. Simplicity and cost-effectiveness will be difficult to achieve. The hon. Members for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) and for Bradford, South (Mr. Torney) mentioned poultry with some ferocity. [Interruption.] They were not hen-pecked, of course. In real terms, grain prices are 50 per cent. lower than they were 10 years ago, and at present our grain prices are the cheapest in Europe. That does a great deal to make our poultry industry efficient.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) for his clear and well-informed speech which set many matters straight. I listened carefully to what he said about future price reviews and point-of-sale levies. The co-responsibility levy is just one element in the policy that the Community is pursuing in the cereal sector. The Government agree that the levy on its own will not cure the sector's problems. The Community must not forget the crucial importance of maintaining a restrictive approach to overall support. The Community also needs to examine further measures to bring about structural changes which, in one way or another, are inevitable. For better or for worse, we must assume that the levy will continue to apply for some time. Annulling the regulations will do nothing to alter that.

Mr. Home Robertson: By leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I join other hon. Members in congratulating the Parliamentary Secretary on the way in which he has tried to hold his untenable position. He has conducted himself with characteristic charm and good humour. I suppose that those qualities have led the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Minister of State to leave him here to face the music.

As I predicted at the beginning of the debate, no one expressed any degree of support for the levy. It is not good enough for people such as the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) to say that they will vote for the levy with a heavy heart. I say, for the benefit of Tory Members, that that kind of cop-out will not do. This levy is damaging to their constituents. They cannot get out of it in this way. We have sought to give the House an opportunity to vote against this useless and, indeed, positively harmful levy. I urge the House to vote for our prayer to revoke the regulations.

Rate Support Grant (Scotland)

8.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): I beg to move,

That the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) Order 1986, dated 22nd July 1986, a copy of which was laid before this House on 24th July, be approved.

The order has two purposes. The first is to reduce the grant payable in respect of 1986-87 by £125·3 million. The second is to adjust the rate support grant payable to Scottish local authorities in respect of 1985-86, the overall effect being an increase of £69·2 million. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State announced his decision to make these changes in grant in his statement of 23 July and the order was laid the following day.

Local authority current expenditure budgets in Scotland, as measured for comparison with guidelines, come to more than £3,100 million. Thus, even before including their capital expenditure programmes, which are substantial, local authorities account for about half the expenditure for which my right hon. and learned Friend is responsible. That is a very large sum by any standards. I will not detain the House with a recital of our general policy on public expenditure. That policy, and the reasons for it, are well known. So is the success which it is achieving. The continued success of the policy will depend in some measure on our continuing to exercise careful control of local authority expenditure. In 1978-79, the year before we took office, the volume of local authority current expenditure grew by almost 7 per cent. from the previous year. Therefore, in 1978-79, local authorities increased their expenditure by 7 per cent. more than the amount required to cover increased costs.

We have now, after seven years' hard effort, stabilised the volume of expenditure. Local authorities' budgets for 1986-87 show a small reduction — in volume terms — compared with 1978-79. This is welcome and demonstrates the good sense of an increasing number of local authorities. This increasingly responsible approach by local authorities has enabled us to make the generous and realistic provision for the next financial year, 1987-88, which my right hon. and learned Friend also announced on 23 July.

However, this is no time to slacken our efforts to keep spending under control, and indeed the greater the number of local authorities that are willing to play by the rules, the more important it is that their efforts should not be jeopardised by a few irresponsible authorities. Penalties for overspending will therefore continue to have an important role until the new system of local government finance, set out in the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government", is in place.

Before I go any further, I should say something in general terms about the penalty system. I do not like it any more than do the local authorities, nor I suppose any more than Opposition Members, whose colleagues set up the system in the 1970s. But I must recognise, as did the Labour Government of that time, that expenditure has to be contained within the levels of provision that the Government have made. The penalties system is therefore designed as a righting mechanism which will put this aspect of public expenditure back on course, when a breach is threatened; and the penalty tariffs provide a strong disincentive for sensible and reasonable authorities attempting the breach in the first place. All that has changed since the Labour Government introduced the idea is that the system now operates in a much more selective and fairer way. Previously, grant abatement affected all authorities whether or not they were high spenders. Now abatements are related clearly to the extent of an individual authority's overspend and those that keep within guidelines are unaffected by it.

The majority of authorities take heed of the guidelines that the Government set for them. The number of authorities budgeting within guidelines stood at 15 in 1984-85. This increased to 30 in 1985-86 and to 40 in the current year out of a total of 65. Several more are only just over guideline. This is clearly relevant to the Government and to the ratepayers who benefit directly from it. There remains, however, a hard core of authorities that spend well in excess of guidelines. In total, Scottish local authorities planned overspend for 1986-87 is £118 million or 3·9 per cent. Only four authorities account for £107 million or 90 per cent. of this overspend. It is right that the consequences of their action should be brought home to them and that penalties should be concentrated on those authorities. Our arrangements ensure this. I will have more to say in a moment about those authorities.

I shall now deal with the details of the order. The order falls into two parts. First, it reduces rate support grant for 1986-87 for those authorities which have planned to overspend. The needs element of rate support grant has been reduced by £125·3 million. This reduction is concentrated entirely on the 25 overspenders. As for last year, a tariff has been applied relating the reduction in grant to the overspend. This year the tariff starts at zero and rises to a reduction of 10 per cent. of the overspend for a 1·5 per cent excess. It then rises more steeply to 70 per cent. for a 3 per cent. excess and more steeply again to 110 per cent. for an excess of 3·5 per cent. or more. Annex 2 of the report contains a graph of the tariff and the calculations of penalties for individual authorities. The penalties are listed in column 7 of page 9.

The four authorities which I mentioned earlier will attract 94 per cent. of the penalty. I emphasise that it is, of course, still possible for them to recoup those penalties for their ratepayers, by reducing their overspends, and hence their penalties, at outturn. For example, an authority with a budget overspend of 6 per cent. which then halves its excess will have its penalty cut by two thirds. If it reduces its excess to 2 per cent. the penalty will be reduced in cash by 90 per cent. There is still time for those authorities to take the necessary steps, and if they do so they will be acting clearly in the interests of their ratepayers. I hope that they will take heed of this opportunity and I urge Opposition Members, if they have the ratepayers' interests at heart, to join me in urging those authorities to revise their expenditure plans now. They have of course had full notice of our intentions since 23 July, and should have been planning revised budgets since then. Indeed, in the past local authorities have reduced their expenditure substantially at outturn as indeed they did last year.

In fact, turning to the second part of the order, the effectiveness of grant penalties is demonstrated by the return of provisional outturn for 1985-86. At the budget stage 30 authorities kept within guidelines and the total overspend was £90·7 million. Provisional outturns show 37 authorities within guideline and the total overspend down to £47·2 million. The effect of this is to bring penalties down from £126·6 million to £57·4 million, a saving of £69.2 million. Authorities, I am glad to say, clearly took heed of our exhortations. I was particularly pleased to see that Edinburgh came down to guideline last year after our selective action to reduce its rates, though it subsequently submitted a grossly extravagant budget for 1986-87, thus bringing selective action on itself again.

Details of the 1985-86 penalties are given in annexes 3 and 4 to the report. For those authorities affected, the revised penalties are shown in column 7 on pages 12 and 13 with the adjustments that will be made to grant payments in column 9.

On 23 July, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State announced the totals for relevant current expenditure provision and aggregate Exchequer grant for 1987-88. In recognition of the efforts made by increasing numbers of authorities to come down to guideline, provision was set at local authority budgets, adjusted for the interim teachers' pay award, plus 3·75 per cent., a total figure of £3,277 million. Aggregate Exchequer grant was set at £2,160 million. On 1 October we issued current expenditure guidelines to all authorities. The effect of those decisions is that there is in general no reason for rate increases next year, unless local authorities increase their spending above inflation or fail to bring their spending to guideline in the current year.

The generous overall settlement means that no authority can claim that its guideline is unattainable. Every authority has a guideline which is at least a real terms freeze on its present guideline and no authority is being asked to make a cash reduction on its present budget. Several authorities have made representations to us because they have been set guidelines below assessed need in the past. The number of authorities with guidelines below assessed need has been reduced from 30 to 19; for most of those still below assessment the gap has been narrowed and for none is it wider. It is now up to the local authorities to respond by budgeting within those guidelines. I give authorities due warning that any that do not do so will face severe penalties again next year.

Hon. Members may be wondering whether the order we are considering this evening has any implications for the discussions now taking place on teachers' pay. There are two points to make. If a settlement of the teachers' dispute is reached on the basis proposed by my right hon. and learned Friend, the costs of an additional 8·2 per cent. on the pay bill from January to March 1987—that is the part of the financial year we are dealing with in this order — will be met fully by additional provision and a corresponding increase in grant. There would be a further order in respect of the grant.

Secondly, we have indicated our willingness to meet the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities' request for a disregard in respect of £27 million of expenditure it estimates to incur this year as a result of the interim pay award of April 1986, and which is in excess of its budgeted provision. In fact, my right hon. and learned Friend and I had a useful meeting yesterday with representatives of COSLA. They were worried about the threat of renewed disruption in the classrooms if the teachers do not accept my right hon. and learned Friend's proposals for settling the dispute. The Government share that concern.

My right hon. and learned Friend's proposals are generous, offering teachers a prospect of average increases of 30 per cent. between April 1985 and October 1987. What is of concern for us tonight is the consequences for rates. COSLA obviously shares that concern and is, so far as I am aware, entirely content with our proposals, which I have mentioned, on disregard and on additional resources and grant.

Indeed, my right hon. and learned Friend and I were also encouraged yesterday by COSLA's clear agreement on the need to secure a proper deal covering conditions of service, its concern to avoid further disruption in the classrooms, and its concern to take all possible steps within the limits of my right hon. and learned Friend's offer to secure a settlement to the dispute. We regard COSLA as having a major responsibility in the weeks ahead in encouraging the teachers to consider my right hon. and learned Friend's proposals in a moderate and sensible way.

Grant penalties are an essential part of the present system of local government finance. We inherited them from the Labour party and have made them fairer and more effective. In the present system of local government finance the disparity between those who pay rates and those who vote requires this form of constraint on local authority spending. The new system that we shall shortly introduce will be designed to improve local accountability and to remove the need for such penalties. Meanwhile, we must work within the present system. I hope that authorities which have bugeted above guideline will try to reduce their excesses. Given both the level of provision and guidelines, no authority will have an excuse for budgeting over guideline next year and thus creating a greater burden on their ratepayers. It is my sincere hope that they will not. I commend the order to the House.

9.4 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): There is, I am afraid, a certain familiarity about these debates. We have heard it all before from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State. The most depressing thing was his suggestion that he might have the opportunity of making another such speech. I sincerely hope—"sincerely" was overused in his speech — that that turns out to be unfounded.

The trouble is that the Government have got it wrong over a number of years, but they persist in their error. There is always a danger of a certain resigned acceptance among Opposition Members: Ministers are incorrigible, they are set in their ways and the only hope is that at some reasonably early date they will be summarily dismissed. That is an understandable feeling on Opposition Benches, but we have a duty to argue the case and explain and underline our opposition to the order and the general abatement that it represents.

We are discussing a form of penalty. The Minister engagingly referred to its origins under a Labour Government, but I suggest that there is one large distinction. That is that it is now being used with particular relish which, on occasions, amounts almost to venom. It has done a great deal to destroy any chance of a working relationship between the Government and local authorities. There has been scant regard for principle and, more importantly, for the needs of the community which, to some extent, depend upon the services provided by local government.

The trouble is that the penalty is based on arbitrary guidelines and is set at a level that follows no obvious or logical pattern. This year we are being asked to claw out of the budgets halfway through the financial year the substantial sum of £125 million. We are entitled to protest about the impact and about the wrong-headed approach that the Government are displaying.

I am glad that the Minister referred to the difficulties over teachers' pay. That gives an air of particular uncertainty to what is happening at the moment. Not only are local authorities suffering from the cumulative pounding of recent years but one of their major items of expenditure under the rate support grant settlement is clouded in uncertainty. We know that the teachers' salary bill is likely to be £500 million or more, but no one knows how much more, or what will happen.

I am glad to see the Secretary of State in his place. He knows that I make no secret of the fact that we have been dismayed by the recent turn of events. I understand and recognise that there was a meeting yesterday between COSLA and the Secretary of State. It is taking the artificial conventions of dialogue beyond any useful point to describe it as a useful meeting. Having talked to some of those who were at it, I have not been given that impression. What appears to have happened—I regret this as well—is that COSLA was told in no uncertain terms that any initiative that it might want to pursue in terms of the financial aspects of the package was ruled out with a finality that does something to snuff hope of an early solution to the problem.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): The hon. Gentleman will, I presume, have read the reported remarks of Councillor Fagan, the president of the convention, this morning. He said that suggestions that had come from some quarters that the local authorities might top up the costs of the Main report above the level of phasing proposed by the Government were, in his word, "preposterous".

Mr. Dewar: I have spent much time in the past 24 hours not only with Councillor Fagan but with several other local government figures who were at the meeting. Whether it is preposterous or not, let us get it on the record and clarify the situation. As I understand it—if I have misunderstood, it is important that that is made clear—even if there was such an intention or willingness to consider that possibility, the right hon. and learned Gentleman made it clear that it would not be allowed and that COSLA was told in no uncertain terms that it would meet the strongest possible opposition, and a series of barriers, financial and otherwise, which would rule out that possibility.

Mr. Rifkind: I am happy to confirm that. That is indeed what I said. I also asked the convention whether it wanted to support the suggestion of the convenor from Dumfries and Galloway region, which was that local authorities might wish to finance the difference between the phased award and a full immediate payment. I was told that, irrespective of the Government's view, the convention did not wish to put forward such a proposal.

Mr. Dewar: I am aware that Councillor Jameson of Dumfries and Galloway, who is not a member of my Parliament — sorry, party — [Interruption.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman can laugh—he is entitled to do so—but I take these things fairly seriously in view of the crisis. I am aware that that idea has been floated. I do not speak for COSLA, and it would not be right for me to say what COSLA's attitude on these matters is, but I am clear that it sought to establish the Government's stance.

Irrespective of whether COSLA would have considered such an initiative, the right hon. and learned Gentleman and I are at one, at least, in establishing that the Government rule out that possibility. The major role for COSLA, which the Under-Secretary of State referred to, in the Government's mind at least, is simply to support the Government's departure from the financial package in the Main report. That seems a strange way in which to treat a group who are the employers and which, when, as we all hope, there is a settlement, will be faced with funding a substantial proportion of the costs.

One thing is clear. The Government have set up a confrontation—I regret that—by the decision on the Main report which was announced recently. As for local government, the Secretary of State is determined that nobody will rescue him from that confrontation. My earnest hope is that parents, pupils and the education system will not be asked to pay too high a price for the Treasury's intransigence and possibly the right hon. and learned Gentleman's pride.

On the 1986-87 figures, we are all aware that some £27 million is part of the financing of the 5·5 per cent. interim settlement and has not been budgeted for in the present figures. I am aware that there was an agreement that if a settlement was reached that sum would be disregarded in terms of penalities and measurement against guidelines.

I take it from what the Under-Secretary of State said that, even if, sadly, we do not reach a settlement in the teachers' dispute in the near future, that £27 million will be fully disregarded. I put that to him because my impression as a result of talking to people who were at the COSLA meeting—I am sure that it may just have been a misunderstanding—was that that was not clear to them.

I want to know quite clearly whether the £27 million—the fag-end of the 5·5 per cent. pay increase—will be disregarded, whatever happens to the teachers' dispute. I take that to be the case from the Minister's remarks. If I am wrong, I hope that he will intervene. He does not, so I take it that I am right. I am grateful for that, and I think that COSLA will be as well. I put it to the Minister—I am right about that?

Mr. Ancram: Wait until my reply.

Mr. Dewar: We shall wait for the hon. Gentleman's reply with more interest than usual.

I must move on as there are other important matters to consider, although they do not have quite the same sharp topicality. The Minister argued that the penalties have been working and have done a great deal to restrict local government expenditure. Reasonably, from his point of view, the Minister drew attention to the fact that some £69 million of the clawback for the previous financial year has been paid back. There is, of course, an impact as a result of that type of penalty. Most extortion rackets have an impact on their victim. Of course local authorities have been forced to cut services. They have been forced to contemplate retrenchment when often social need demands expansion, but that is no defence for this form of policy. It is equally irrelevant to say that the Government are penalising only 25 authorities when those authorities represent 73 per cent. of total local government expenditure in Glasgow.

I was not clear about the four authorities that together account for £107 million of the £125 million. I make it three authorities, but perhaps simple arithmetic is not the Minister's strong point—[Interruption.] That may also apply to myself, but I think that at least I have got it right.

I speak for every Labour Member when I say that it is unreasonable to expect the Strathclyde region to find £76 million of savings within its budget this year. Inevitably, when that is squashed into the last six months of the year it will put jobs at risk and threaten services. It will mean that the delivery of those services that can be maintained will be dangerously stretched. These are not theoretical matters or some sort of accountancy exercise. This is a threatening situation for those who are working on the ground and those who rely on such services.

Similarly, it is right to say that the situation in Lothian is thoroughly unsatisfactory to many people who have nothing to do with my political standpoint. Lothian has been penalised by £25 million, yet the Minister knows that that penalty is based upon a Conservative budget. The author of this profligacy and financial irresponsibility is Councillor Brian Meek and his Conservative colleagues. The Minister is somewhat hard on poor Councillor Meek who, after all, is an electoral victim of the Government's well-earned unpopularity — despite Councillor Meek's efforts to distance himself from the Government. It is a bit hard that he should now be condemned by Ministers for overspending. It is even harder on the people of Lothian who will see the cuts biting and taking effect.

My own city of Glasgow, which is penalised by £5·5 million, has enormous problems that are self-evident and pressing. I need not say much about them tonight, because they are in the mind of every hon. Member who represents a Glasgow constituency. It is extremely sad that we should be faced with these additional and quite unnecessary problems.

A fourth authority that is quite outwith the figures that the Minister mentioned is Edinburgh, which finds itself in a very odd situation. It has been penalised under section 5 of the 1966 Act. That is odd, because most of us thought that the section 5 procedure was no longer relevant and that it would not be used. It was, and the strange comparators of Kirkcaldy and Motherwell resulted in a difficult situation where the excess over guidelines at £9·6 million was reduced by agreement to £6·3 million.

To anyone following these matters carefully that would mean that the penalty would come down from £10·6 million to £3·6 million. That is a reasonable assumption, but, predictably, with this Government it turns out to be unsound. In fact, the penalty remains at £10·5 million and the gap of almost £7 million will have to be closed by borrowing during the year until the money that we all know will ultimately be repaid is repaid by Government. The result will be an additional charge, which in terms of interest rates will, I am told, be about £750,000. To me that is a Gilbertian situation that is impossible to defend. There is no real excuse for it.

The Minister knows that he will have to pay that money back. There was plenty of time because the adjustment that led to the diminution on the excess over guidelines was agreed on 18 June, yet the order was not laid until 24 July. I am advised that there is no legal impediment as that would have prevented the logical and sensible step of calculating the penalties on the reduced excess over guidelines being followed. The outcome will be an additional burden on the ratepayer that is not needed. I am afraid that the reason is a rather vindictive approach to the particular problems of Edinburgh.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. This is an important point, and I am sure that he would wish to be fair. As he knows, penalties are drawn on budgets, and penalties that follow in the given financial year come from the budgets and can be readjusted on outturn if the expenditure is either lower or higher than that budgeted for. The hon. Gentleman is in effect making the case that Edinburgh, which set a very high budget because of the series of procedures, has now reduced its expenditure and, therefore, should attract a reduced penalty during this financial year. Would the hon. Gentleman be happy for Edinburgh to have that reduced penalty, in the knowledge that other authorities, such as Strathclyde, which may also make reductions in its expenditure during the current year, will have to suffer the same penalties as it suffers now that it will obtain the reduction only, as in Edinburgh's case, when the outturn is known?

Mr. Dewar: That is a very feeble argument. All my hon. Friends understand that there is a clear distinction to be drawn. Strathclyde may or may not make reductions, perforce, during the financial year, but we shall not know whether it does so until the outturn figures are known. We know that there has been a big reduction in Edinburgh. Both rates and expenditure have been adjusted, but that applied well before the order was laid.

If the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State is asking me, triumphantly, whether I should be happy if Edinburgh were treated in this way and whether, by implication, that would be unfair to other authorities, the answer is that I should be happy if Edinburgh were treated in that way. I am sustained in that view by the fact that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities unanimously—I stress and underline the word "unanimously", because it included all political groupings—backed Edinburgh on this point. Therefore, to pray in aid unfairness to other local authorities when they want the Minister to come into line with logic and reality seems to me to be very poor.

The Minister said that he has been able to be more generous than he was in 1985-86 regarding clawbacks. I suppose that the argument is that the robbery has been committed again but that the take is considerably smaller. That is very doubtful. The Minister will have seen COSLA's figures. The budgets, in volume terms, of three of the largest authorities have been taken for 1986-87 and the increase over 1985-86 has been calculated. The increase in penalty between 1985-86 and 1986-87 has then been examined.

In Glasgow's case, between 1985-86 and 1986-87 the budget, in volume terms, dropped by 2·7 per cent., but the penalty increased by 3·8 per cent. In Strathclyde, the budget, in volume terms, decreased by 2·5 per cent., but the penalty increased by 12 per cent. In Lothian there was an increase, in volume terms, but it was very modest—0·3 per cent. However, the penalty increased by 190 per cent. That represents a very large vote of no confidence in the Minister's complacent defence. This is thoroughly unsatisfactory. The clawbacks are unnecessary, in the circumstances, in that they are unsound in their methodology and unpredictable and capricious in their consequences.

I welcome the fact that the basis for the compilation of guidelines for 1987-88 has been changed. The basis will be the budgets for the previous year, plus an inflation rate of 3½ per cent. We shall dispute whether that is an adequate percentage figure to apply. However, I welcome the fact that the previous year's budget is now being used as the basis for calculating the guidelines.

If the guidelines for 1987-88 are priced back to 1986-87, and if the abatement penalty in this order is then applied, one discovers that the total penalty to be paid is only £12 million, not £125 million. That puts into perspective some of the hysterical charges that are still being made in Government circles.

To put that proposition even more clearly and relevantly, we are in the quite extraordinary position that next year's guidelines will be based upon this year's budget, plus inflation. That is believed by the Minister to be a reasonable basis for next year's expenditure. However, the same base budget starting point for this year is attracting a massive penalty of £125 million. There is no conceivable explanation for that policy. The only difference is the addition of an inflation factor. Next year it will be completely acceptable, although this year it is believed to be financially irresponsible.

If one looks at the fine detail, is it not extraordinary that three of the 25 authorities that have been penalised have budgeted for expenditure in 1986-87 that is less than their assessed need? Much good it has done them, because at the end of the day they are to be penalised, together with the other authorities. It is an illogical, depressing but, I am afraid, an all too typical performance by this Government, and we shall certainly vote against the order tonight.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): It is very nice that many Opposition Members have come tonight to listen to reality rather than to what we have heard in the past 20 minutes. I welcome the order.

Year by year, I have complained, but tonight I want to thank my hon. Friend the Minister and the Government. For ages I have felt that rural areas with a reputation for good housekeeping have been penalised by some obscure, incomprehensible formula. Tonight, at last, reality has prevailed and some of the figures that I shall mention are certainly welcome.

I find the observations of COSLA most unhelpful. It would be of benefit to local authorities if they tried to work a little harder with Government instead of trying to oppose everything root and branch. If COSLA showed a little leadership instead of a great deal of self interest, Scotland would benefit enormously from constructive advice. But all we get is pages of criticism in the document that they have sent us. With an attitude like that it is no wonder that nobody in Scotland wants an Assembly.

I wish to consider annex 2 of the guidelines. I am glad to note that Dumfries and Galloway has an 11·6 per cent. increase in its guideline. That is the highest increase in Scotland. Indeed, that is good news for south-west Scotland and a just reward for sensible finance over many years. The district councils within Dumfries and Galloway——

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): The hon. Gentleman is taking the same line as the Minister. He speaks as if this was just part of a balance sheet in a vacuum. What does he know of the effect that these cuts have had on the services to which people are entitled? Those services have been drastically reduced and, in some cases, completely destroyed. That is the other side of the legend.

Sir Hector Monro: The right hon. Gentleman must not exaggerate in his usual way. It is ridiculous to say that services have been completely destroyed because obviously they have not. I wish that he would realise that the root cause of most local authority problems is that they over-budget. Their budgets are high up in the clouds, and when they must reduce those budgets they talk of cuts. The budgets are merely being reduced back to reality.

The four district councils within Dumfries and Galloway have all had an increase of 9·5 per cent. which is the fifth highest in Scotland. That will, indeed, be most welcome. It shows that the formula is now weighted much more favourably towards authorities which have tried to keep within their guidelines and have not overspent in the past or planned to do so in future.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): As I read the calculations, if one put next year's guideline for Nithsdale, for example, in real terms for the present financial year, Nithsdale would not incur a penalty. How can the hon. Gentleman justify Nithsdale incurring a penalty this year when on an equivalent level of expenditure next year it will not incur a penalty?

Sir Hector Monro: I am welcoming the fact that Nithsdale has an increase of 9·5 per cent. for the year. That is something which both the local authority and I welcome.

We are discussing budgeting tonight, and it is important to realise that, in real terms, local authorities are spending more now than in 1979. That shows that there has been a steady increase in expenditure in real terms. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) held up his hands in horror and said that Strathclyde could make no savings at all when it is £76 million over budget, which is incredible in local authority financing.

There is no more important issue than the serious position of education in relation to the teachers. We must try to resolve that as soon as possible. I was extremely disappointed at the attitude of the teaching profession and the view taken by the newspapers at the weekend. To say, as the Educational Institute of Scotland seemed to say, that Main is dead is absolute rubbish. It is a good report and we must use it as a basis for settlement.

Earlier this year, my right hon. Friend broke the log jam by setting up the Main committee to produce a report —something that the Opposition did not think possible. My right hon. Friend and the Main committee set a fine example to England, which will welcome the committee's recommendations as much as the House did.

So much seems to depend on the argument whether or not the package is indivisible, in the sense that pay and conditions of service must go together, as the Main committee recommended. I am firmly of the opinion that pay and conditions of service go together and are indivisible. If we are trying to find a solution, it is not so ludicrous to think that we can phase in pay and conditions of service. Surely we can rise above the nit-picking of the EIS, which said that because it did not get the whole lot by 1 October it would not consider the Main committee recommendations.

The EIS did not like the conditions of service and jumped at the opportunity to reject the report. I trust that teachers and Opposition Members will look at the pay proposals carefully. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland achieved the 16·4 per cent. from the Treasury recommended by Main—8·2 per cent. to be paid at the end of next month and 8·2 per cent. in October next year. That is on top of the 5·5 per cent. paid in April and the 9 per cent. in 1985-86. That is very nearly 30 per cent. in less than three years. What other profession has been offered nearly 30 per cent. during the past three years, or even the past five years? The offer is worth the most careful consideration as it is an increase far above the rate of inflation and, importantly, an increase that recognises the worth of the profession, as recommended by Main. I certainly welcome the Main recommendations.

Sadly, the teachers seem to be in orbit about the phasing in of the award. May I remind Opposition Members about Clegg, which is often held up as the key to all educational advance? That was phased in in two stages. In 1984, the armed forces award of 7·6 per cent. was also phased in in two stages. In 1984, doctors and dentists achieved 6·9 per cent. — not the 16·4 per cent. recommended for teachers—and that was phased in in two stages. In 1985, nurses' pay was reviewed and the award phased in also. In 1984, the Top Salaries Review Body's recommendations were phased in.

Surely teachers could not have expected the 16·4 per cent. award to be paid on 1 October while they are working to rule or even on strike. Surely they should have been prepared to give much more consideration to the recommendations.

Hon. Members should look at what Main has offered by way of salary increases. As the hon. Member for Garscadden rightly said, such increases have a great deal to do with this order because the money has to come from the rate support grant. Under the proposals, the average salary of a primary school teacher will be £12,300. A secondary teacher will receive £13,745, and 60 per cent. of secondary school teachers will receive over £13,700. For head teachers it rises to £28,500. Those are significant increases and they should have been welcomed by the profession. Only 2 per cent. of teachers in Scotland would receive less than £8,000. We should bear in mind as well that 33 per cent. of all secondary teachers will have over £15,000. The teachers should not have turned down this settlement but should have given it much more careful thought than they have.

The huge sum which will come from taxpayers and ratepayers towards this settlement gives a wonderful chance to the profession to enter into a new era. The teaching profession desperately needs leadership from the EIS in an effort to find a solution. The EIS seems to have its head in the sand because it refuses to give leadership. It says it will depend on a ballot and will not give a firm indication of all the advantages available to the teaching profession in this recommendation.

I hope that teachers will read the reports of the debate and take on board what is on offer and pay less heed to what they have so often been told by the Opposition. Children and parents have gone through a miserable period. The future of our children depends on qualifications obtained at school and it is high time they had an opportunity to reach their full potential. I hope that the EIS will come off the fence and will negotiate through the proper channels in an effort to resolve the dispute. The Secretary of State has played a brilliant and constructive part in reaching this point. It is now up to the teachers to come forward and reach a settlement.

9.38 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I appreciate the need of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) to get something on record about the teachers' dispute so that it can be reported in next week's Dumfries and Galloway Standard and the Moffat News and Times. In so doing he went somewhat wider than the terms of the debate. I shall try to keep my remarks about that dispute within the terms of the debate. Today I met representatives from COSLA and discovered that there would be no scope for COSLA or for individual local authorities to reach a separate settlement. The Secretary of State assures me that the Government do not want that either and in that sense there seems to be some agreement.

COSLA is confused about the future of the rate support grant relative to the interim settlement that has already been agreed. I noted that the Under-Secretary of State did not give an immediate response when invited to do so and we look forward to hearing what he has to say on that point because that problem is greatly exercising the minds of local authorities.

In the report attached to this order there is a reference to 1985 orders Nos. 3 and 4. Presumably that means that Nos. 1 and 2 went before. A feature of the rate support grant is the system of penalties and guidelines that the Government operate in a fairly hard-line way. That means that time and again they have to come back to the House for topping-ups and taking-aways.

In introducing the order the Minister seemed like an early-day Santa Claus trying to pretend that he was giving £69 million back to local authorities for 1985-86. However, he was only giving back what he had taken away in one of these orders that we debated last year. In the interim period the local authorities that have lost that money have had to pay interest on it. With interest running at the rate of 10 to 11 per cent. I estimate that that represents a loss of £7·6 million to the ratepayers of the local authorities concerned. Because the system operates inflexibly, that is a loss to the ratepayers.

There is a suggestion that the guidelines are invested with some sort of magic. We are told that they are not intended to be mandatory, but because of the way in which the system works, they are, to all intents and purposes, just that. The Minister assures us that the total is one of those odd things, and is nothing to do with the sum of the parts. I have discussed with the Minister the individual guidelines for services with regard to the police allocation. He and I were in substantial agreement, but I was assured that that was not what that local authority was expected to spend on the police. Nevertheless, when everything was added up, the local authority had to stay within the total sum. Consequently, the individual parts bore no relation to the sum which would, nevertheless, be binding on the local authority.

It has been pointed out that if next year's guidelines were converted into real terms for the current year they would show a minimal overspend, resulting in a penalty of about £12 million rather than £125 million. Indeed, if the Edinburgh anomaly is taken into account, the penalty would be £5 million instead of £125 million. The hon. Member for Dumfries did not pick up that point with regard to Nithsdale. This year it has no doubt been accused of irresponsible overspending in incurring penalty, despite the fact that the same spending next year would in real terms be the height of financial rectitude and would not incur penalty. Furthermore, this year it is incurring a penalty for spending a sum that does not even meet its assessed need on the Government's own estimate. The hon. Gentleman did not comment on that, although I gave him the opportunity to do so. I am sure that his electors will take due note of that.

Under this order, 25 local authorities are now to be penalised. We are not simply talking about penalising local authorities, because that burden will be passed on to the ratepayers, and will often affect the services provided by those authorities. The Government cannot raise the spectre of irresponsible, high-spending authorities for much longer. Three of the local authorities to be penalised tonight have an assessment of expenditure need — the Government's own assessment — that is greater than their guideline. Some authorities that spend the same in real terms next year will not be deemed irresponsible high spenders.

Reference has been made to the Lothian region, and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) pointed out that a Conservative administration had put forward a budget that incurred penalty. I am sorry that he did not also pick on the alliance. I would plead guilty as well, because it was a Conservative administration in alliance with the Liberals and Social Democrats that put forward that budget, because they did not feel that they could cut their expenditure any further. That shows that we are now reaching the bone. Most of the fat has been cut away, and the Government now expect local authorities to dig into the bone in order to meet their arbitrary spending guidelines.

The Government are obsessed with public expenditure. The Minister did the House a service by saying that he would not go into detail again on the Government's policy on public expenditure. We all know it well, but their obsession leads to rough justice, as is demonstrated by the order.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive an Englishman for intervening in this debate — [Interruption.] Will the hon. Gentleman spare a word for the taxpayer who has to fund these feckless Scottish local authorities?

Mr. Wallace: With due respect, I forgive an Englishman many things, but we are no longer dealing with feckless and irresponsible local authorities. It has been admitted today that local authorities are now spending less in total volume terms than in 1978-79. Indeed, some of the local authorities penalised in the order are spending substantially less in volume terms than in 1978-79.

The guidelines reveal a lack of flexibility. The hon. Member for Garscadden has already mentioned the anomaly relating to Edinburgh, and so I shall not dwell on that. But I had thought that the Minister would argue that he could not have done anything about it for legal reasons. I was astounded by his answer that there was no legal impediment, and that it was just another arbitrary decision.

There is a distinction between Edinburgh and other local authorities because Edinburgh's budget was agreed in plenty of time for fixing a penalty. Interest charges on that sum will have to be borne by Edinburgh's ratepayers.

The city of Aberdeen is an example of the Government's inflexibility because under the order it will suffer a penalty. Central Government lacked comprehension of what was going on and what was needed when oil was booming. The Government now lack sensitivity about Aberdeen's problems caused by the recession in the oil industry. Job losses are today running at a level which it was predicted would apply by the middle of next year.

Strains and pressures are put upon a local authority when it has to cope with a less buoyant economy. This is a time when one might expect to look to central Government for support, but instead such authorities are penalised further. That leads to cuts which result in even more job losses and a further spiralling down in economic activity.

The anomalies in the guideline system have been well illustrated in tonight's debate. I heave a sigh of relief that my constituency authorities are not to be singled out for penalties. However, the local authorities in my area know that their assessed needs are in excess of their guidelines.

The Minister assured us, as if it were something of which to be proud, that for no local authorities will the gap be any wider. That is not much consolation to local authorities who have been assured that there will be steady progress towards bridging the gap. Very little progress has been made for local authorities in my constituency. They have been prepared to put up with that, but I doubt whether they will be prepared to put up with it for much longer. Ratepayers and services will suffer.

It is incumbent upon any Government which replaces the present Government to restore the relationship between central Government and local government, so that central Government no longer dominates.

The Minister said that he wanted greater local accountability. As a principle, I would not disagree with that, but fundamentally I disagree with the ways in which the Government are going about achieving increased accountability. In social security legislation, the Government are trying to ensure that everyone pays, under the principle that there is no representation without taxation. Many people find that obnoxious.

The proportional representation system at local government level would ensure that local authorities are more representative of the people. That would be a more effective way of controlling expenditure at local level and of reflecting an area's needs. In that way local democracy can best be restored.

9.48 pm

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I regret the need to spend time this evening on discussing the order. I look forward to the day when we have reformed local government expenditure and when such orders are unnecessary. I certainly defend the Minister's action in bringing forward the order because history shows clearly that local authorities will overspend if they are not constrained by central Government. Tonight we are discussing the latest action by central Government—action started by the Labour party and continued by the present Government.

The evidence is clear. When constraints and pressures are applied by central Government, local authorities are able to contain expenditure without services collapsing and without the great embarrassment about which we have heard so much from the Opposition.

The accusation about cuts in local government expenditure is without foundation. In spite of all that this Government have done over the past seven years, spending in volume terms is higher than it was in 1978-79.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) referred to the pounding that local government in Scotland has received under the Government. If he had been in the House, I wonder what adjectives he would have used to describe the actions of the Labour Government when they made the most swingeing cuts in local government expenditure that there have ever been in the history of Scottish local government.

It would be fair to say that the policy which has been followed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and his predecessor has been a successful one.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Tell that one to Strathkelvin district council.

Mr. Hirst: I shall come to that presently, if the hon. Gentleman can contain himself.

The scorn which the hon. Member for Garscadden poured on the policy pursued by the Government is simply not merited. Two years ago, when I was a comparatively new Member of the House, 15 authorities budgeted within guidelines. Last year there were 30, and this year there are 40—many of them controlled by the hon. Gentleman's party—which can start out with a budget that is within guidelines, and 11 authorities are just above guidelines.

When one looks at the provisional outturn for 1985-86, one sees that many of the authorities that budgeted to overspend last year managed to bring their spending back within guidelines. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) is listening, but I shall mention Strathkelvin. It budgeted to spend beyond guidelines last year and I am happy to say that it managed to bring its expenditure not just to guidelines but some thousands of pounds under them. In so doing it avoided any penalty being imposed upon the ratepayers.

I believe in giving credit where credit is due, and I give Strathkelvin credit for planning a budget this year which is only modestly above guidelines and much less of an over-budgeting exercise than was done the previous year.

Mr. Canavan: Before the hon. Gentleman entered this place, I had the privilege of representing part of Strathkelvin district. It is now Labour-controlled and all I hear from the people at the coalface of local government—the councillors—is that they are having to suffer the effects of the Government's cuts in local authority services, housing, and everything else. How on earth will the hon. Gentleman manage to explain that before he is out on his neck at the next general election?

Mr. Hirst: It is a pity that the hon. Gentleman has not been listening to the debate. If he chose to go back to his old stomping ground he would see that in the years since I became a Member a great deal more money is being spent on that portion of West Stirlingshire than ever was spent when he was a Member there. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman's former constituents showed good sense in voting the way they did at the last election and I am sure that they will do so next time.

This year's guidelines are fair and reasonable. In percentage terms, they offer local authorities the opportunity of making an increase in real terms in what they can spend, and that is welcome. Moreover, the increasing number of local authorities that are budgeting within guidelines this year is confirmation of the success of my right hon. and learned Friend's policy.

Overshadowing all consideration of rate support grant must be the effect which there would be upon the pattern of spending by local authorities if the teachers accept the proposals that are on offer to them which were announced in the House by my right hon. and learned Friend last week.

I welcome the report which my hon. Friend the Minister gave of his discussions with COSLA. I was sorry that since I was not a fly on the wall I could not intervene in the interesting exchanges between the Secretary of State and the shadow spokesman on Scottish affairs. However, I know which version of events I would be prepared to believe.

I am heartened by the assurance that the Minister has given the House this evening that grant will be provided in full to meet the cost of the settlement which will fall to be borne in the 1986-87 financial year. I hope that teachers in Scottish schools will recognise that a fair and reasonable offer has been made to them when they consider it in the cool of their living rooms rather than in the heat of the staff rooms.

The House should recognise that since my right hon. and learned Friend has been Secretary of State for Scotland he has done a great deal to promote the interests of Scottish teachers and to promote peace, stability and progress in Scotland's schools. It is interesting that what we have heard from Opposition Members so far has fallen short of any recommendation that the terms that have been offered should be rejected. That is something that should be welcomed by all fair-minded Members irrespective of the side of the House on which they sit. Parents and the public generally, either as ratepayers or as taxpayers, will have to find the money to finance the deal. They will be right to expect that the teachers should accept a fair and reasonable offer.

It may sober many people to discover that two thirds of Scotland's teachers will have gross pay of over £1,000 a month. I regret to say that many of my constituents would give their eye teeth for that sort of pay. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) said, when we consider what has been achieved for teachers' salaries over the past 30 months, it is clear that they have made progress. It is fair to say also that much more remains within their grasp.

I do not share the synthetic indignation that we have heard from some quarters about the so-called phasing of the pay increases that are part of the offer. I believe that the offer is fair and I am glad to have had the Minister's assurance that the Government will be meeting in full the costs of any of the impact of the settlement in the current financial year in terms of rate support grant.

9.57 pm

Mr. David Lambie (Cunninghame, South): I do not intend to take up the arguments of the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) and for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) on the teachers' dispute. I would say as a member of the Educational Institute of Scotland, and as secretary of the Westminster branch of the EIS, that I have always been brought up to believe that when gentlemen agree to go to arbitration to put their case for a pay review before an independent tribunal they should agree to accept the findings of the tribunal. There is no use appointing a referee and then saying, "We are not accepting your findings and we shall play the game again", when he does not award the goal to our side.

I say to the Secretary of State that he should pay the money to the teachers now. If he does so, I believe that the teachers will vote in the ballot to end the dispute. If he does not pay the money now, I believe that the teachers, by a majority, will vote for a continuation of the industrial dispute. The right hon. and learned Gentlman has won only half of the battle in the Cabinet. Let him return to the Cabinet and, along with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science, win the second half. If he does that, we shall not have a continuation of the industrial dispute in the schools of Scotland and of England and Wales. Secretary of State, pay the money now and let us have a settlement.

I smiled when my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said, "We have heard it all before." As a member of this place since 1970, I have heard it all before. Indeed, the speech that I am making now is one that I have made from time to time since 1970. There were occasions when I was not lucky enough to catch the eye of Mr. Speaker or Mr. Deputy Speaker, because in the past there has been more interest in these debates than there appears to be this evening. As a Member with a family local government background, I have always spoken and voted against the rate support grant settlement, and I shall be consistent this evening and take the same course. I have done so irrespective of the party in power.

I shall vote against the settlement with great fervour because this happens to be a Conservative Government. The Tories in Scotland are thin on the ground. In the House they are thinner on the ground. After the next election, they will be even thinner on the ground. But, although the Labour party won the debate in Scotland, and although we are winning the debate in the House, we will be defeated because the result of the Division will be determined by English Members of Parliament, especially those from the south of England, who are all Conservative Members. We see not democracy but a steamrollering of the power of English Tories from the south of England who dominate what is happening to local government in Scotland.

After the next election, if Scotland continues to have a predominantly Labour representation that is dominated by the Tory majority from the south of England, not only the Scottish people but the Labour party will need to examine the situation.

We are dealing with an order to reduce the rate support grant by £125·3 million—from £1,761 million to £1,636 million. Tomorrow the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make his autumn statement—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] According to reports appearing in the various newspapers today, he will say how well the country is doing and how we are going economically from strength to strength. He will not mention that the annual cost of unemployment is about £22 billion—£22 billion to pay people not to work. On average, that is £6,438 for each unemployed person. My district council of Cunninghame is penalised by more than £50,000. We have a cash excess over guidelines of just under £200,000 for 1986-87. But, worse still, in 1985-86, because of over-expenditure on unemployment in the area—an unemployment black spot—the council incurred an initial penalty of about £180,000. Because of that over-spending, we faced a grant penalty of 138 per cent. We now face a revised penalty of more than £400,000 in addition to the £50,000 for this year.

In my constituency of Cunninghame, South the September unemployment figure was 7,295—22·6 per cent. of the insured population. That figure was reached after 17 or 18 fiddles to determine the level of unemployment. In my constituency, the annual cost of unemployment is about £40 million—that is, it costs the Government £40 million to keep just over 7,000 people unemployed in my constituency. That is, on average, £1,553 for every working person in the constituency.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): What does that have to do with the order?

Mr. Lambie: We are discussing a cut in expenditure by local authorities at a time when the Government are prepared to increase expenditure on the unemployed. Local authorities such as mine—Cunninghame district council—spent about £10 million in 1985-86 and about £11 million in 1986-87. That money provides services and employment for the people of the area. The Government are saying to the district council "You are wasting money by spending £10 million or £11 million providing services and employment", yet the local authority is not saying to the Government, "You are prepared to spend £40 million in the constituency to pay people not to work."

Based on the 1986-87 budget, my regional council of Strathclyde has had a penalty of more than £76 million imposed on it. That can only mean a further cut in services and employment, increasing the numbers of the unemployed in Strathclyde. It means an increase in the amount that the Government are prepared to find to keep those people unemployed.

This is why I cannot understand the Government. They attack local councils which are providing services and employment—something that the Government are not prepared to do. I hope that the people of Scotland will recognise that, unless we get people back to work and get the £22 billion which is being wasted on unemployment money spent on building up the country and providing employment and services, we shall never get this country going again. I hope that the one or two decent Tories will vote for the Opposition and oppose the order.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I feel compelled to say a few words as an Edinburgh and Lothian Member of Parliament because it is important that we should support my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) in relation to Scotland as a whole and especially the position in Lothian and Edinburgh.

The penalty imposed on Lothian is severe and unjustified. It will destroy jobs and services on a scale that will be damaging to my constituents and, ironically, the constituents of the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland — the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram) — and the Secretary of State. I must say in passing that I wonder whether the penalties applied to Lothian and Edinburgh have something to do with the feeling that they will be helpful electorally to the Government to try to save the three vulnerable Conservative seats and will force local authorities either to cut services and reduce jobs or to raise rates.

The Secretary of State said from a sedentary position — I am not sure whether it is in Hansard — that Edinburgh district council was making a donation to Robert Maxwell, or words to that effect. I say in passing again, because this is not central to the debate, that it would be a disgrace to Scotland if the Commonwealth games company were allowed to go into liquidation. I support Edinburgh district council in its efforts to avert that. I hope that the Government will not hold that against Edinburgh. I believe that, even at this stage, the Government should be prepared to look at the matter again and to avoid the damage to the companies that provided products for the Commonwealth games and the damage to Scotland's reputation and that of its capital city.

I hope that the Government will respond to a narrow point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden about the penalty imposed on Edinburgh district council. That penalty relates to the excess over guidelines which would have prevailed had the district council not reached an agreement with the Secretary of State to reduce its expenditure. It must be unfair, by any test, that Edinburgh should be required to carry a £7 million penalty for an entire year. It must lose perhaps £500,000 on the interest payable on that sum.

I have two questions to which I hope the Government will respond. First, is it true that the Secretary of State has discretion in this matter and that there is no statutory requirement on the Government to penalise Edinburgh in that narrow respect? Secondly, if there is no statutory requirement on the Government to act in that way, will they at least agree to reconsider the matter?

Mr. Ancram: I wish to comment briefly on some of the points made in the debate. I shall start by congratulating, as I always do on such occasions, the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie) on giving his rate support grant speech its twice-yearly airing. We look forward to hearing it again in January when we debate the Main settlement order.

I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) for his strong and helpful speech. I am grateful to him for welcoming the guidelines that have been issued to his regional authority. He and I have had some arguments about the way in which the formula worked in his authority, but this year he has seen that my prophecies of last year have been fulfilled. I listened carefully to his comments on the teachers. I hope that he will forgive me if I do not follow him down that road, but I agree with his comments on that matter. Opposition Members may not like the facts, as they showed while my hon. Friend was speaking, but it is only on the facts that sensible decisions can ultimately be reached.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) raised several points. It is surprising to hear someone whom I always considered to be perspicacious say that local authorities cannot make savings in any area without cutting services. I am sure that if he considers his authority and other authorities across Scotland he will discover that savings can be made in some obvious areas where duplication takes place and where other ways of providing the same service to the same standard could be found.

The hon. Gentleman referred to Nithsdale, pleading on behalf of a small rural authority which is below its assessed need. Does he accept that the Government have a responsibility for the overall spending by local authorities in Scotland? If he accepted that, would he suggest that bigger increases should be given to small authorities at the expense of bigger authorities which have higher spending at the moment? That is the logic of his position, and I am sure that when he considers it he will discover that that would not be the case.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries was accused by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland of not having considered Nithsdale's case. However, Nithsdale received a budget-to-guideline increase of 6·6 per cent. and a guideline-to-guideline increase of 9·5 per cent. this year. I am sure that Nithsdale will be grateful for the guidelines that have been given.

My hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) raised several points. I agree that it is ironic to hear accusations of reductions from Opposition Members. Certainly in terms of capital spending the Labour Government were the major reducers. The difference between this Government and the Labour Government was that we decided that, as a matter of policy and economic responsibility, it was important to keep public expenditure under control. They had to be forced into doing that by the International Monetary Fund because of the profligate spending that had gone before.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) raised many points, one of which was also raised by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang). Edinburgh knew precisely what it was doing when it budgeted in March this year. It knew that the penalties were imposed on the budgets struck in March and it knew what would happen if there was selective action and it was required to reduce its budget. Edinburgh knew all that because it had been through the procedure last year. There is no question of Edinburgh being able to say that it was surprised at the way in which the system operates. It would be wrong to tell one authority that it could have its penalty reduced because the Government made it reduce its expenditure and, at the same time, tell other authorities which are reducing their expenditure voluntarily that they must bear the whole penalty until the position is worked out at outturn. If we have a system, it must operate fairly. It is operating fairly in Edinburgh's case and I hope that the hon. Gentlemen will accept that.

The hon. Member for Garscadden also raised the question of Lothian region. The Conservative administration in Lothian region had an outstanding record. It restored Lothian from the financial shambles that Labour had left and reduced expenditure by 12 per cent. in volume terms while maintaining services. The remarkable thing is not so much that the administration was still budgeting over guidelines but that it achieved so much in bringing expenditure under control within that period. It was certainly to the benefit of the ratepayers in my constituency and the constituency of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State.

I will not give the hon. Member for Garscadden a mathematics lesson. However, I am informed that there are four authorities responsible for the £107 million overspend. If the hon. Gentleman presses me I will take him through all the details. I am sure that he will find that on this occasion his mathematics are less accurate than mine. When the debate is over I shall let him know how those figures are made up.

I think that the hon. Member for Garscadden may have unintentionally misunderstood the basis of the guidelines. He suggested that the guidelines for 1987-88 were based on budgets plus 3·75 per cent. That is true globally, but individual guidelines are based on assessed need. The basis of the general settlement of the resources has enabled us to ensure, among other things, that every authority has a guideline increase of at least 3·75 per cent., a minimum of a freeze in real terms on guidelines. However, there are other guidelines which are increasing by considerably more than that amount.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): On that point in relation to Fife, if one backdates the 1987-88 figure it would show Fife to have a current guideline of about £172 million. Fife is being penalised now to the tune of £3 million. However, it would be under the guidelines if one made the relevant adjustment. How can we, as public representatives, explain that bizarre arithmetic to the electorate?

Mr. Ancram: At this hour I am not going to take the hon. Gentleman through the complicated system of how the guidelines are drawn up. It was set out in the letter that was sent to the authorities. If the hon. Gentleman has any problem relating to the basis on which the guidelines for Fife were drawn I shall deal with that for him if he writes to me.

The hon. Member for Garscadden also raised the subject of the teachers. I indicated in my original remarks that we were willing to meet COSLA's request for a disregard in respect of the £27 million expenditure it estimates it will incur this year as a result of the interim pay award of April 1986, which is in excess of its budgeted provision. The hon. Gentleman asked what that meant. That disregard is being offered to COSLA on the understanding that both COSLA and the local authorities continue to work with us to persuade the teachers to avoid further disruption. That is something they are doing at the moment and we would expect all local authorities to be doing that in the future. I am sure that nobody, including Opposition Members, would wish to see further disruption in the classrooms.

Mr. Dewar: The Minister has opened up an important point. He has not clarified the issue, but seems to have clouded it. May I try to understand what I have just been told? First, the £27 million will be disregarded for guidelines purposes, in exactly the same way as it would have been if a settlement of the teachers' dispute had been achieved. Secondly, he has put in the caveat that that is conditional on the authorities continuing to co-operate with the Government, as—he ended by saying—they are doing at the moment. In other words, he is satisfied with the policy that they are following at the moment. He is not looking for anything else. He is not setting any other bench-marks against which to apply a test before agreeing to that disregard.

Mr. Ancram: I accept that definition. I said that so long as local authorities and COSLA continue to try to persuade the teachers not to return to disruption in the classroom, which they are doing at the moment, because it is in nobody's interests to return to disruption in the classroom, the disregard will be payable. As far as I am concerned, that situation exists at the moment, and as long as it continues, the disregard will be payable.

Mr. Wallace: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: I have said what I have to say on that, and I hope that hon. Members——

Mr. Wallace rose——

Mr. Ancram: —will accept that I am saying that at the moment authorities are, in our view, taking the correct approach to future disruption in schools. On that basis, if they continue to do that, the disregard will be payable when it is appropriate so to do.

Mr. Wallace: I seek further detailed clarification. If it should transpire that some local authorities do not match up to what the Government would expect of them, will the Government discriminate between different local authorities in the disregard, depending on what attitude they strike?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman is now beginning to hypothesise. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I said that at the moment authorities — and I hope that Opposition Members take the same view—are concerned to see no resumption of disturbances and industrial problems in the classroom. I hope that Opposition Members will continue to press local authorities to do the same. Local authorities are doing that at the moment and on that basis the disregard would be paid.

Mr. Dewar rose——

Mr. Ancram: I have said what I have to say, and the hon. Gentleman must allow me to finish my speech.

The final accusation made by the hon. Member for Garscadden and others was that there was something wrong with the principle of reducing rate support grant to control local authority spending. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland made the same point. I say again to the hon. Member for Garscadden that that was not invented by this Government. I was looking at the report on the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) Order 1976, and I read that the Secretary of State, who I understand to have been the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan),

"has informed local authorities that the amount of grant in the increase order will be reduced by £5 million below what it would otherwise have been. This action has been taken because local authority budget estimates for 1976-77 were still some £45 million in excess of the level assumed by Government in fixing the rate support grant for 1976-77, despite exhortations by the Secretary of State to local authorities to reduce current expenditure in the national interest."

That was the Labour party's view then. The principle is the same today. The system is fairer. On that basis, I ask the House to support the order.

Resolved,

That the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) Order 1986, dated 22nd July 1986, a copy of which was laid before this House on 24th July, be approved.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.)

NORTHERN IRELAND

That the draft Rates (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 21st July, be approved.

That the draft Financial Provisions (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 21st July, be approved.

HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS

That the Highlands and Islands Development Board Area Extension Order 1986, dated 9th October 1986, a copy of which was laid before this House on 21st October, be approved.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

That the Customs Duties (ECSC) (No. 2) (Amendment No. 4) Order 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 1352), dated 31st July 1986, a copy of which was laid before this House on 1st August, be approved.

INTERNATIONAL IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES

That the draft International Fund for Ireland (Immunities and Privileges) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 27th October, be approved.—[Mr. Maude.]

Question agreed to.

Food and Animal Health

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 9453/83 on intra-Community trade in bovine and pig semen, 11403/85 on intra-Community trade in meat products, 6364/86, 6365/86, 6366/86 and 6367/86 concerning draft proposals for a new approach to harmonisation in the field of foodstuffs, and of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's unnumbered explanatory memorandum of 9th July 1986 on food flavourings; and of the Government's intention to pursue agreement to a procedure within the framework Directives which ensures that the interests of Member States are respected in subsequent Commission proposals.—[Mr. Maude.]

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): On a point of order Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise for not giving you notice of my point of order, but is the House competent to decide this measure under Standing Order No. 80(5)?

This is rather a dramatic constitutional measure because it provides the Commission with the power to make regulations without the approval of the Council of Ministers. It takes this power under the provisions of the Single European Act which becomes the law of the land under the European Communities Bill. But that Bill is not yet the law of this land. Could consideration be given over the next few days to whether it is competent for the House to consider an important constitutional measure of this nature under Standing Order No. 80(5) when the powers are derived from the European Communities Bill and the Single European Act, which is not yet the law of this land?

Paragraph 9 of document 6365/86 which is attached to the directive sets the matter out clearly. The document is signed by Lord Belstead. Over the next few days could consideration be given to whether it is lawful for this measure to be considered now when the additional powers being given to the Commission are in a Bill which has not yet received Royal Assent?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I am assured that the correct procedures have been followed in relation to the order and that it would be proper for me to put the matter to the House.

Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 80 (Standing Committees on European Community documents), and agreed to.

Unemployment (Jarrow)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

10.38 pm

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): I am grateful for the opportunity of the Adjournment debate this evening because this is the 50th anniversary of the Jarrow march. I was born and educated at an elementary school within 200 yards of where that march started.

When those 200 proud men marched from Jarrow they did so, not for an extra bowl of soup or an extra crust of bread, but for the right to work and the dignity of a pay packet rather than the indignity of the means test which prevailed in Jarrow at that time. I can recall those days and the hardships that my parents faced. In those days Jarrow, where poverty was prevalent, was referred to as the workhouse without walls. I have always been proud of the men who took part in the march and of the dignified way in which they conducted themselves.

On 5 October 1986, when the 1986 march was about to leave Jarrow, I spoke to those who were taking part and reminded them of their responsibility, not only to themselves, but to the memory of that procession and to the 4 million unemployed today on whose behalf they were marching.

I want to put it on the record that I am equally proud of those who took part in the 1986 Jarrow march which finished this week and the dignified way in which they conducted themselves, in spite of provocation by certain individuals who should know better. The marchers were referred to as barbarians. It is not what is on a person's head that counts but what is in that person's head. The only barbarians that I can see are in government, who preside over 4 million of our fellow citizens on the dole — that human scrap heap. When Ministers offer to spend a week on the dole to prove that they can suffer the same as anyone else, I remind hon. Members that I spent six months on the dole in Jarrow and I know what it is about. It really annoys me when Ministers come forward with their little gimmicks suggesting that they can spend a week on the dole to prove that the dole is easy.

The 1986 Jarrow marchers have been a credit to all those whom they represented, to the memory of the 1936 crusade and the 4 million unemployed. I would like to put on record my sincere thanks to 10 of my constituents and the others who took part. For the record, I would like to mention my constituents by name: John Badger, Harry Thorn, Lawrence Maloy, Billy Orr, David Melia, Paul Laft, Paul Thomas, Steven Byrne, Wayne Scott and Ken Smith. I would like to pay a special tribute to Simon Osborne and Richard Hasswell, the two lads from Leeds who organised the 1986 Jarrow march.

Some people have said that the 1936 Jarrow march was not political, and the march of 1986 was. The 1936 march was organised by a Labour-controlled council. Four Labour aldermen led the march — David Riley, Paddy Scullion, Jock Hanlon and Joe Symons who later became a Member of this House. There were Tory marchers and the Tory agent at the time marched along. If any Tories had wanted to take part in the 1986 march they would have been welcome. None of the 1986 marchers were vetted for their politics. They were only vetted to ensure that they were out of work and entitled to go on the march. I have no doubt that the marchers would have welcomed one or two Tory ex-Cabinet Ministers who shed crocodile tears every time there was a debate on unemployment in the Chamber.

I vividly recall the 1936 march. As a small boy of seven, I saw the marchers leave the town hall. I can recall asking my father why the men were marching. He replied that they were going to London to find work. I asked an innocent boy's question: "Would it not be easier to fetch the work up here where the men are?" That same question could be asked today—50 years later.

Last night I presented a petition on behalf of thousands of people in my constituency. Little did I realise, as I watched the Jarrow marchers leave in 1936, that I would present a petition about unemployment in Jarrow. There is intolerably high unemployment in my constituency, like many other constituencies in the north, the north-west, Wales and Scotland. Our areas are being turned into industrial deserts by the Government's policies. The Government have cut regional aid. Regional aid is not a charity. We do not want charity in our regions. Regional aid is a right. Central Government are obliged to ensure that the regions are cared for. Instead of cutting regional aid, the Government should be increasing it.

My constituency has been devastated by the Government's policies. Unemployment has doubled in my constituency since 1979, when the Government were elected. It has increased from 3,600 to over 8,000. That is the Ministry's massaged figure. The unemployment unit's figure is more than 9,000. According to the Ministry's calculations, it costs more than £6,000 to keep a person on the dole. It costs the Government £51 million a year to keep the people of Jarrow unemployed—yet they talk about cutting public expenditure.

Long-term unemployment has increased fourfold, from 900 to 3,600. I recently received a letter from a constituent, who said:

"I am still unemployed after six years and I have filled in thousands of application forms and been on hundreds of interviews for jobs without success. It is slowly driving me around the bend, and I am under the doctor receiving treatment for severe depression . . . You see, Sir, the unemployed have no one to fight for them. I feel isolated and a cast-out, so they (DHSS etc.) can do what they like with them, and I think it's a disgrace, in this present day and age, if they get away with it. I realise you will be very busy etc. but myself and other unemployed rely on someone important to help or we will all be crushed into the earth."

That man is genuinely unemployed—he is not trying it for one week, then returning to a plush job and a big house. He has written for hundreds of jobs, had many interviews, but is still unemployed.

Under-25 unemployment has risen sixfold from 500 to more than 2,900. As I have said before, I have been unemployed on numerous occasions. It was no consolation when standing in the dole queue for someone to tap me on the shoulder and say, "You are all right this week Don, you are only one of 17 per cent.—last week you were one of 18 per cent." When someone is unemployed, he is 100 per cent. unemployed when there are no jobs available.

Since 1979 there has been not simply a loss of jobs in my constituency, but a haemorrhage. Swan's Hebburn shipyards of Hawthorn Leslies and Palmers in 1979 employed almost 3,000 people; today they employ five on maintenance work at Palmers. Hawthorn Leslies has closed. The Mercantile Dry Dock used to employ 305 men, but has now closed; the British Steel Corporation used to employ 306 men, but has closed; Boldon pit used to employ 900 men, but has closed; British Steel Brickworks used to employ 117, but has closed. Reyrolles employed 4,261 but now employs only 985. The list is endless.

This Government have done what Hitler's bombers failed to do during the war—they have stopped industry in Jarrow. It is a shipbuilding community and, like mining communities, is closely knit. Yards have been closed without regard to the social consequences. The march in 1936 was because of Shipbuilding Securities Limited, an organisation of merchant bankers, shipbuilders and shipowners who, because of over-capacity in the industry, decided to buy the yards and close them. The same thing was done by Graham Day, the past chairman of British Shipbuilders, at the behest of the Government.

For the first time in living history there is no shipbuilding on the south side of the river Tyne. To add insult to injury, a modern prefabricated shed built in Palmers and equipped by British Shipbuilders is now being used to store surplus grain. Instead of building ships to take the grain to the starving millions in Africa, we are storing grain. That is the obscenity of this Government.

Local authorities, the largest employers in our area, have had their rate support grant slashed by the Government. When the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), the chairman of the Tory party, insults the unemployed by telling them to get on their bikes, he forgets that those who get on their bikes are the young men. When they move out of their areas they do not take with them the old people's homes, the parks, the libraries or the community centres. They have to be paid for by those left behind. With the Government slashing rate support grant, that is an extra burden. My local authority has lost millions of pounds in rate support grant.

I want to point out similarities with the 1930s. When the Jarrow march took place in 1936, when seven out of 10 men were out of work, a charity fund was set up by Sir John Jarvis, the High Sheriff of Surrey. They used the fund to build a park in Jarrow. To get a month's employment in the park a man had to have been out of work for three years.

Today's similarity to that is the community programme, where someone has to be out of work for 15 months before he can get another job. Shipbuilding Securities Ltd., closed down Jarrow's shipyards and put a 40-year embargo on the building of ships. Tyne Ship Repairers is selling its Middle Dock at South Shields, and one of the conditions of the sale is that no one must repair ships in that dock. That is another of today's similarities to the 1930s.

Jarrow is a proud town with proud people. We are proud of our town and do not suggest in any way that we want charity. All that the people in Jarrow want is the right to work. We do not expect the Government to come along with a magic wand that will cure unemployment overnight. There are some ways in which the Government can help. For example, they could allow the local authority to spend the money it has raised from the sale of council houses. It sold 4,300 council houses last year and there are 7,200 applicants on the waiting list. Last year the council built 25 houses and this year it will build 46. According to my calculations it will take 276 years for the people on the waiting list to be rehoused in new houses—unless the Government allow the council to build houses using the money raised from the sale of houses.

The Government could announce a programme for refurbishment and replacement of power stations. That would help NEI-Reyrolle. A decade ago that company employed 12,000 men. Now it employes under 1,000. Unless we get some sort of power station programme there will be no power industry left in Britain.

The Minister knows a bit about defence because he has just been switched from defence procurement. The Government could bring forward the orders for the type 23 frigates and the AOR 2 and that would help the shipbuilding workers. They could give back to the local authority the £9·5 million of rate support grant that they stole from it. They could let the Manpower Services Commission open new training centres in Jarrow instead of closing them at Killingworth and in other parts of the country.

Unless the Government do something about the scourge of unemployment, I shudder to think what the consequences will be. I warn the Minister and the Government that today's youngsters are not so deeply steeped in democracy that they will accept the solutions of the 1930s to the problems of the 1980s. The sooner the Government get that through their heads the better.

The first opportunity to go to the polls after the Jarrow crusade of 1936 was in 1945, when a Labour Government were swept in with an overwhelming majority. It is to be hoped, after the 1986 march, when we go to the polls next year or the year after, that the people will do the same as in 1945. Walter Runciman, the then President of the Board of Trade, told the Jarrow marchers when they went to see him in the 1930s that they should go back to Jarrow and work out their own salvation. We have done our best because at every local and national election since then we have retained Labour candidates. I hope that the country will take an example from Jarrow and will work out the salvation of Britain by making sure that they return a Labour Government at the next general election.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. John Lee): I sincerely congratulate the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) on having secured this Adjournment debate. I much appreciate his concern and deep commitment to the problems of the unemployed in Jarrow. From my previous ministerial involvement at the Ministry of Defence I particularly acknowledge his efforts to generate naval orders for the north-east yards.

I fully accept the seriousness of the situation in Jarrow. It is no coincidence that this debate marks the 15th anniversary of the Jarrow march. In 1936, as now, the people of Jarrow marched, they said, to make the Government face up to their duty to Jarrow and to other areas of high unemployment. The hon. Gentleman's well-respected predecessor, Ellen Wilkinson, wrote in 1936 that the Government of the day should not be given a chance to:

"get out of the awkward situation in which events like the Jarrow march and its nationwide publicity have placed them."

I suspect that the hon. Gentleman feels such sentiments are still appropriate today, and I know that unemployed people from Jarrow and elsewhere yesterday presented a petition to the House urging help for unemployment blackspots. However, the hon. Gentleman does not need me to tell him that unemployment is not just a matter for local or even national concern: it is an international problem. Indeed, 16 million people are unemployed today in the EEC. We are constantly searching for ways to help industry and commerce create new jobs, and we are also conscious of the need to help the unemployed of this country.

However, it is an indisputable fact that the number of jobs nationally has been rising; over 1 million new jobs, admittedly many of them part-time, have been created since March 1983. Self-employment rose by 550,000 in the four years to June 1986. A total of 65 per cent. of the United Kingdom population is in work—higher than any of our European partners. The number of employees in the service sector is at a record level and the rate of decline in the number of manufacturing jobs has eased considerably since 1983.

Unfortunately this is of no immediate comfort to those living in the unemployment blackspots. I shall refer later to existing Government aid for these areas, but first I shall concentrate on Jarrow.

I can assure the hon. Member that the Government of today do not regard the plight of Jarrow merely as an "awkward situation". Areas like Jarrow cannot, and will not, be swept under the carpet and forgotten.

Tragically, Jarrow and south Tyneside have a long history of high unemployment, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, while unemployment nationally has been rising for the past 20 years. Tyneside has been the victim of industrial blight throughout this century. Indeed, as the hon. Member will be aware, south Tyneside travel-to-work area has the highest unemployment rate in Great Britain and, like the hon. Gentleman, I regard 26 per cent. unemployment as far too high.

Jarrow, like too much of the north-east, suffers from an all too familiar problem. It has depended on traditional, labour intensive industries—like shipbuilding and heavy engineering—which have found it difficult to adapt to a changing world market. While there have been welcome improvements in recent years, I think that it must be accepted that, historically, poor management, low capital investment and demarcation disputes have taken their toll.

There needs to be a fundamental change from the old industrial pattern to new technologies, but these changes are invariably painful and lengthy processes.

Sadly, there have been a large number of redundancies and closures in the area. But I believe that it is a mistake which does no service to south Tyneside to paint a picture of unrelieved gloom.

Let me now turn to the range of Government initiatives and measures that are available. First, I shall deal with what I would term national schemes. During this year, we have introduced the restart programme, the new workers scheme, and the pilot job training scheme, expanding YTS into a two-year programme, extending the community programme, the enterprise allowance scheme, and the jobclub programme. What we want is to be able to offer all unemployed people, whatever their skills or experience, something which will improve their chances of finding a permanent job.

In all, some 15,000 people in south Tyneside, Sunderland and Gateshead are benefiting from measures administered by my Department. This Government are, in overall terms, spending £3 billion nationally on employment, enterprise and training measures.

The expansion of YTS into a two-year vocational programme is a major step towards ensuring that every young person under 18 is either receiving high-quality training, or is in work or full-time education.

[Mr. John Lee]

Nearly 7,000 young people in the south Tyne area are currently on YTS schemes and I believe that participation in YTS extends young people's perceptions of the opportunities open to them. It is a first step towards breaking the belief that there is no life outside the traditional industries.

Help for young people who have either exhausted their YTS entitlement or are too old for YTS is available through the new workers scheme which we introduced earlier this year. This scheme aims to assist jobseekers under 21 by providing financial assistance to employers who engage young people at rates of pay which reflect their relative inexperience. Another group which suffers disproportionately is the long-term unemployed.

The community programme — one of our major schemes to help the long-term unemployed—is currently providing temporary work on projects of benefit to local communities to over 7,000 people in the south Tyne area.

The restart programme, introduced earlier this year, offers a wide range of ways back into work to those who have been unemployed for a year or more. To date, nearly 3,000 people in Jarrow and South Shields have received in-depth counselling interviews from jobcentre staff.

One of the several options which the programme offers is a one or two-week restart course. About 600 people have been put forward for these courses, which help people assess their abilities and improve their job-hunting techniques.

Last month we announced the testing of a new restart programme for the six-month unemployed. Pilots will show whether we should extend restart nationally. Another initiative, which we extended nationally earlier this year, are job clubs to help long-term unemployed people help themselves in their search for work. Early results from job clubs are highly encouraging—two out of three people leaving them go into jobs—and we aim to provide 1,000 job clubs nationally by March 1987.

I understand that Jarrow job club opened on 6 October, and wish its members every success.

These measures are available throughout the country, but we recognise that some areas have particular problems towards which aid needs to be specifically targeted.

Jarrow, and unemployment blackspots throughout the country, need additional help to overcome their economic problems. South Tyneside is, quite rightly, a development area attracting the highest levels of regional aid. Since May 1979 the area has received some £50 million in regional selective assistance and regional development grants. This money has helped create some 1,600 new jobs and safeguard 11,000 existing ones.

However we ourselves cannot create the jobs that Jarrow and south Tyneside need, but through regional aid, we can, and do, help those areas attract the investment which can create new jobs.

Another problem which needs similarly-directed assistance is that of urban deterioration. Our Inner-city policy addresses itself to solving that problem by directing resources towards inner city areas suffering from a poor environment and a high degree of social need.

Through our urban programme we have allocated nearly £4 million this year to south Tyneside borough. This money will be spent on projects of social, environmental and economic value to the community, and more resources are available under the urban housing renewal unit's community refurbishment schemes and the urban development grant scheme.

South Tyneside also benefits from measures which offer advice and aid to shipbuilding workers facing redundancy in order to help them obtain new jobs, retrain or start their own businesses. We have given the Manpower Services Commission £1 million to retrain redundant British Shipbuilders' workers, and have allocated £5 million to set up British Shipbuilders (Enterprise) Ltd.

The Secretary of State for the Environment announced in October a new urban development corporation to be set up in Tyne and Wear. This urban development corporation will be able to spend over £100 million on Derelict land reclamation and the provision of infrastructure which will open up sites for private sector industry and housing development, It will complement the activities of the northern development company, English Industrial Estates, and Government Departments in the area.

We must not forget that, despite the difficult times, contracts are being won and new jobs are being created in Jarrow. For example, Tyne Shiprepair of Wallsend has won a contract worth nearly £750,000 for vessel refurbishment from the Ministry of Defence, and Interconnection Systems is creating 150 jobs in South Shields to manufacture printed circuit boards. We should not forget that Nissan UK—while not within the south Tyneside travel to work area—is creating 2,200 new jobs over the next few years which will be accessible to Jarrow residents.

Indeed, nearly 2,000 people have been placed in work by the public employment service alone since April, and many more will have found jobs by other means.

So far, I have concentrated on measures to help the unemployed become employees. But there is another side to the coin. Earlier, I briefly mentioned the increase in self employment. Sixty per cent. more people were self employed in the north east in 1985 than in 1969. New business registrations were running at some 6,500 in 1985 compared with 5,800 in 1980. This is a start but the north east is none the less relatively deficient in terms of an active independent small firms sector.

We are convinced that a strong small firms sector is essential to our economy. We need small firms to develop all over the country as the innovators, employers, suppliers and wealth creators of the future. We have done a great deal to encourage the growth of small firms by reducing the burden of form filling and simplifying planning procedures. We have allocated £2¼ million for 1986-87 in support of local enterprise agencies such as the Tyneside Enterprise Development Company, and we have extended the loan guarantee scheme. We are also helping unemployed people who wish to set up their own business through the enterprise allowance scheme which has helped nearly 2,500 people in south Tyneside since August 1983. From 3 November, new enterprise allowance scheme businesses no longer need to be wholly independent in order to qualify for assistance, this means that people can start businesses under franchise operations.

I know that the people of south Tyneside are aware of the need to enhance local employment opportunities, and that the south Tyneside economic development committee is currently formulating policies to create new jobs and enhance the area's economy.

I hope that south Tyneside and Jarrow will not forget the potential of the service sector as a source of new jobs and increased wealth.

While I am not trying to say that manufacturing is unimportant, we are experiencing a marked, and probably irreversible, shift from manufacturing-based to a service-based economy. There are now five jobs in services for every two in manufacturing, and a substantial number of the new jobs created over the past two years have been in the service sector. Perhaps the Gateshead Metro Centre, likely to create up to 5,000 jobs, is a pointer to the future. An important part of the service sector is, of course, tourism, while Jarrow, with respect, may not appear the most obvious tourist centre, the area none the less has much to offer the historically-minded tourist as well as the avid reader of Mrs. Catherine Cookson.

I have tried to demonstrate that there are encouraging signs in Jarrow's economy, and we can, and do, help hard-hit areas to overcome their economic problems. The local authority and people of Jarrow are making laudable efforts to help themselves, and we have been supporting these efforts in the ways I have described. While unemployment is still a deep and depressing problem, we are rightly providing more benefits for the unemployed of today than were available to their 1930s counterparts. The unemployed of the thirties might have received benefit and assistance benefits, but not all would have been eligible for either, now an unemployed person may receive unemployment benefit, housing benefit and—if he has children—child benefit, free school meals and free milk, thanks to our welfare state. I do not want in any way to minimise the hardships of life on the dole today, but at least conditions are demonstrably better than when Jarrow marched 50 years ago.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that we are doing a significant amount to help both the regeneration of economic activity in his constituency, and his unemployed constituents. Though, I am sure that he thinks it is nowhere near enough. I urge him, however, to remember that the public purse is not bottomless. Throwing money at problems like Jarrow's is not the answer. Unrestrained spending achieves two things—short-term jobs——

Mr. Dixon: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lee: I ask the hon. Gentleman to excuse me for not giving way. I must get on.

Mr. Dixon: It is costing £15 million to keep them on the dole.

Mr. Lee: Unrestrained spending achieves two things — short-term jobs which soon disappear, and an undermined economy, which takes a long time to recover. I know that the people of Jarrow cannot put everything right themselves, but nor can the Government. We all have to work together in a difficult situation.

We believe that the Government's role is to establish the economic conditions most conducive to job creation, we have the best job creation record in Europe, but we must generate even more jobs if we are to beat unemployment in Jarrow and elsewhere. We have after too many years, a stable economy with the lowest inflation rates for 20 years. Like the hon. Gentleman I would rather see faster results, but we must not sacrifice long-term stability for speedy, ephemeral returns.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes past Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL FINANCE

Taxpayers (Statistics)

1. Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people have been taken out of taxation since May 1979; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke): Some 1·4 million people would still be paying tax today had we simply increased the 1978-79 tax allowances in line with inflation; they now pay no income tax at all.

Mr. Greenway: I congratulate the Government on this excellent fact. Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Government aim to take more people out of taxation? Should this not be contrasted with the numbers who would be taken into taxation if public expenditure were increased by £28 billion, forcing the standard rate of income tax up to 53p in the pound, which is what the Labour party proposes if ever it wins power again?

Mr. Brooke: It would be wrong for me to anticipate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, but it would be in the spirit of what he has achieved so far if more people were taken out of income tax. As to the increase in public expenditure of £28 billion, it has been said by the Labour party that it would only tax the top 5 per cent. It has also been said, out of Sheffield, that to say that Labour would tax only the top 5 per cent. would be dishonest.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Is it not the case that since the Government came into office in 1979 the total tax burden hs increased from 38 per cent. of GNP to 44 per cent. now, and that a recent report of the OECD showed that our tax burden is now heavier than that of most industrial countries in the West?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman is correct to say that taxation as a percentage of GNP has increased, but that is why the Government intend to reduce it.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: In this debate, should we not also consider the impact of personal allowances? Am I not right in saying that while our personal allowances are similar to those of our major competitors, our basic rate of tax is higher?

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend is correct. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has shown a balance between real increases in allowances with cuts in the basic rate of income tax.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Does the Minister accept that in evidence it is necessary to tell not only the truth but the whole truth, and while we may take some satisfaction in the numbers that are being taken out of income tax, that cannot be dealt with in isolation? Which Government put a standard rate of 15 per cent. VAT on the vast majority of goods and services?

Mr. Brooke: It is true that, in line with the policy of moving the burden of taxation from direct to indirect, the previous Conservative Administration discharged that task.

Take-home Pay

2. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will indicate the increase in take-home pay since 1979 of a married man with two children on the average industrial wage; and how it compares with the national increase in productivity over the same period.

Mr. Brooke: The real take-home pay of a married man who has two children and is on average earnings is expected to increase by 17 per cent. between 1978-79 and 1986-87. Since this Government took office productivity has increased by 13·4 per cent.

Dr. Clark: Does my hon. Friend agree that those figures show that, during the Conservative Government's period in office, there has been a substantial increase in the standard of living of people in this country? Does he also agree that unless we modify our pay demands, or increase our productivity, our international competitiveness is at risk?

Mr. Brooke: I agree with the first part my hon. Friend's question. As to the second part, what is already an outstandingly healthy economy would be healthier still if the rise in real earnings were matched by a rise in productivity, impressive though the latter is.

Mr. Terry Fields: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in parts of Liverpool 80 per cent. of children attending school receive free school meals, which is indicative of low pay in that area? On average, 50 per cent. of school children in my constituency of Broadgreen receive free school meals. Is it not a ludicrous and idiotic suggestion by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that people in places such as Liverpool should take more modest settlements in their income? Is that not an absolute recipe for disaster for an already impoverished region? When will the Government do something positive about providing real jobs and a decent standard of living for people in Liverpool?

Mr. Brooke: Under present circumstances, if we could achieve a 1 per cent. reduction in the rate of growth of real pay, that would, over time, create 110,000 to 220,000 new jobs. Those figures can be increased pari passu. That would make a powerful contribution to our unemployment problems.

Tax Yield

3. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the total tax yield from those earning more than £25,000 per annum in (a) 1978-79 and (b) 1985-86.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John MacGregor): Taxpayers with incomes of more than £25,000 paid £8·7 billion in income tax in 1985-86, which was 22·8 per cent. of the total. These taxpayers represent just under 4 per cent. of all income tax payers. The same top percentage of taxpayers in 1978-79 paid £7·8 billion in income tax at 1985-86 prices, which was 20·6 per cent. of the total.

Mr. Thompson: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. Does he agree that that destroys the credibility of Labour's plans for raising extra revenue? Does he accept that the result of a Labour Government would be a renewed flight of talent from this country and high tax on the low earner?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend is quite right. The figures I gave show that the yields have increased, with lower taxes on the higher paid. They show what we have always said, that getting taxes down from the penal rate levels under the last Government motivates the wealth creators, to the benefit of the whole country, and increases yields. Labour's policy of a return to the rates of tax that existed in 1979 would, as my hon. Frind said, drive many of our most able, energetic and ambitious people out of the country.

Mr. Ashton: Are not the statistics in this planted question so obviously fiddled? Surely, if an extra 3 million people are taken out of taxation by being put on the dole, it affects the bottom of the pyramid and makes it look better at the top.

Mr. MacGregor: I was talking about a percentage of the total tax. I should like to make it clear to the hon. Gentleman that the figures are not fiddled. They are accurate figures and they demonstrate that a higher proportion of the taxes currently obtained—it is not a question of people at the bottom end coming out—comes from those with higher earnings, because of the motivations we have introduced.

Mr. Nicholls: As increasing tax rates on the rich actually produces less revenue and not more, does that not mean that if Labour were to impose such tax bands the £24 billion that it has to raise for its social spending would have to be raised entirely from those paying the standard rate income tax?

Mr. MacGregor: It is true that under a Labour Government—if ever there was one again—tax would rise on all income groups. My hon. Friend does not need to go as far as that. Labour's plan to raise £3·6 billion from the top 5 per cent. would mean tax rates of 70 per cent. for all those—including married couples with both partners earning—with earnings above £24,000. That is clearly a crippling increase in the tax burden on those groups. I believe that it would reduce yields, but it would have much more serious effects on the economy as a whole.

Mr. Watts: Does my hon. Friend agree that priority should now be given to reducing further the standard rate of tax, which is the marginal rate for most taxpayers? As cuts in the top rates of tax have increased revenue, is it not possible that there would be a similar effect if the standard rate were cut?

Mr. MacGregor: I am sure that my hon. Friend noted that in his Budget this year my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer deliberately skewed the tax reductions—this was with emphasis on the basic rate—in favour of those with average to lower incomes. It is precisely that group, which we believe is still taxed too highly, which will gain most from the Chancellor's long-term pledge on income tax.

Mr. Gould: Is my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) not right when he says that the figures produced by the Chief Secretary are suspect because the percentages that he quotes are those of a much narrower tax base, a base which has been made narrower by the unemployment which the Government's economic policies have produced?

Mr. MacGregor: The absolute amount of tax increased from this group for the two years at 1985-86 prices, and not proportionately. That is why lower taxes, which motivate people, have in this instance produced a higher yield.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: If the Government believe in lower taxes, why in the long period of seven years that they have been in office have they increased taxes for the average taxpayer by 3p in the pound?

Mr. MacGregor: If income tax had remained at the same rates and allowances as in 1978-79, an additional £8 billion would have come through from income tax in this period. That is a sign of how we have been following our policy of reducing direct taxes.

Wider Share Ownership

4. Mr. Forman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on Government policy towards the fiscal encouragement of wider share ownership.

Mr. Brooke: Over the past seven years the Government have significantly improved and extended the tax reliefs available for participation in company share schemes. The number of all-employee share schemes has increased considerably, from 30 in 1979 to over 1,150 today.

Mr. Forman: Is my hon. Friend aware that these figures are very welcome, but that the time has come when the Government need to go further in this direction? Does he accept the powerful case that is being advanced by people in all parties, I believe, that employee share schemes that are available to all employees should have some measure of time-limited tax relief? Will he draw this important point to the attention of our right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he is considering his next Budget?

Mr. Brooke: I welcome my hon. Friend's remarks. Further relief will be kept under review in the manner in which it steadily has been over the past seven years. A great deal has already been achieved, but I shall draw my hon. Friend's words to the attention of our right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Will my hon. Friend accept from those of us who do not have any family silver how pleased we are with the performance of our Jaguar, Telecom, TSB, Cable and Wireless, British Aerospace and other shares?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comment. He may be interested to know that of the companies which have been privatised, 350,000 employees, or 80 per cent. of the employees therein, have become shareholders.

Married Man's Allowance

5. Mr. Barron asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received on the Government's proposals to abolish the married man's allowance.

Mr. MacGregor: We have received a considerable number of representations on the Green Paper. The great majority of those expressing a preference support the proposal to introduce transferable allowances; which is what the Government are recommending and is not the same thing as abolishing the married man's allowance.

Mr. Barron: If the estimated cost of the proposals in the Green Paper will not be a cost to the Exchequer, are they not likely to impose a further tax burden on over 6 million tax payers, bearing in mind that if the cost were to fall on the Exchequer it would be as high as £5·4 billion? Why does the Minister not open to discussion the cost of this proposed scheme, when at the end of the day it will not do justice to the married woman's allowance anyway?

Mr. MacGregor: It is intended that the scheme will be introduced over a period, and much depends on what happens to thresholds and allowances during that period. I believe, as is clear from the responses to the proposals in the Green Paper, that there are so many benefits in moving to transferable allowances that it is a tax reform that the vast majority of taxpayers would support.

Mr. Marlow: Why does my right hon. Friend not take action to take the money from the married man's allowance and use it to encourage mothers to stay at home and look after their children? Will he, with one move, open up jobs in the labour market for men who cannot find work and at the same time encourage a lot of mothers to do that which they do best — stay at home and look after their children?

Mr. MacGregor: The proposal will give choice to married couples. It will give benefits to wives who are having their first children, who perhaps have worked before and who stay at home to look after their children. They will be able to transfer the allowance to their husbands. The proposal we recommend helps couples at the stage in their lives at which suddenly one partner becomes financially dependent on the other. The crucial factor is that it gives them a choice.

European Monetary System

6. Mr. Maclennan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent discussions he has had with the President of the Bundesbank concerning sterling's relationship with the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): I have discussed the European monetary system with the president of the Bundesbank on a number of occasions.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer accept that if his import-inducing consumer boom continues to rip sterling may again come under pressure? In that eventuality, would it not be better for the Chancellor to cover himself within the exchange rate mechanism than to rely on the uncertain bounty of the Bundesbank?

Mr. Lawson: There is much to be said for fully joining the European monetary system. One of the reasons for joining the system is not the soft option which the hon. Gentleman implied. It would not be a soft option.

Mr. Dykes: If France and Germany are in the EMS as larger and stronger economies, why cannot we join it?

Mr. Lawson: France and Germany do many things which we do not necessarily do, as much as I respect the Republic of France and the Federal Republic of Germany. My hon. Friend's support for our membership of the European exchange rate mechanism is well-known and consistent. We keep this matter regularly under review. The balance of argument has shifted considerably, but the Government have not yet decided that the time is right.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: As everybody knows of the differences of opinion between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister about joining the monetary exchange rate mechanism, will the Chancellor accept that in this instance, perhaps uniquely, the Prime Minister may be right, and that if we were to join, despite the obvious advantages of a fixed currency, we would be closely tied to the German deutschmark, with the problems that that would entail?

Mr. Lawson: The right hon. Gentleman is extremely percipient in noting that if we were to join the EMS fully sterling would be linked to the deutschmark.

Mr. Maples: When my right hon. Friend the Chancellor next discusses the EMS with the president of the Bundesbank, will he discuss whether there might be some connection between the fact that bank lending in Germany is growing at only about 5 per cent. a year and their interest rates are under 5 per cent., whereas here bank lending is growing at about 16 per cent. and our interest rates are 11 per cent.?

Mr. Lawson: There are many reasons why German interest rates are lower than those in this country. One is that inflation is even lower in Germany — indeed, at present it is negative — than in this country. Another reason, and it is one to which I have alluded on a number of occasions because it is important, is that the markets can see that unit labour costs in this country are rising a good deal faster than in Germany and most of our major competitors.

Dr. McDonald: Will the Chancellor confirm that the figures published on Tuesday show that the fall of $668 million of gold and currency reserves was spent to hold off the rise in interest rates and thus save the Chancellor's face during the Tory party conference? If so, that is a shocking waste of the country's reserves.

Mr. Lawson: It is difficult to satisfy the Opposition. They complain when interest rates are high. However, when reserves are used tactically at a particular time to ensure that a rise in interest rates can be held to 1 per cent. and not 2 per cent., they complain about that.

Building Societies Association

7. Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met the Building Societies Association; and what topics were discussed.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): My right hon. Friend has not met the Building Societies Association this year. I have myself met the BSA three times, mainly to discuss aspects of the recent building societies legislation.

Mr. McCrindle: Will my hon. Friend tell the building societies, and more particularly their customers, that the Government have no intention of restricting mortgage tax relief either to first-time buyers, as has been suggested in some quarters, or to those who are paying the standard rate of tax alone? Would that not create a log jam at both the top and the bottom of the housing market, which would do no one any good?

Mr. Stewart: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to this point. He will have noted the answer that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave last week. The building societies and all those with mortgages — 8 million of our fellow citizens — should beware that the Labour party, through the Leader of the Opposition, has now made it clear that under a Labour Government only those who are young, who have many children or who fall on hard times would get the full benefit of mortgage interest relief.

Mr. Freeson: Would it not be appropriate to switch the burden of mortgage tax relief to repair and renewal funds instead of incurring the considerable expenditure indulged in by way of relief on the capital purchase? More specifically, will the Minister discuss as quickly as possible with the Building Societies Association putting an end to the idiotic and unfathomable rule which the Treasury imposes and which as a general proposition prevents the investment of millions of pounds in the provision of rented housing, of which we are in dire need, because it will not allow the marriage between grants and private investment in rented property?

Mr. Stewart: It is extraordinary that an Opposition Member should speak about the problems of rented accommodation when it is the Labour party's policies that have prevented the revival of the rented sector. Mortgage interest tax relief contributes satisfactorily to the growth of owner-occupation. I am glad to be able to say that that figure has now reached 62 per cent., compared with 55 per cent. when the Conservative party came to power.

Mr. Leigh: Has my hon. Friend received any representations on mortgage tax relief from the alliance parties? Before he conveys those views to the Building Societies Association, will he say whether he has decided which alliance spokesman to believe? Is it the leader of the SDP, who appears to believe that tax relief should be abolished altogether, or the experienced and distinguished Treasury spokesman for the Liberal party, who believes that it should be restricted to basic rate taxpayers? Is the alliance as disorganised, as disunited and shambolic on this issue as on any other?

Mr. Stewart: The policies of all the Opposition parties on these matters are in a state of confusion, but the one common theme to each is that they want to cut back on mortgage interest tax relief, to the damage of home ownership.

Dr. McDonald: Will the Minister care to note, as he seems to have failed to understand the words of either my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition or other Front-Bench spokesmen, that the party's policy is to retain mortgage tax relief at the standard rate, not to allow mortgage tax relief at the higher rate, and to give further help to first-time buyers, such as my constituents, who face not only exceptionally high interest rates, which are this Government's responsibility, but high prices for such houses as they might wish to buy? Those three points have been made clear repeatedly both by the leader of the Labour party and by other Labour Front-Bench spokesmen.

Mr. Stewart: I am always interested to note what the hon. Lady says. I note it with particular attention when what she says is so different from what the leader of her party has said.

I remind the House that, only a few days ago, the Leader of the Opposition said that he was advocating arrangements which would mean that "young people, people with maximum family responsibilities to children or dependent relatives, and people who experience inadvertant falls in income, derive maximum benefit".

The only way that such people can derive maximum benefit, unless extra resources are devoted to mortgage tax relief, is for all others to suffer. The other 8 million had better watch out.

Inflation

8. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level of inflation.

Mr. Lawson: The retail prices index increased by 3 per cent. in the 12 months to September.

Mr. MacKay: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the impressively low level of inflation enjoyed in this country today could be put in jeopardy if we continue to have high wage increases which bear no relation to productivity?

Mr. Lawson: We do have a problem with wage increases running far in excess of productivity. That is perfectly true. I believe that this is basically a threat to jobs and that is why I am concerned about it. It is not a threat to inflation which can be kept under control by our monetary policy.

Mr. Penhaligon: Does the Chancellor agree that the current level of inflation cannot sustain the personal credit explosion which is currently taking place at a level of 140 per cent. over the past 12 months? Does that mean that the Chancellor is to allow inflation to increase? Will he take measures to control credit? Or is he just hoping that it will all hang together for another 12 months?

Mr. Lawson: I am perfectly happy to rest on this Government's record on inflation. We have brought inflation down from the peak of 27 per cent. that occurred when the Labour Government were in power, supported by the Liberal party, to the present level of 3 per cent., which is one of the lowest levels it has been for the past 20 years. The policies that brought inflation down will continue to remain in place and ensure that it remains low.

Mr. Dickens: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, because of the firm grip that the Government have kept on inflation, the risk-takers, entrepreneurs and job creators who went abroad are returning to Britain? Those people were driven abroad by the high taxation and high inflation of a Socialist Government. I hope that the voters of Knowsley, North remember that.

Mr. Lawson: As usual, my hon. Friend is absolutely right. I would add that a further important change has arisen as a result of the new tax climate and the sharp reduction in inflation. We now have more new business formation than ever before. Every week 500 new businesses net are set up. That is one of the most important seeds for the future which can give us encouragement and which we have sought for a long time.

Mr. Duffy: Is the Chancellor aware that his known assessment of the underlying rate of inflation is based on an underestimate of sterling depreciation which, under the law of one price, affects not only imports but works through to all goods and pay, and eventually even to the non-trade sector?

Mr. Lawson: The answer that I gave concerned the retail prices index for September as calculated by rules which have been accepted by parties on both sides of the House. Despite its defects—and it may have some—it is the best and generally acknowledged measure of inflation that we have. If the hon. Gentleman is thinking of future inflation, I shall have something to say about that later today.

Mr. Dorrell: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the speech that was recently delivered in Loughborough by the Governor of the Bank of England on the role of monetary policy and the control of inflation strengthens the argument for Britain joining the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system? As we downgrade the importance of monetary aggregates in the control of inflation, are we not by implication increasing the importance of stabilising the external value of the pound?

Mr. Lawson: I am sure that my hon. Friend was especially pleased that the Governor of the Bank of England gave his important lecture on monetary policy in his constituency. It is a lecture that will repay reading by the whole House. As for my hon. Friend's question about the exchange rate, of course it is important, and it would be highly undesirable to see a continuing depreciation of the exchange rate, which would inevitably cause faster inflation. That I am determined to avoid.

Mr. Heffer: The people of Knowsley, North now have to pay more for their bus fares as a result of the deregulation of the buses. Is that an increase in inflation, or not?

Mr. Lawson: The rate of inflation of 3 per cent. is less than half the lowest figure that it ever reached in any month under the Government whom the hon. Member supported.

Mr. Latham: Will my right hon. Friend repeat what he said in his Budget statement—that there is a good case for petrol prices to come down again? They seem to go up a lot quicker than they come down.

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend , who is an acute observer of petrol price movements, may well be right. I am glad to say that petrol prices have indeed come down since the Budget, just as I predicted that they should and would. I recall that the Opposition said that nothing of the sort would happen. I was right and the Opposition, as usual, were wrong. Petrol prices are lower than at the time of the Budget.

Mr. Gould: As the Chancellor presumably authorised the Governor of the Bank of England to announce the abandonment of sterling M3 as a monetary target, are we to assume that the whole disastrous monetarist experiment of the past seven years has been nothing more than a mistake? Has the Chancellor yet made up his mind—if so, perhaps he could let us into the secret—about what new mistake he intends to use to replace the old one?

Mr. Lawson: May I take this first opportunity to congratulate the hon. Gentleman, not merely on his election to the Labour party shadow Cabinet, but on his membership of the Opposition Treasury team? I read in one of the newspapers that his promotion to that job would add much-needed talent to a lack lustre Opposition team. I should like, on behalf of the Government, to associate myself with those remarks.

As to the hon. Gentleman's question, it is clear that, in the short time that he has been in his important job, he has not had time to read the Governor's lecture fully. I am sure that he will do so. As for the monetarist experiment to which he referred, I would observe that the proof of the pudding is in the eating and that it has brought inflation down to the lowest level for 20 years.

Season Tickets (Tax Relief)

9. Mr. Amess asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce legislation to provide tax relief at the basic rate on season tickets.

Mr. Brooke: No, Sir.

Mr. Amess: Although I am fully aware of the enormous pressure that the Treasury is under to give such assistance, does my hon. Friend appreciate the attractiveness of such a proposal for the hard-pressed commuter who faces increasing transport costs? Does my hon. Friend agree that if he undertook such a proposal it might lead to a reduction in the amount of traffic on our roads?

Mr. Brooke: As 2¼ per cent. of the entire country's work force commutes to my constituency daily, I am familiar with the problem, but the expense of home-to-work travel has never been allowable for tax relief. Where people live has been regarded as a personal decision, so travel has been regarded as a personal expense.

Mr. Snape: Does the Minister agree that the proposal is eminently reasonable, socially desirable and would bring some much-needed equalisation into the Exchequer's treatment of various forms of motor transport—three reasons for probable disqualification in the eyes of the Chancellor?

Mr. Brooke: I answered the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) with the words, "No, Sir." and I give the hon. Gentleman the same answer.

Charitable Gifts

10. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about his Budget proposals to encourage charitable gifts.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Budget proposals to encourage charitable giving were warmly welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House and by charities themselves. They represent the most substantial package of tax concessions for charities and charitable giving ever introduced in a single Budget.

Mrs. Bottomley: Can my hon. Friend confirm that charitable giving has more than doubled since the Government came to power? What expectations has he for further realising our people's sense of responsibility and generosity?

Mr. Stewart: The contributions to charity through covenants, bequests and other means have risen dramatically since the Government took office. However, I still suggest that the payroll giving scheme and the measures introduced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his Budget earlier this year will be regarded as some of the most important encouragements to charitable giving that have ever been introduced and I hope that they will be fully exploited. I also hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will encourage charities and employers in their own constituencies to take part in the new scheme.

Mr. Alan Howarth: In respect of the Government's welcome initiative on payroll schemes for charitable giving, does my hon. Friend agree that the timetable between the end of the consultation period and the inception of the scheme next April will be very tight? Therefore, will he announce his definitive regulations as early as possible? Is he also able to say that the Government's own employees will be able to participate in such schemes?

Mr. Stewart: I note my hon. Friend's point about the need to have the regulations in place. The scheme is necessarily somewhat complicated. However, we published draft regulations last week. We hope that representations on those will be forthcoming as soon as possible, certainly during this month. We would then naturally want to publish the regulations in definitive form as early as we can. We want to give charities, employers and employees the longest possible notice to implement the scheme. Those who will want to take part will need to have the formal regulations available before they make their decisions.

Unemployment Levels

13. Mr. Nellist asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to include a forecast of the levels of unemployment in his next Budget; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: No. It has not been the practice of this or previous Governments to publish forecasts of unemployment.

Mr. Nellist: Is not the real reason for that answer the fact that, despite the 18 statistical fiddles that the Government have used to count the number of unemployed in the past seven years, the only hope that the Government see for bringing the unemployment figures below 3 million by the time of the general election is through further statistical fiddles? The Government's own figure shows that there are 7,154 unemployed in Coventry, South-East, costing £46 million a year in benefits and costing those in work £35 a week. Is not the only hope for the unemployed in Coventry, South-East, not more statistical fiddles, but a change of Government?

Mr. MacGregor: Not at all. I must make it clear that we are simply following previous practice. There is no question of any change in the publication of forecasts of unemployment. The hon. Gentleman never understands that it is customers for goods and services at home and overseas who create jobs. They are hugely put off by the sort of activities which the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues previously undertook and encouraged in British industry, which did so much to destroy jobs. It is the reverse of that which is the greatest hope.

Mr. Churchill: Although the levels of unemployment remain unacceptably high, is it not noteworthy that this country has a higher proportion of its population of working age in employment than any other major country in western Europe? Will my right hon. Friend take steps to make that fact more widely known?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend is right and I am extremely grateful to him for giving me another opportunity to make that fact known. There is only one other country which has a higher proportion. What is more, in this country our level of youth unemployment is below the EEC average, and falling. It is also true that we have had an employment increase. It is important to emphasise, as my hon. Friend did, employment rather than simply unemployment. It is true that we have had an employment increase in the past 13 quarters, which is the longest period of continuous employment growth for almost 30 years. Those are the facts and my hon. Friend is entirely right in emphasis.

Mr. Terry Davis: Will the Chief Secretary admit that the reason why the Government will not publish the forecast is not that the forecast does not exist but that if they did publish it it would confirm what everybody knows, which is that the Government have no hope to give the people who have no jobs?

Mr. MacGregor: That is simply not true. We are following the practice of previous Governments, none of whom have produced long-term forecasts on unemployment.

Asset Sales

14. Mr. James Lamond asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest estimate of the proceeds from asset sales for 1986-87.

Mr. MacGregor: Privatisation proceeds in 1986-87 are expected to be about £4¼ billion, as indicated in the 1986 public expenditure White Paper.

Mr. Lamond: As the gas industry in this country already has the widest possible ownership, that is, every citizen of the land, what is the point of continuing with a £20 million advertising campaign — all at the cost of consumers of gas? That is enough money to provide every retirement pensioner in this country with a week's free gas to see them over the winter.

Mr. MacGregor: What the Government have been embarking on in their privatisation programme is not only of great benefit to industry and the economy, but provides true public ownership by the wider extension of shares.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 November 1986.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Hughes: Has the Prime Minister had time today to reflect on the seven and a half years of her premiership, and especially on the statement made during the 1979 election that her Government's first task would be to create jobs for our economy? In 1983 the Government said that their greatest task was to create a prosperous economy providing jobs for our people. Can she therefore explain how, in this capital city, unemployment has increased from 2·9 per cent. to 9·4 per cent., with 400,000 people now out of work in London alone? Is there not one answer to that—cruel failure?

The Prime Minister: Since 1983, 1 million net new jobs have been created, which has brought hope to 1 million more people. The hon. Gentleman asked why that has not had a greater effect on the unemployment register. There are three reasons for that: first, unit wage costs are still rising faster than elsewhere; secondly, the continued increase in the population of working age due to the baby boom of the 1960s; and, thirdly, continued reduction in overmanning in manufacturing industry.

Mr. Waller: At this time, when we remember the sacrifices made by our service people in two world wars, will my right hon. Friend look into the actions of those local authorities which, amazingly, have specifically banned those in receipt of service and police pensions from seeking employment with them? Is she aware that the Labour-controlled Bradford council has specifically excluded service pensioners from seeking a job with it? Is that not a slap in the face for all those who have served their country with distinction?

The Prime Minister: I saw that report and I hope that all local education authorities will use the very good teachers who are available and who have served in the forces, especially for subjects such as mathematics and physics. I urge all local authorities to exploit any potential source of good quality teachers. They will find those teachers among people who have served in the armed forces.

Mr. Kinnock: Does the Prime Minister recall telling me on Tuesday that it was for the governors of the BBC to reply to the attacks made by her right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster? Now that those governors have convincingly rebutted 39 out of the 40 charges made by her right hon. Friend, does she agree with the governors or with her right hon. Friend?

The Prime Minister: It is for the governors to answer the complaints. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will recognise that freedom of speech involves the freedom to make complaints — a freedom which he uses every Tuesday and Thursday.

Mr. Kinnock: The BBC has made no attempt to make an incursion into the freedom of speech of any member of the Government. The reverse is certainly not the case. That effort at coercion is so blatant and obvious. Is the Prime Minister accepting the claims of her right hon. Friend, or is she rejecting them? Is she on his side or on the side of the independence of the BBC?

The Prime Minister: The BBC exists because of a charter, a licence and an agreement. That is not embodied in statute at all. Therefore, the governors have a special duty to see that that charter, that licence and that agreement are upheld. People are free to make complaints, and they do. It is up to the governors to answer them. In this instance, the governors have made a reply. It is not for me to judge between them.

Mr. Kinnock: The country will conclude that the governors of the BBC have discharged their duty to freedom, which is more than can be said for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: Bearing in mind that it was the right hon. Gentleman's Labour authorities that tried to restrict the circulation of free newspapers, he is hardly in a position, when he supports that censorship, to make complaints himself.

Mr. Speed: Will my right hon. Friend find time in between her official engagements today to congratulate Mrs. Jo Hawkes, who was the alliance parliamentary candidate in Ashford at the last election, who today joined the Conservative party?

The Prime Minister: I gladly do so. She is welcome, and I wish her well in her future career.

Mr. James Callaghan: In view of the Prime Minister's difficulties in answering questions from my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, may I ask how much longer she intends to allow the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to go on making a fool of the Government?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) joins his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition in making effective use of freedom of speech, which is freedom also to make complaints. I hope that he is not himself trying to stem that freedom by making any suggestion that the BBC has anything other than a duty to uphold the terms of the charter, the licence and the agreement.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the best way for the BBC to allay suspicions of bias and distortion is not for it to sit as judge and jury in such matters, but for it to be answerable, as other television companies might be made answerable, to an independent broadcasting council, to which aggrieved parties could make representations?

The Prime Minister: The difference between the BBC and other television companies, and some of the independent broadcasting companies, is that the other companies are bound by statute passed by the House. The BBC is not bound in any way, which is why complaints have to be made to the governors. I understand that it would be very difficult to take that charter or licence or agreement to court, which imposes on the governors special duties and responsibilities.

Q2. Mr. Loyden asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Loyden: Will the Prime Minister now accept that the questionnaire from the Department of Employment to the unemployed is unnecessary and, indeed, is seen by many in the informed sections of the benefit system as a vicious attack on the unemployed? Will the right hon.

Lady now advise the Secretary of State to withdraw this obnoxious document, so that those who have a right to benefit can claim it?

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. As I said to the House when the same question came up last week, the test of availability for work was confirmed by the Labour Government in the Social Security Act 1975. The hon. Gentleman now therefore wishes to disregard that Act, which was brought in by his own Labour Government.

Q3. Mr. Stern asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stern: In the course of her busy day, will my right hon. Friend find time to consider an inquiry into the use by education authorities of section 11 money, which is provided for the teaching of English to members of ethnic communities, in view of the apparent use of that money by authorities such as Brent, and possibly Avon, for the promotion of black racism?

The Prime Minister: I am aware that two cases have been reported, and the Home Secretary has asked Brent for further information about the use to which it is now proposing to put section 11 grants. He has made it clear that no grant will be paid unless he is satisfied by the reply. The Avon multicultural education centre is also the subject of inquiry by the Home Office, with particular reference to the eligibility for section 11 grant of certain posts there.

Mr. Steel: In the wake of the controversy between the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and the BBC, will the Prime Minister undertake to clarify to all her colleagues the distinction between public interest and party interest? Is she aware, for example, that another of her hon. Friends has been writing to business men in his constituency offering direct access to Government Ministers at a fee of £35 payable to his Conservative association, and, further, claiming it, outrageously, to be a legitimate business expense? Will the Prime Minister recognise that there is a need to draw a clear distinction between the interests of good government and the interests of her party?

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman has any complaints to make, I am sure that he will make them to the proper authorities. With regard to Government and party, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, I am responsible for answering from the Dispatch Box for Government. He equally knows that I am not responsible for answering for party. Although I have done so on the BBC matter, it is not strictly within my course of duty from the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Conway: Bearing in mind my right hon. Friend's responsibility as First Lord of the Treasury for financing the armed forces, may I ask whether she has had time to read this week's survey showing that the majority of young people in Britain would welcome an opportunity to participate in a form of national service? In view of the highly successful expansion of the Territorial Army, will my right hon. Friend introduce a Royal Commission to examine how the young people of Great Britain can serve their country?

The Prime Minister: I saw that report, but our armed forces are based on the existence of voluntary professional armed forces and we do not have any plans at the moment to change that. There are a number of youth training places which can be served in the armed forces and those, I think, are earnestly sought after. I said that at the moment we have no plans to change that. It would, of course, be extremely expensive to alter the whole nature of our armed forces, which I do not wish to do.

Q5. Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Foulkes: Can the Prime Minister explain what circumstances have changed since June to justify our ambassador at the United Nations attacking the Nicaraguans for using the judgment of the world court, which the Foreign Office welcomed when it was promulgated in June? Is this the too-high price that we have to pay for American support over Syria?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is talking nonsense in the latter part of his question. Although we had no legal objection to the resolution, we were not prepared to support the attempt by Nicaragua to exploit a legal judgment for its own—[Interruption.]—political ends. The Government in Nicaragua are increasingly repressive in their methods and in recent months have taken action—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister is entitled to a hearing.

The Prime Minister: In recent months the Government of Nicaragua have taken action to close the Church radio station and newspaper. They also continue to intervene to promote subversion outside their borders, thus threatening the stability of the region.

Mr. Holt: Reverting to the BBC, does my right hon. Friend recall, before the current episode blew up with the BBC, the Ian Curteis play? Is she aware that it was specifically banned from being broadcast, on the direct instructions of the director-general, because it showed the Government and my right hon. Friend in a good light?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that if my hon. Friend has that complaint he can make it to the appropriate authorities.

Q6. Mr. Snape asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Snape: Will the Prime Minister speak to her right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) today and ask him to moderate his intemperate attacks on the BBC? Is she aware that her hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) makes almost nightly appearances on the media? Will the Prime Minister ask her hon. Friend to do two things; first, ensure that a red warning triangle is exhibited, and secondly, curb her appearances before I start believing that the BBC is biased against the Conservative party?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman and so many other Opposition Members have so few complaints about the economy that they can concentrate on the sort of trivia that has been raised during this Question Time.

Autumn Statement

3.30 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.

Cabinet today agreed the Government's public expenditure plans for the next three years. In the normal course of events that would be followed by the publication of the printed autumn statement, accompanied by an oral statement to the House, next Tuesday. For obvious reasons, that is not possible this year. So while the autumn statement will be printed in the normal way and presented to Parliament as soon as the House reassembles next Wednesday, I thought it would be for the convenience of the House if I made my oral statement today. This will cover all three of the key elements in the printed statement: the Government's outline public expenditure plans for each of the next three years and the expected outturn for this year; proposals for next year's national insurance contributions; and the forecast of the economic prospects for 1987 required by the Industry Act 1975.

The full text of the economic forecast, together with the public expenditure figures and the rest of the information customarily published with this statement, will be available from the Vote Office as soon as I have sat down. They will also appear in the printed autumn statement to be published next week.

I turn first to the outturn for the current financial year, 1986-87. The public expenditure planning total now looks likely to amount to almost £140½ billion—£1¼ billion, or a little less than 1 per cent., above what was allowed for in this year's public expenditure White Paper. The main reason for this excess is a 9 per cent. rise in the current spending of local authorities — far more than was provided for.

However, other items on the expenditure side, the largest of which is debt interest, are likely to fall short of what was forecast at the time of the Budget, thus reducing the total overrun on the expenditure side to about £1½ billion.

On the receipts side, the North sea tax take is likely to be even lower, by about £1 billion, than I envisaged at the time of the Budget, largely because for a long period the oil price has been below the $15 a barrel level on which the Budget arithmetic was explicitly based. This shortfall, however, is more than offset by the continuing buoyancy of non-oil tax revenues, in particular VAT and corporation tax. Non-oil revenues now look likely to exceed the Budget forecast by £2 billion. This would imply a net overrun on the receipts side of about £1 billion, rather more than that on the expenditure side. But this will be reduced by a change I propose to make to the North sea fiscal regime.

The collapse of the oil price has led to a sharp cutback in investment activity in the North sea, with inevitable consequences for the United Kingdom offshore supplies industry both in Scotland and the north-east of England. I therefore propose, on a carefully targeted basis, to accelerate the arrangements for the repayment to the oil companies of advance petroleum revenue tax due to them. The details of this change, which will require legislation early in the new Session of Parliament, are set out in a press notice which the Inland Revenue will be issuing as soon as I have sat down.

The new arrangements will have a revenue cost this financial year of some £300 million, which will be fully recouped over the next three years. Taking this into account, the public sector borrowing requirement for the current year is still forecast to be about £7 billion, the figure I set in the Budget.

I turn now to the public expenditure plans for the next three years. Since 1982-83, public spending, both before and after deducting the proceeds of privatisation, has been declining as a proportion of national output. It is set to be lower still this year. The Government are determined to ensure that this trend continues—to see to it that total public spending, even without taking account of privatisation proceeds, continues to decline as a percentage of GDP.

The plans I am about to announce for the next three years secure that objective. Indeed, they show that by the end of the period the ratio of public spending to national output will be back to the level of the early 1970s. But within this overall constraint, and in the context of their policy priorities, the Government have felt it right to allow an increase in the previously announced planning totals for 1987-88 and 1988-89.

Compared with the prospective outturn for the current year, we are now planning for an average growth in the public expenditure planning total of about 1¼ per cent. a year in real terms—well within the prospective growth of the economy as a whole. The new planning totals have thus been set at £148½ billion for 1987-88 and £154¼ billion in 1988-89, an increase of £4¾ billion and £5½ billion respectively over the totals previously published. For 1989-90, the planning total has been set at £161¼ billion.

As usual, these totals incorporate estimates for the proceeds of privatisation. Last year I increased the estimate of these proceeds very substantially to £4¾ billion in each of the three survey years, a figure which I expect to be duly achieved this year. Although the privatisation programme is now moving ahead more strongly than ever before, I have decided to make only a modest further addition to this estimate, bringing it to £5 billion in each of the next three years. The new planning totals also contain substantial reserves, rising from £3½ billion in 1987-88 to £7½ billion in 1989-90.

The public expenditure increases I have announced allow us to make realistic provision both for local authority current expenditure, over which the Government have no direct control, and for demand-led programmes such as social security, while still leaving scope for increased spending on services to which the Government attach particular priority.

But before referring to some of the more important changes, let me make one thing absolutely clear. There can be no question of allowing the projected increases in public expenditure over the next two years to undermine the prudence of the Government's overall fiscal stance. The Government's fiscal stance has been clearly set out in the medium-term financial strategy published at the time of this year's Budget. There will be no relaxation of that stance.

Within the totality of public expenditure, the largest increase is for the local authorities, whose current spending next year is now put at £4 billion above the previous provision. This in part reflects the fact that the previous plans simply carried forward the same level of cash spending as in 1986-87. At the same time, we are increasing next year's aggregate Exchequer grant—the contribution that taxpayers make to local government spending — by almost 10 per cent. over this year's settlement, a rise of almost £1½ billion.

These substantial sums demonstrate in particular the priority the Government are giving to education, which, including the new proposals on pay and conditions of service for teachers announced last week, accounts for about half the total increase in provision. There is also a substantial increase in provision for the police.

On top of the increased provision for the cost of education in schools, which is contained within local authority current spending, there will be additional spending on the universities of £60 million in 1987-88 and £70 million in 1988-89.

Spending on the health and personal social services will be increased by more than £600 million. For the National Health Service alone, the increase in England amounts to more than £300 million a year. Combined with the additional resources being generated by greater efficiency, this will not only enable the Health Service to cope with the growing number of elderly patients, but will also allow it to improve services.

Gross provision for housing investment is being increased by £450 million. This will sustain the rising trend of spending on local authority renovation and improvements and provide additional resources for the housing associations.

In the light of this year's experience, £1¾ billion has been added to next year's provision for social security, most of which represents a greater expected expenditure on existing means-tested benefits.

Provision for investment in roads is being increased by £65 million next year and £75 million the year after, mostly for local authority roads.

For defence, the provision remains as planned in the last White Paper after allowing for minor changes, including a reduction in the estimated cost of the Falklands deployment. The defence programme will continue to benefit from the substantial real growth in previous years and the wide-ranging action to improve efficiency and value for money.

Taking all programmes together, the additions to planned capital expenditure amount to getting on for £1 billion in 1987-88, of which about two thirds is local authority spending. Further details of these and other changes will be contained in the printed autumn statement which will be published as soon as the House returns next week. In addition, full details, together with information on running costs and manpower, will be given in the public expenditure White Paper early in the new year.

I now turn to national insurance contributions. The Government have conducted the usual autumn review of contributions in the light of advice from the Government Actuary on the prospective income and expenditure of the national insurance fund, and taking account of the benefit uprating which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services announced on 22 October.

The lower earnings limit will be increased next April to £39 a week, in line with the single person's pension, and the upper earnings limit will be similarly raised to £295 a week. The limits for the reduced rate bands which I announced in last year's Budget will also be increased again in April but by proportionately larger amounts. The upper limit for the 5 per cent. and 7 per cent. bands will be raised to £65 a week and £100 a week respectively, and the upper limit for the 9 per cent. rate for employers will be raised to £150 a week.

The taxpayers' contribution to the national insurance fund — the so-called Treasury supplement — will be reduced by 2 per cent. to 7 per cent., but this will not require any change in contribution rates. Thus, the main class 1 contribution rates will once again remain unchanged at 9 per cent. for employees and 10·45 per cent. for employers.

Finally, I turn to the Industry Act forecast. Both growth and inflation have turned out to be slightly lower this year than I envisaged at the time of the Budget. Growth now looks like turning out at 2¼ per cent., against a Budget forecast of 3 per cent., and inflation in the fourth quarter of this year is likely to be 3¼ per cent. against the Budget forecast of 3½ per cent.

The principal reason for this slower growth has been the disappointing performance of exports, which were hard hit by the cutback in spending by OPEC and other primary producers affected by the sharp fall in commodity prices in general and the oil price in particular.

Combined with a halving in the value of our own oil exports, this has meant a significant deterioration in the current account of the balance of payments, from a surplus of some £3½ billion in 1985—and a cumulative surplus of £21 billion over the six years from 1980 to 1985 inclusive —to a forecast of broad balance for 1986.

Looking ahead to 1987, the prospects are generally encouraging.

While the necessary adjustment of the exchange rate to the oil price collapse has now taken place, it will inevitably take time before the full benefits come through in higher non-oil exports and lower import growth. This means that we can expect the current account of the balance of payments to go into deficit next year, for the first time since 1979, to the tune of some £1·5 billion. Even so, non-oil exports are forecast to rise next year by 5·5 per cent. compared with an increase of only 1 per cent. this year, with manufacturing output in consequence up by 4 per cent. And with domestic demand continuing to expand at the same rate as this year, the economy overall is likely to grow by a further 3 per cent. next year — the sixth successive year of steady growth at an average annual rate of almost 3 per cent.

Recorded inflation is likely to edge up a little, to 3·75 per cent. in the fourth quarter of 1987. This is almost entirely due to the effect on the RPI of the timing of mortgage rate changes. The Government's commitment to a monetary policy that will squeeze out inflation remains unabated.

Meanwhile the likelihood of faster growth next year, coming at a time when unemployment already appears to have stopped rising, suggests that the prospects for some fall in unemployment are now more promising. But this promise could still be frustrated by excessive pay settlements.

The strategy that we have followed since 1979 has brought inflation down to the lowest level for two decades, combined with sustained growth and steadily rising living standards. This is a combination that has eluded successive Governments for a generation. We have brought it about by the determined pursuit of free markets and sound money. And that is what we shall stick to.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): First, I welcome the increased expenditure on health, housing and education, small though the increases in the health and housing budgets are. The sick, the homeless and parents will wish that there could be a general election every year. They will wonder why they have waited so long. They will not believe that the sudden change of heart and sudden change of judgment could possibly survive a Tory election victory.

Let me tell the Chancellor straightaway that his figures and forecasts are treated with increasing suspicion, not simply inside the House, but outside it. Therefore, I shall ask him a series of specific questions about the numbers that he has half offered us today. Will he confirm that programme spending is forecast to increase by £7·5 billion in 1987-88 — £4·7 billion on the planning totals, £250 million from privatisation, and £2·58 billion from the contingency reserve?

Will the Chancellor confirm that much of that extra spending is not the result of his careful planning, but the product of overspending this year, which he attempted, but failed, to control and is now taking on into the year that follows? Education at £1·6 billion, social security at £1·6 billion and the EEC at £440 million represent expenditure to which the Chancellor was passionately opposed when they came about.

There is a coy reference in paragraph 29 of his statement to a "greater expected expenditure" on existing means-tested benefits. Translated into English, that means that long-term unemployment has been far greater than the Chancellor kept on pretending that it would be both a year ago and at Budget time. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the buoyancy of non-oil tax revenue is largely the result of wage increases which have outstripped inflation — wage increases which he has constantly condemned, which he attempted to reduce, and for which he now attempts to take the credit?

Is it surprising that, against that background, the House and the country will be wholly sceptical about the right hon. Gentleman's conversion to public spending and the continuation of such policies over a substantial period? So that we can better judge the Chancellor's sincerity, will he make it clear where he stands on the whole variety of targets that were once the centre piece of his policy? Does he support the Governor of the Bank of England in his view that broad money targets should be abandoned? If he does, will he confirm that the medium-term financial strategy, of which he is the author, has finally been laid to rest?

Furthermore, will the Chancellor tell us about the fiscal adjustment, about which we heard so much last year and the year before until it suddenly disappeared? He is right to say that we have heard nothing about it, and that is why our suspicions are increased about the honesty and integrity of his figures. In the March forecast, we were told that the figure would be £2 billion, and that has been spent. Does that mean that there will be no cuts in taxes next year or that the Chancellor will increase the public sector borrowing requirement—not dealt with in the statement —to accommodate tax increases? If he will do neither, will he once more preside over an increase in the total tax burden that the Government levy?

Does the Chancellor realise that the current account deficit is more optimistic than that predicted by any other forecast, and that each forecast is absolutely incredible? Is not the economic outturn now worse than what he predicted at Budget time in a number of crucial areas? I shall ask him, item by item, to confirm or deny that. Is it or is it not a fact that the balance of payments is £3½ billion worse than he forecast at Budget time? Is it or is it not a fact that output in the first half of this year has increased at half the speed that was forecast at Budget time? Is it or is it not a fact that exports have risen at less than one fifth of the rate forecast at Budget time?

Despite all that, and despite all those prospects being worse, the Government propose greater spending than when the prospects were better. Is the Chancellor surprised that we are sceptical about his proposals or that he is fast losing any reputation he ever possessed for financial respectability?

In previous years, in an attempt to sustain his reputation, the Chancellor has done deep damage to the real economy. Now, he is cynically pretending to change course, and one question above all must be asked of him: Having made this apparent swerve, how does he justify the waste and suffering in th seven years of his previous policy? How does he justify the cuts in Government expenditure that robbed the pensioners and closed hospitals, or the medium-term financial strategy, which added 2 million to total unemployed? That was supposed to be the price of getting the economy right. The economy is not right, yet unemployment remains at an unacceptable level. Today's statement has done nothing to help in that essential area.

Mr. Lawson: Since the right hon. Gentleman absented himself from the whole of Treasury questions to have time to mug up the questions he has just asked, I should have thought that he could have done a little better than he did. I shall do my best to answer the right hon. Gentleman's questions. I shall take them in the order that he asked them. [Interruption.] If right hon. and hon. Members do not want me to answer the right hon. Gentleman's questions, I shall not answer them. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to hear the Chancellor.

Mr. Lawson: The right hon. Gentleman referred to the public expenditure increase. I have already announced the public expenditure increase, and it is as he says. He then referred to the buoyancy of revenues. The buoyancy of revenues is due, above all, to two facts — first, continuing vigorous economic growth and, secondly, the greatly increased profitability of companies which has led to a large increase in the yield of corporation tax.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the medium-term financial strategy. If he had been paying attention he would have heard me explicitly reaffirm the medium-term financial strategy.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the fiscal adjustment. He may not be aware that last year I announced that I would, and I did from last year, discontinue the practice of giving the fiscal adjustment, because it is a misleading and unreliable essay. Subsequent events proved the rightness of that course.

He then asked about the PSBR for next year. I made it quite clear in my statement that the PSBR in 1987-88 will be held to 1¾ per cent. of GDP. So there will be no expansion of the PSBR.

The right hon. Gentleman said that some things, such as exports, are lower this year than I forecast at the time of the Budget, and that GDP is 2¼ per cent. as against 3 per cent. That is absolutely right, as I announced in my statement. However, inflation was lower also. The right hon. Gentleman wondered how it was, when those items had fallen short of expectations, that I could announce an increase in public expenditure. Clearly he is unaware that the public expenditure increase is for the years ahead. As I have made clear, the prospect for the years ahead is for a growth of 3 per cent.—higher than the 2½ per cent. we have had this year. The right hon. Gentleman failed to take into account the fact that, since 1982-83, public expenditure has consistently fallen as a share of gross domestic product, and will continue to do so. That is in sharp contrast to the position when the Labour party was in government when, despite the IMF, it was rising faster than GDP. That is what got us into the problems that we had in the 1970s. The right hon. Gentleman accused me —if I took down his words correctly— of "cynically pretending to change course". I can assure him that we are not changing course.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement will be welcomed, in as much as the borrowing requirement will not be increased but will be held as forecast? Will he re-emphasise that, this year, there is extra captial expenditure— the total is a lower proportion of GDP—and that, out of £148 billion the capital expenditure allocation will be over £22 billion?

Mr. Lawson: My right hon. Friend is right and I thank him for his remarks. Capital expenditure has been increased by almost £1 billion in 1987-88 over the previously published plans. The Opposition are on extremely shaky ground on capital expenditure because we all recall what they did to slash it on the Health Service, hospitals, roads and anything else on which they could lay their hands.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer agree that at least one conceivable weakness in his current strategy is the degree to which he is relying on the tax take that he receives from various resources as a result of the current credit boom, which is something that cannot be sustained? This is creating demand which in turn is creating consumption and imports, but it is not creating the jobs and investment that we require. The Chancellor admits in his statement that we shall have a balance of payments deficit. Could not his strategy lead to pressure on the pound in terms of interest rates and its valuation, and is it not right to say, to quote an American president, that we ain't seen nothing yet?

Mr. Lawson: That was rather a long question, if it was a question at all. If the hon. Gentleman is interested, the forecast for consumer demand in 1987 is a growth of 4 per cent. compared with 5 per cent. this year. The forecast is that consumer demand will be growing more slowly next year than this year, whereas both investment and exports will be growing more rapidly.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): The statement as a whole is welcome, but does my right hon. Friend recall that those advocating higher public expenditure have stressed the importance of concentrating on capital rather than on current expenditure? Is he satisfied with the balance between the two? Is there not cause for concern about the level of wage settlements, especially when they are linked to national wage agreements, which are a means of increasing unemployment in areas where it is highest?

Mr. Lawson: My right hon. Friend holds a position of special responsibility as the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, and he is right to point to the problems of excessive pay increases in the public sector. As I said in my statement, the greatest single area of growth is in local authority current spending. Some of the spending is very welcome, but roughly 45 per cent. of local authority current expenditure is on pay, excluding teachers' pay. The rapid rise in that expenditure, over which the Government have no direct control, is a major problem in getting the balance right between current expenditure and capital expenditure, about which my right hon. Friend is rightly concerned.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Since the last public expenditure White Paper, how much has the reserve for 1987-88 and that for the following year been reduced? In other words, how far has the Chancellor of the Exchequer eaten into that contingency reserve? Since the previous autumn statement, has the assumption for unemployment next year been increased or reduced?

Mr. Lawson: The assumption for unemployment next year will appear in the Government Actuary's report, and will be slightly higher than the figure in the Government Actuary's previous report. The right hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I am wrong, but I think that the increase is 50,000, representing an increase that has already taken place. It is not a projection of a future increase. The reserve always comes down as the year rolls closer. The reduction is especially large this year and is one of £2¾ billion, from £6¼ billion to £3½ billion for 1987-88. The reduction is rather on the large side because, as I said in my statement, and as we stated explicitly in last year's autumn statement, the figure for local authority expenditure for 1987-88 had not been agreed. Therefore, we carried forward the same cash figure for 1986-87 and stated that we had made special allowance in a specially enlarged reserve to accommodate that. This year we have put in what we consider to be a realistic assessment of local authority current expenditure for all three years.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Is it not those who are lucky enough to work in the public sector who will gain most from the transformation of the star chamber into the school tuck shop? Cannot my right hon. Friend hold out any hope of reducing the heaviest burden of taxation on the lowest paid in the private sector, who do not have the advantages of those in the public sector?

Mr. Lawson: I think that some of my colleagues—I shall not mention names— who have appeared before the so-called star chamber will be slightly surprised to hear it described as a school tuck shop. My hon. Friend knows full well the nature of the Government's taxation objectives. Taxation, however, is a matter for the Budget and not one for now. Clearly a pound cannot be used twice. A pound which is used in higher public expenditure is not available for reductions in taxation.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): The Chancellor announced in his statement an increase of £450 million in expenditure on housing. As the Government, in their report last year, estimated that £20 billion were required to bring local authority housing stock into a livable state of repair, do my constituents now have to wait 41 years for repairs to be carried out?

Mr. Lawson: I do not accept the figures which the hon. Gentleman has quoted, which were put together by local authorities, which made their own assessments of what they thought was necessary. The figures were published subsequently by the Department of the Environment. The statistics were provided by the local authorities in the various areas. The increase in housing expenditure, which I have announced, is an important one, and I hope that Opposition Members will not deride it.

Sir Edward du Cann (Taunton): If my right hon. Friend is still seeking reductions in the absolute levels of expenditure in addition to the proportionate levels to which he referred, and large consequential reductions in taxation — we hope that we shall hear much more of both matters in his Budget next year — will he give urgent consideration to the proposal, which I think is supported in all quarters of the House, for the repatriation of agricultural policy? The runaway extavagance of the common agricultural policy is not only a continuing scandal, but the indiferrence of the member Governments of the European Community in grappling with it is something which is causing great impatience throughout the nation.

Mr. Lawson: I am sure that my right hon. Friend knows that Britain and its Government are taking the lead in seeking the reforms of the CAP that are long overdue. The problems of overproduction and subsidisation of food and agriculture are not peculiar to the European Community. It is a worldwide phenomenon: it is exactly the same in the United States, Japan and throughout the industrialised world. That is why my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, at the Tokyo summit earlier this year, insisted on having for the first time in a summit communiqué mention made of a problem which the whole world must address. It is one of the greatest problems facing the world over the next 10 years.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer recognise that the ending of the long run of large surpluses on the current account of the balance of payments should be greatly welcomed in view of its beneficial effect upon the level of economic and, particularly, industrial activity?

Mr. Lawson: I note the right hon. Gentleman's views, although I do not believe that the linkage is quite as simple as he suggests.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): If there is to be an increase of £4·75 billion above the planned totals for public expenditure next year, and if, as my right hon. Friend says, there is to be no relaxation of the Government's fiscal stance, is it safe to conclude that there will be, thanks to the vigour and dynamism of the economy next year, a natural increase in revenue of about the same amount? If that is right, is it not an encouraging prospect for those of us who still want to see substantial tax cuts?

Mr. Lawson: I share my right hon. Friend's desire to see substantial, continuing tax cuts, but we shall have to wait until next year's Budget to see what the prospects will be.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Does the Chancellor seriously deny that, although he has been talking about the prudence of the Government's overall fiscal stance, the reality is that he has just begun to paddle his electoral canoe with a moderate expansion financed by privatisation? Will he recognise that he will not get very far with the dead weight of mass unemployment costing £20 billion? The sooner he addresses his mind to that fact, the better it will be for the country and, indeed, for the Government.

Mr. Lawson: I share the right hon. Gentleman's concern at the level of unemployment. I should have hoped that he would welcome the fact that, over the past six months there has been no increase in unemployment. The most recent seasonally adjusted figures are the same as they were six months ago. As for paddling electoral conoes, I can well understand why the right hon. Gentleman is so nervous about the prospect of an election.

Mr. Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the autumn statement again refutes the bogus accusation that the Government have written off Scotland? Will he confirm that Government spending on public services in Scotland is now greater in real terms than it was in 1979 and that Scotland is also getting better value for money, as Government funds are aimed at greater efficiency in the public services and the creation of new jobs in the private sector rather than subsidising industries that are no longer competitive?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. He might also have added that we are blessed with a Scottish Chief Secretary.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Chancellor reflect on the fact that, seven years after the Conservative party came to power and after receiving £50 billion in revenue from North sea oil, he predicts an encouraging internationally competitive position in 1987. What does he mean by "encouraging" in terms of the balance of payments and current account? In terms of North sea oil advance petroleum revenue tax, what effect is this likely to have on the cash flows of oil companies and on exploratory and development activities in the North sea in relation to Scottish employment?

Mr. Lawson: It is encouraging that the forecast is for growth of 3 per cent. in 1987—the sixth successive year of growth of 3 per cent. or thereabouts — and of inflation remaining low.

As for the North sea oil picture, with special reference to Scotland, about which the hon. Gentleman is something of an expert, the APRT change is deliberately geared precisely to the point to which he adverted. That is why it will require immediate legislation. It is to help the immediate cash flow position, particularly of smaller independent companies. That has an important bearing on the workload of the offshore supply industry in Scotland and in the north-east of England. It is a repayment of tax that has already been paid by them.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): In deciding what weight to give the shadow Chancellor's advice on these matters, will my right hon. Friend reflect on the fact that 15 December marks the eleventh anniversary of the infamous letter from a former Chancellor to the managing director of the International Monetary Fund and that that letter had been preceded by a rate of inflation of 26·9 per cent? Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to reaffirm his own commitment and that of the Prime Minister to stable prices by the end of the next Parliament?

Mr. Lawson: That is certainly our aim and ambition. Having got inflation down, as my hon. Friend pointed out, from 26·9 per cent. at its peak during the last Labour Government to 3 per cent. today, it is the aim and ambition of the Government and myself to reach stable prices by the end of the next Parliament.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Will the Chancellor come clean and admit to the House that, along with the abandonment of his monetary targets, the autumn statement and the accompanying boasting press releases about public expenditure today, he has completed the abandonment of his past monetarist policies? Will he admit that he is doing that to generate a short-term pre-election boom to seek a short-term party political benefit? Will he confirm that the long-term damage of the policy is borne out by the £1·5 billion balance of payments deficit, which he forecast this afternoon, and the assumption that there will still be over 3 million people unemployed in 1990? Will he change his policies so that demand is channelled into investment and exports rather than into consumption and imports?

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman is extraordinary. It is almost inevitable that, given the halving of our oil export earnings virtually overnight, there would be a period during which the balance of payments in the current account would go to deficit before the non-oil majority of the economy could increase their exports sufficiently and compete more effectively against imports. That is what will happen. As I pointed out in my earlier remarks, non-oil exports are expected to rise by 5½ per cent., almost twice the rate of the economy as a whole, and non-oil business investment is likely to rise about 3 per cent. in line with the rise in the economy as a whole. I am talking about a balanced growth, not one that is loaded particularly on to consumption, with consumption, investments and exports all going ahead.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to bear in mind that there is to be a further statement after this one, and there is also to be an economic debate. I will allow questions to go on for a further 10 minutes on this matter, during which time I hope that each hon. Member who has risen will be called. Those who are seeking to take part in the subsequent debate might reserve their questions until then.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on achieving a remarkable balance between obtaining the responsible management of the economy that we have expected from the Government until now and acceding to the reasonable requests of those who wanted an element of greater expenditure. How does my right hon. Friend see the economic environment in the current year, particularly for the business sector, to which we look for the generation of wealth in the future and, indeed, of future employment?

Mr. Lawson: The continuing low inflation and the high company profitability which is enjoyed in the corporate sector—the highest for about 20 years—coupled with the benefit that the non-oil sector has enjoyed arising from the adjustment of the exchange rate to the fall in oil prices, give British industry, and particularly British manufacturing industry, an unparalleled opportunity. I am sure they are capable of grasping that opportunity, and I hope they do so.

Mr. Reg Freeson (Brent, East): The Chancellor in his autumn statement, if I recall it correctly, expressed the hope for a reduction in unemployment from 1987. The Government actuarial figures, to which he referred, suggest an immediate increase in unemployment. In June or July this year, the Secretary of State for Employment forecast a reduction in unemployment by the end of this year. Can the Chancellor explain what these contradictory statements mean, if anything at all?

Mr. Lawson: The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparbrook (Mr. Hattersley) in his question about unemployment, correctly pointed out that the Government Actuary's figure was not a forecast but an assumption based on the current rate of unemployment. It is an assumption that has been adopted by Governments of both parties.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): So that this will be clearly understood by the local authority negotiators, will my right hon. Friend confirm that the increases in the education provision are intended to fund only the level of settlement suggested last week by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science and not a penny more?

Mr. Lawson: Most certainly. The extremely generous settlement on teachers' pay which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science announced is a decision. There is no question of any more being paid to the teachers than the substantial increases announced by my right hon. Friend. The total provision for the whole of the responsibilities of the Department of Education and Science—schools, universities and everything else has risen by £2¼ billion over the previous published plans.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Since the junior health Minister declared at the Dispatch Box last Friday that she was more than happy with a 30 per cent. cut in non-emergency ambulance services in London, may we assume that none of the £300 million which the Chancellor has announced will go to restore those grievous cuts?

Mr. Lawson: Those are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and Social Services.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Does my right hon. Friend think that the response to his autumn statement by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was rather dyspeptic, as though he had just, unusually, had to swallow something that he found disagreeable? The right hon. Gentleman referred to Government cuts, but is it not the case that, in every year since 1979, public spending has increased in real terms and that the statement, in effect, announced that that trend will continue? Does not my right hon. Friend foresee after the next general election our Government getting to grips with public spending and being able to make real reductions in it?

Mr. Lawson There has been a steady improvement on the position that we inherited. Taking general Government expenditure and deducting from it privatisation proceeds in order to obtain the steady underlying trend, public expenditure increased in real terms by about 3 per cent. a year, year in, year out, over the 10 years before 1978-79. That is why, as I said earlier, we got into the difficulties we did. During the first Parliament under the Government, we reduced that increase to 2¼ per cent. a year. During this Parliament, we have reduced it further to 1¾ per cent. a year so far. Over the three years to come, we plan to reduce it further to 1 per cent. a year.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): In his late and quite inadequate reference to unemployment, the Chancellor said that relief could only be prejudiced by high wage settlements, despite the virtual stagnation of private sector investment. Where in his statement can the Chancellor point to a single measure that might alleviate that upward pressure on interest rates which is preventing the revival of private sector investment?

Mr. Lawson: There is no stagnation of private sector investment. Private sector investment — I may have something to say about this in the following debate — has risen in the upswing since the middle of 1981 faster than consumer spending. The forecast for 1987 — this is the new fact which I have to tell the House — is for non-oil business investment to rise by about 3 per cent., or perhaps even a little more, fully in line with the growth of the economy as a whole. That is by no measure stagnation.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): If monetary indicators are no longer a good guideline to over-heating in the economy, will my right hon. Friend tell us what factors in the economy are now a good guide to over-heating?

Mr. Lawson: Monetary indicators are very important. I urge my hon. Friend, because of his deep and abiding interest in this subject, to read carefully the lecture by the Governor of the Bank of England at Loughborough which went into the matter in immense detail and was very persuasive, explaining the difficulties in interpreting broad money aggregates. However, MO — the narrowest of the aggregates — does not suffer from these deficiencies. It will be easier to see whether that is on track. I am glad to say that it is.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer aware that, next year, in the London borough of Newham the local authority will spend almost £3 million on bed and breakfast charges, whereas in 1984 it was spending only about £92,000? Will the right hon. Gentleman allow the London borough of Newham and the other local authorities to spend the almost £6 billion that is now in bank accounts, built up through the sale of council houses in capital receipts? If the right hon. Gentleman is not prepared to give that sanction, will he please explain how spending accumulated capital receipts affects the public sector borrowing requirement?

Mr. Lawson: It is clear that all public expenditure affects the public sector borrowing requirement, whether it is notionally financed out of accumulated receipts — which in practice may often have been spent anyway — or not.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that by far the most disturbing aspect of his statement is the 9 per cent. overspend by local authorities? Will he join me in urging my colleagues who represent shire counties to press upon county councillors the advice and the example given to them by business interests and to take independent advice on the management of their services with a view to obtaining reductions in costs?

Mr. Lawson: I agree with my hon. Friend. County councillors and, indeed, all councillors on important councils will be well-advised to do that.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Are the estimates of Britain's contribution to the EEC budget over the next three years based on a continuation of the maximum VAT rate at 1·4 per cent.? If so, is that not a very unwise assumption?

Mr. Lawson: The answer to the first question is yes. the answer to the second question is no.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): What account has my right hon. Friend been able to take of the projected rate rise in many Labour-controlled councils, such as Ealing where rate increases of between 50 and 100 per cent. are expected next April after the Labour council has been one year in power? Is my right hon. Friend aware of the devastating effect that that will have on the local economy and on people's ability to pay their rates?

Mr. Lawson: I fully understand the problem to which my hon. Friend alludes. The practice of Labour councillors, cynically pushing up expenditure and the rates and not caring who gets hurt — whether it is the householders or the small business man — does immense damage. We have sought to limit that damage by the introduction of rate capping in a number of areas. That has protected the ratepayers in those areas, but in many areas that are not rate capped Labour councillors are able to do, and are doing, great damage.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer aware that, if the BBC dared broadcast the truth about what he has had to say today, it might suggest that a pawnbroker stood up in the House of Commons, masquerading as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, surrounded by mountains of debts? It might suggest that that same man was handing out a few electoral bribes, never mentioning the fact that in seven years the credit card holders have become indebted to the tune of £27 billion and that the average family's debt as a proportion of real disposable income has gone up from 45 per cent. to 70 per cent. and that the Government borrowed $4 billion only seven weeks ago to bail out this failing economy and then, having finished what he had to say, having not mentioned anything about unemployment and the prospects for those people who are out of work, he turned like a corkscrew and sat down next to the right hon. Lady who used to occupy the place called Grantham café, which has finished up as one of the 100,000 bankruptcies in Britain during the right hon. Gentleman's seven years' rule.

Mr. Lawson: Not even the BBC would be guilty of the hon. Gentleman's flight of fancy.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Following the question posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), will my right hon. Friend confirm that the £1·5 billion, or 10 per cent., increase in aggregate Exchequer grant should not be seen as an encouragement of profligacy in local government? On the contrary, it should be seen as an encouragement for local government to emulate central Government in contracting out and in the privatisation of services — something that many local authorities, even Conservative ones, have signally hitherto failed to do.

Mr. Lawson: I agree with my hon. Friend about the desirability of local authorities' contracting out and privatisation. Unfortunately, an insufficient number have done so, but those that have pursued that policy have gained great benefit for their ratepayers and need to pursue it further. What we have decided by way of aggregate Exchequer grant is fully sufficient for the needs of local authorities in Britain. I hope that there will be no occasion for anybody to suggest otherwise.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): With regard to the increase in public expenditure which has just been announced by the right hon. Gentleman, how much will go to Scotland?

Mr. Lawson: I have not the precise figures in my head. The hon. Gentleman will know full well that public expenditure per head in Scotland is considerably higher than public expenditure per head in England.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the increased public expenditure on education — provided it is tied, as the Government rightly insist that it must be, to copper-bottomed staff contracts and a rigorous squeeze on local authority extravagance — should be properly regarded not simply as an increase in current expenditure but something quantitatively different — an investment in the future productive capacity of the nation?

Mr. Lawson: I think that we have a chance, with the decision, and its ramifications, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has announced, of achieving a much needed transformation in our education system. That will result in teachers becoming professionals once again — which they were in danger of ceasing to be — and will be of great benefit to children. It will also benefit the future of this country, both its economic and wider future.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Can the Chancellor explain why he did not mention interest rates in his statement, especially as they have just gone up again? Industry, public services and employers are dependent on these rates. What does he propose to do to bring the interest rate down below 10 per cent? Interest rates have never reached that level under this Government.

Mr. Lawson: Interest rates have been below 10 per cent. during this Parliament. The hon. Gentleman is misinformed.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): The Chancellor said that he did not have the expenditure figures for Scotland in his head. As far as I can make out, looking at the papers in the Vote Office, they are not available there either.

Can the right hon. Gentleman explain why, in a statement which had an air of unreality about it, Scotland in particular has been treated in this unreal way? He will remember that normally there are separate figures for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. This year there is a new beast — territorial and other Departments. That appears to cover Wales, Northern Ireland, Scotland certain parts of the Property Services Agency and Civil Service superannuation, which are linked in one aggregate figure. Can the Chancellor explain why this is so, and, having abolished Scotland in this rather cavalier and offhand way, will he guarantee that these aggregate figures are given at an early date and apologise to Scottish Members for this ludicrous situation in which it is impossible to get any impression of the impact of the statement in Scotland or the other parts of the United Kingdom to which I have referred?

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman really should not be so impatient. It was only today that the Cabinet agreed, as I announced, the public expenditure figures for the year. It is not customary for the House to be informed on the very day of the Cabinet decision. I thought that it would help the House if I did so on this occasion.

The figures for Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales will be published in the normal way, in the printed autumn statement that will appear on Wednesday.

Helicopter Crash (Sumburgh)

4.34 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. John Moore): I am sorry to have to inform the House that at approximately 11.30 today, a Chinook helicopter belonging to British International Helicopters crashed into the sea approximately two miles east of Sumburgh in Shetland. The helicopter was inbound from the Brent field to Sumburgh with 47 people on board—three crew and 44 passengers. A coastguard helicopter which happened to be lifting off from Sumburgh airport at the time was at the scene of the accident almost immediately and recovered two survivors. The survivors were flown to Lerwick for treatment. A number of surface vessels, including the local lifeboat and helicopters, are now at the scene of the accident. No further survivors have so far been found. Eighteen bodies have been recovered. There will be a full investigation by my chief inspector of accidents. A team of investigators has already left for the scene of the accident, as has my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State who is responsible for aviation.

I know the House will join me in expressing its condolences to the bereaved and in commending the rescue services for their prompt action.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman accept the wish of the House to be associated with his condolences for the bereaved as a result of this appalling tragedy? I wish to be associated with his commendation of the rescue services. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that accidents of this kind remind us that we still pay a high price in human terms for the successful exploitation of our North sea oil reserves?

Was any distress signal from the helicopter seen before the accident? Finally, will the right hon. Gentleman accept and pass on the sympathy of the House to those still awaiting news of people missing in this tragic accident?

Mr. Moore: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's first and last points. I know the House shares his sentiments. The hon. Gentleman is right to pay tribute to those whose tenacity, courage and ingenuity have won for our nation such resources from the seas at such clear human cost. We owe them all a debt.

From the information which I have received, no warning signal was given.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): I also wish to be associated with the condolences to the bereaved which have been expressed at this horrific accident. I have travelled in a Chinook helicopter to the North sea rigs a good many times. I would appreciate any more information at this early stage about what exactly happened. My right hon. Friend will be aware that people in these usually safe vehicles wear wetsuits. If the helicopter has to ditch into the sea the passengers can usually survive for some considerable time. The appalling tragedy of the number of deaths in this case suggests that something very much worse happened — perhaps an explosion before the helicopter hit the water. Have there been any reports from witnesses at the scene?

Mr. Moore: I recognise what my right hon. Friend has to say and the experiences he gained during his time at the Energy Department, as I gained during my days there.

I have come to the House with all the information that I have at the moment. There was in fact—coincidentally—a coastguard helicopter which had lifted off from Sumburgh and which was at the scene almost instantly.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I thank the Secretary of State for coming to the House so promptly to make a statement on what is an appalling catastrophe that many of us had feared might happen but hoped would not. Will he also accept our condolences from this Bench? I have spoken by telephone to my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), in whose constituency this accident occurred. He is unable to be here due to a constituency engagement but was anxious to express his sympathies and condolences at this tragedy.

I have been advised that the helicopter was seen to fall out of the sky from a height of 500 ft and it broke on impact with the water. The bodies which have been removed from the water were wearing lifejackets, but these had not been inflated, indicating that there was no warning and that no distress signal was issued.

Will the Minister, to assure the many people who fly regularly, confirm that we will get a quick inquiry into the accident and a quick declaration of the cause? Is he prepared, if necessary, to ground other Chinooks? Regrettably, this is not the first time that such an incident has occurred to a Chinook. I am sure we will appreciate that there is concern among those who, as has been said, must fly to their work tomorrow. If the Minister can give that assurance, the House and the families concerned will be grateful.

Mr. Moore: I welcome the expression of condolences from the hon. Member who represents that part of the world. I have said as much as I can at this stage about the complete absence of warning. By coincidence, a coastguard helicopter was on the spot almost instantly. I cannot go into any more detail. The great benefit of the statutory and independent role of the chief inspector in my Department in instances such as these is that any information which calls for a change in conditions or safety arrangements can be recommended to the Civil Aviation Authority immediately, and even before the investigation is over. We ought to control any suggestions about safety until we have learnt a little more about the incident.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I also express my condolences. If the accident investigation branch of my right hon. Friend's Department requires additional resources, will my right hon. Friend call in the Royal Air Force directorate of flight safety, which has considerable operational experience of the military version of the aircraft?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend is right. If there is a need for additional resources, we will do that. Co-operation between the military and my Department is very close on these matters. As far as I can see, there is no need for additional resources at this stage, but proper investigation of the incident will not be impeded by a lack of resources.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): May I associate myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) with the sympathy that has been expressed? Does the Secretary of State agree that, in spite of this sad accident, we should keep in mind the splendid record of these machines on errands of mercy and life saving generally during the past few years?

Mr. Moore: I very much welcome the right hon. Gentleman's comments. I also want to be associated with his comments about the tremendous work that is done around our shores. I recognise the great safety record that we have so far enjoyed. We shall want to investigate this incident further.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): As, until today's appalling tragedy, the worst helicopter crash occurred in the Isles of Scilly, which are in my constituency, may I be associated with my right hon. Friend's expression of condolences? Although it seems from first reports that the circumstances of the two crashes are quite different and involve a different type of helicopter, will my right hon. Friend tell me, perhaps in writing, whether all the recommendations of the inquiry into the Isles of Scilly crash have been carried out?

Mr. Moore: I shall give my hon. Friend a precise answer and ensure that the information is given to the House. As a result of the Scilly Isles crash, the CAA had to improve standards and conditions for helicopter flying. If the present investigation makes further recommendations, the CAA will be advised and I trust that it will insist on the implementation of any new conditions.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Secretary of State accept that, especially in Scottish Labour minds, this is a severe tragedy? In view of the record of oil companies—Shell is involved here—and the helicopter company and bearing in mind the remoteness of the Shetlands, can the right hon. Gentleman give us some idea of the facilities that have been offered to the next of kin to enable them to get to Sumburgh to alleviate some of the grief? Does he agree that the number of people who have apparently been killed is high, bearing in mind the safety provisions involved in such operations? Is that not most disturbing? Although we want an expeditious inquiry, we want a thorough inquiry into the nature and background of the Chinook and the relevant safety requirements.

Mr. Moore: I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance for which he asks. There is no question but that this must be a most thorough investigation by my chief inspector in the accident investigation branch. I should like to consider the hon. Gentleman's quite legitimate point about remoteness. We are aware of the difficulty of the distances involved. We must concern ourselves with the bereaved. I shall consider that matter with as much sympathy as I can.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): If this tragic accident is found to be the result of a mechanical malfunction, does it not call into question the apparent preference of the British Army for Chinook helicopters rather than smaller British made helicopters as a means of transporting troops? Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the investigation includes Ministry of Defence personnel and that the results of it are fully disclosed?

Mr. Moore: I think it quite inappropriate for me to draw any further conclusions than the ones that I have already drawn with the information that I have now.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I associate myself and my right hon. and hon. Friends with the expressions of sadness that we all feel at this appalling tragedy.

Although the right hon. Gentleman is right not to speculate about the causes of the accident, is he aware that those of us who have constituents who travel daily on such transport will want to know the inquiry's findings as soon as possible to end any possible speculation?

Mr. Moore: I fully understand the hon. Gentleman's point. I also understand the nature of activity in his constituency, having visited Dounreay. I shall make every effort to ensure that the House receives every possible piece of information. The most important thing is to ensure that there is a thorough investigation and to act upon its findings. We must do that first.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): I also express my condolences. Does my right hon. Friend know whether the helicopter was carrying a flight recorder or a cockpit voice recorder?

Mr. Moore: I am sorry, but I cannot answer that question now. I shall let my hon. Friend and the rest of the House know the answer through a letter placed in the Library.

Master J. R. Bickford Smith

4.45 pm

Mr. Speaker: I undertook yesterday to consider the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) about the Attorney-General's answer in last Tuesday's Hansard giving the results of an investigation into the allegations made by the hon. Member regarding the case of Tubero v. Toomey and others.

The hon. Member put to me three specific points. He asked first, whether it was not for the Lord Chancellor to have set up an inquiry into the hon. Member's allegations and then, without any reference to the hon. Member, to have announced the result of the inquiry in an answer given by the Attorney-General to a written question. To that point, I can only reply that since the hon. Member, as he himself said, asked the Lord Chancellor to set up an inquiry, it is for the Lord Chancellor to decide what form the inquiry should take and how its result should be announced. The Attorney-General, of course, answers for the Lord Chancellor in this House. As far as reference to the hon. Member is concerned, while that is a matter of courtesy between hon. Members and not a rule of the House, I hope it will always be observed.

"a gross abuse of both Houses" — [Official Report, 5 November 1986; Vol. 103 c. 955.]

In his second point, the hon. Member asked me whether it was proper to impugn the integrity of a Member by means of the question and answer procedure, instead of putting down a substantive motion for that purpose. In considering that point, I think it has to be borne in mind that last Tuesday's written answer summarised the results of an inquiry into the hon. Member's allegations. The answer consists largely of a rebuttal of those allegations. It also includes criticism of the hon. Member's conduct in presentation of his case. It is a long-established principle that criticism of a Member's conduct should be embodied in a substantive motion.

Finally, the hon. Member asks me to which Members of the judiciary the rule applies which requires reflection on conduct to be embodied in a substantive motion. The answer is set out in "Erskine May" at page 378, which specifies:

"Judges of the superior courts of the United Kingdom, including persons holding the position of a judge, such as a judge in a court of bankruptcy and a county court, or a recorder."

I am satisfied that masters of the Supreme Court do not fall within this category.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): I of course accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and apologise if, in my parliamentary answer, I went further than parliamentary convention allows. The substance of my answer was a complete rebuttal of the allegations, but I regret that the answer also reflected on the conduct of the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) in an unparliamentary way.

BBC (Libel Action)

4.48 pm

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologise, after two long statements, for wearying the House, but this is an important matter which affects the privileges of the House.

You will know, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) has on many occasions recently sought to use the privilege of the House to call into question the conduct, or alleged conduct, of Mr. David Mitchell, an employee of Conservative Central Office, whom he has accused of having interfered with witnesses in a libel action, recently disposed of, which I had against the BBC. That is a serious criminal offence.

You will recall that on Tuesday the hon. Member for Workington announced, on a point of order, that he was sending a transcript of a tape recording of a conversation to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General. My right hon. and learned Friend yesterday wrote to the hon. Gentleman to say that in that tape recording he could find no evidence or material which would justify his asking the police to carry out an inquiry. He also sent that transcript to the Director of Public Prosecutions, who concurred with my right hon. and learned Friend's conclusion. I should like to ask whether it would be appropriate for the hon. Member for Workington, whom we all know to be a man of the highest integrity, to apologise now to Mr. David Mitchell for having made allegations about him for which there is no foundation?

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe that the Attorney-General has given the matter his fullest consideration. For a start, the Attorney-General, during his reply, has pointedly refused to respond to any of the statements made by the parties to the transcript on interference with witnesses. At no stage in the reply does he refer to what they say. The fact that the transcript indicates, indeed states, in the words of one of the parties to the transcript, that a cover-up was organised by Conservative Central Office seems unimportant to him. He refuses to be drawn on that.

The fact that the transcript draws attention to the prospect of perjury by witnesses he treats as unimportant and refuses to be drawn on it. In his reply to me he does not refer to the fact that the transcript points to the changing of stories by witnesses and hon. Members, and to pressure being exerted by Mr. David Mitchell. The fact that potential witnesses were frightened by the prospect of being identified and their names published in national newspapers and were modifying their evidence to avoid embarrassment seems unimportant to him. It is all in the transcript and he refuses to be drawn on it.

It is absurd for anyone to suggest that the evidence as submitted did not warrant an inquiry by the police. The Attorney-General, who refuses to be drawn on the matter of political pressure over the Westland leak, is the same man who today refuses to be drawn on the question of political pressure on witnesses to the BBC trial. No one should believe what is being said by the Attorney-General.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot see any point of order that arises for me in this. I have not heard the tape. It is not a matter of order; it is very much a matter for debate.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I believe that there is a point of order here. The right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), who is in the Chamber, suggested on 27 October that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) would have said, had you not cut him short, that as many as 17 out of 20 witnesses may have been persuaded to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We cannot get into a debate on this. Will the hon. Gentleman come to a point of order which I can seek to answer?

Mr. Howarth: Is it in order for hon. Members who have been cleared by the Attorney-General to be mentioned in that way? Is it not incumbent upon the hon. Member for Workington to name those people and place the transcript in the Library, so that we can all see it?

Mr. Speaker: I think that we have dealt with that matter. [Interruption.] Order. The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is not even in the Chamber.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I am, just.

Mr. Speaker: Well, stay there. I think that we dealt with this matter on Tuesday. I cannot see any point of order for me.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): On a separate point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), under the cloak of privilege, has been able to make certain challenges to the answers given by the Attorney-General and the Director of Public Prosecutions, may I ask you to rule that the hon. Gentleman should place the tapes to which he is referring in the Library of the House?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me. The tapes are not an official document.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I would be more than happy if the Attorney-General would use the power and the right that he has, and which I do not have, to place that transcript, under the cover of privilege, in the Library. I ask him to do so.

Animal Liberation Front

4.54 pm

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the distribution of a booklet correlating Animal Liberation Front activities and containing instructions on how to make incendiary devices and fire bombs."

Two days ago an animal rights campaigner in Herefordshire let it be known that he was deeply concerned and disgusted at a leaflet and booklet that he had received through the post. I now have a copy of that sinister booklet and I am appalled by its content. The content is a wide incitement to action to cause damage. Most important is the explicitly detailed instruction on how to make incendiary devices and how to use them to maximum effect.

Regardless of the views that hon. Members may hold on the complicated and knotty issues of animal welfare and rights, I am sure that all hon. Members have a serious interest in the safety of their constituents and in the general rule of law. The fact that a leaflet is being freely distributed across the country at this time which gives such explicit details of how to assemble incendiary devices from everyday household materials, and how to plant them for greatest effect, must surely be a matter of immediate concern to the House. The fact that it is being widely distributed, as it claims, is even more worrisome, since it will inevitably become of interest to a wider readership than simply those interested in animal rights, who could be disposed towards mischief, innocent or otherwise, with injury or loss of life resulting. That underlines the seriousness and urgency of the matter.

I hope that peaceful recipients of this anonymous publication will waste no time in burning the copies sent to them, or will let their views be known to the publisher, if they know who it is. The House should be given an early opportunity to express its revulsion at such tactics and to discharge its duty to alert the public to a threat to public order which is being built up as a consequence of this irresponsible and reprehensible course of action from extremists, whoever they are.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the distribution of a booklet correlating Animal Liberation Front activities and containing instructions on how to make incendiary devices and fire bombs."

I have listened with great care to what the hon. Gentleman has said. I regret that I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House. However, I hope that he will find other ways to bring this important matter before the Chamber.

Opposition Day

[20TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Economic Policy

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the Opposition Front Bench spokesman to move the motion, I must announce that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister and that I shall introduce the ten minutes limit on speeches between 7 o'clock and 9 o'clock.

4.58 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): I beg to move,

That this House condemns the Government's continued operation of economic policies which produce intolerable levels of unemployment, prohibitive interest rates, cuts in public sector capital spending, the destruction of the nation's manufacturing base and a serious loss of the British share in world trade; and calls upon the Government to accept that its economic strategy has failed and to replace it with policies for the real economy which promote investment, growth, employment and exports.

Anyone who heard today's autumn statement will agree that the Government are certainly not steering the same course as last year. Indeed, they are steering no steady course at all. Part of the reason for the swerving and skidding is the ambiguity over the medium-term financial strategy. Were the Chancellor not operating his normal levels of courtesy, which make it obligatory for him never to be here when a debate begins, I would direct questions to him specifically on that subject. As it is, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury will no doubt whisper in his ear when he condescends to arrive.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John MacGregor): In all fairness, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) will recall that he was not here throughout the whole of Treasury questions this afternoon. I shall make clear and careful notes of what the right hon. Gentleman says. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor will be here shortly.

Mr. Hattersley: No one except the Chief Secretary would regard there as being anything like a parallel between those cases. It is clear that the Chancellor is not here, and in his absence I shall ask a number of questions about the medium-term financial strategy, of which the Chancellor is the only true begetter and author, and for which he must take responsibility.

The Chancellor insists that the medium-term financial strategy is still in place. I do not believe that that view is accepted anywhere outside the House, nor do I believe that it is accepted by the Chancellor in truth or in honesty. The medium-term financial strategy has either been mortally wounded, or is dead, and so it should be. The strategy is built around the implicit faith that rigorous fiscal and monetary policies will inevitably lead to solutions of the problems of the real economy. That is clearly not so. Even if we are to believe—and it will stretch credulity to breaking point—that the strategy remains, and even if the Chancellor repudiates the Governor of the Bank of England's view on broad money, it is clear that the MTFS has failed and that the economic recovery which it was claimed would automatically be brought about by that strategy's application has not come about and will not come about until there is a change of policies. The effects of the failure cannot honestly be denied, although I have no doubt that the Chancellor will attempt to deny them.

I should like to begin with four examples. Much of Government policy for almost eight years has been designed to hold down interest rates, yet today real interest rates are not only the highest in our history, but are the highest in the industrialised world. The balance of payments, which Government policy proposed to bring into a full year's surplus of £3·5 billion, has slumped into deficit. Indeed, in seven years the Government have converted a surplus of £4 million in the manufacturing account into a £4 billion deficit.

Employment in this country, which the Government claim to have increased—indeed, in the amendment that we are to debate, still claim to have increased—has actually fallen by 1,207,000 since 1979. The Government will have to learn to live with the fact that many of us recall that the Government were elected in 1979, and we are not prepared to start counting their achievements over the past three years alone.

I notice that the Chancellor has just entered the Chamber. I shall give way to him if he wants to apologise for his absence.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): I was absent for the first few minutes of the right hon. Gentleman's speech—which I regret—for exactly the same reason as he was absent through all of Treasury questions, although he has not expressed any regret for that. This is a rather busy day.

Mr. Hattersley: I was absent from the Chamber during Treasury questions because I was reading the Chancellor's autumn statement. I had hoped that the Chancellor would deliver it before 4.30 this afternoon.

I was describing some of the Government's failures. I had dealt with interest rates and was talking about the bogus claims that the Chancellor and his colleagues have made about employment. I repeat for the Chancellor's benefit that employment in this country has actually fallen by 1,207,000 since 1979. Indeed, in Britain over the past seven years we have lost more jobs than the rest of the EEC countries combined. We have lost more than 2 million full-time jobs. We have lost 11,000 jobs in the last quarter, and 114,000 jobs in manufacturing industry in the year to August 1986.

The figures for men and women actually in work, catastrophic though they are, are the figures which the Government attempt to use as a diversion from their unemployment record. On an honest calculation of unemployment—the calculation which the Government inherited—unemployment now stands at almost 4 million. On the Government's own massaged figures it is 3,333,000. On the Government's own initially secret forecast it will be 3,100,000 at the beginning of the next decade. Indeed, we heard from the Chancellor this afternoon that the Government Actuary's report has increased the assumption on unemployment since the report was published last year.

If, in 1979, the BBC had predicted that the result of seven years of Conservative government would be record unemployment, record real interest rates, a collapsing balance of payments and a net job loss of 2 million, the chairman of the Conservative party would have accused it of Bolshevik bias.

[Mr. Hattersley]

The charge sheet is very much longer than that. It includes a record number of company liquidations, the highest total tax bill in British history and the lowest value for sterling ever. The charge sheet is well known in this country, and so is the plea of mitigation. The Government say, and the Chancellor said again this afternoon, that they have done very well on inflation. The Government inherited a retail prices index of 10·3 per cent. They doubled that, largely by a massive increase in value added tax. Then, at a terrible cost to jobs, output and public services, the RPI came down to 3 per cent., although it is now rising again.

In June the Chancellor said:

"our rate of inflation is, if anything, below the European Community average".—[Official Report, 3 June 1986; Vol. 98, c. 758.]

That is a wonderful example of the power of selection that the Chancellor has over statistics. I concede at once how perfectly true that is and that we are doing better than Spain and Greece. However, if we compare the British record with that of other industrialised countries, which are a fair comparison, we find that the picture is very different.

I should like to quote some figures from British Business, the Government's own publication. It shows that inflation is 3 per cent. in the United Kingdom, 2 per cent. in France, 1·6 per cent. in America, 0·8 per cent. in Belgium, 0·1 per cent. in Japan, and in Germany minus 0·4 per cent.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): As the right hon. Gentleman is talking about records, will he remind us when between 1974 and 1979 inflation stood at 3 per cent.?

Mr. Hattersley: The hon. Gentleman knows the answer. Let me give him the other parallel. If he were to compare inflation in Britain with that in the rest of Europe, he would find that it is in no way to the Labour Government's discredit when compared with this Government's record.

Mr. Lawson: Yes, it is.

Mr. Hattersley: The Chancellor says that it is. He will have the opportunity to quote the figures in a moment.

The truth is that, despite the reduction in oil prices and the other factors that have come to the Government's aid, the achievements of which the Government boast are relatively poor compared with what has happened in the EEC. While that part of the Government's record is relatively poor, the rest of the Government's record is absolutely castastrophic. The Government's failure is the Chancellor's personal failure. He is the author of the medium-term financial strategy and the inventor of the nominal targets, and it is the pursuit of those targets which has devastated the real economy.

I know very well that the Chancellor's response will be to defend himself with selective statistics, false comparisons and bogus forecasts. The time has come to deal with some of the sleight of hand in which the Chancellor specialises from debate to debate. The obvious example is that we are told that output in this country is at its highest level in history. So it is, but all that that means is that we are no longer doing worse than we were on the day that the Conservatives were elected. For some years we were doing worse than on election day.

Although we are no longer doing worse than on the day that the Prime Minister entered No. 10 Downing street, we are still doing spectacularly badly. Since 1979 the economy has expanded at an annual average of 1·4 per cent. In the previous 30 years the figure was 2·6 per cent. If the Chancellor, or the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham), wants to ask what the figure was during the Labour Government, let me tell them that it was 1·8 per cent. over the entire period that we were in office—a great deal better than the Government's record since the election.

The Chancellor tells us, too, that exports are at a record level. We are not told that a combination of expanding world trade and a boom in consumer spending has caused imports to rise at an even faster rate. We are not told that we are losing our share of world trade while increasing the volume and value of our imports. The fact is that, in those areas, the Chancellor never tells us the whole truth when it is convenient for him, particularly with regard to trade exports and imports, because to give a truthful account of our balance of payments record would be to expose the cynicism of the Government's policy. We are facing a consumer-led balance of payments crisis. The Chancellor's response to that is to attempt to buy votes by cutting taxes, as I have not the slightest doubt he will in next year's Budget.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will the right hon. Gentleman be more truthful with the House on the matter and agree that one reason for the high level of imports is the lack of quality in British industry? That quality will not be achieved by the prescriptions that he has been putting forward to the British nation over the past two years.

Mr. Hattersley: I do not believe that for a minute. The reason for our record being as bad as I have described is the attack on our manufacturing base, which has been central to the Government's economic policy. More important in that context, the reasons are debatable between us; the facts are not. I only wish that the Chancellor would tell us the facts rather than put the invariable gloss on the truth, which is his stock in trade.

I have no doubt that the Chancellor will deny many of those things when he speaks, so I should like to pause for a moment to evaluate the worth of his denials. On 9 October, on Channel 4 news, he was accused of dodging the issue of exchange rates in his conference speech. I have listened to this with great pleasure several times during the past day. The right hon. Gentleman defended himself by saying that he would deal with the subject in his Mansion house speech in seven days' time. He did not say a word on the subject. However, he dealt with the balance of trade, describing the August trade figures as a freak. What impression did he intend to give by describing them as a freak? Did he mean to suggest that the September figures, about which he must have known something by then—a deficit of £277 million—should be regarded as normal, or was he trying to convey the impression that the balance of trade and the balance of payments were moving into surplus? The truth is that the Chancellor will say anything to get out of a corner. Trapped in a sinking ship, he always throws his integrity overboard, and we hear the splash almost at once.

The Chancellor has similarly played for time with the economy, and he has been rumbled. Capital assets are sold off to finance brief tax reductions. Oil has briefly filled the hole blown in the economy by the collapse of manufacturing industry and the collapse brought on by the pursuit of the arbitrary medium-term financial strategy targets.

In both cases the Government have taken refuge in the most temporary of expedients, for North sea oil is running out, and every time the markets catch a glimpse of what, on present policies, the British economy will be when the oil has gone, they withdraw their confidence from the British economy. That is because the Chancellor has managed to make us peculiarly dependent on the 6 per cent. of gross domestic product that oil provides. I should think—indeed, I feel certain—that there can be no other industrialised country in the world where the Finance Minister would go to Parliament and offer as one of his excuses for failure the reduction in costs inherent in the reduction in oil prices.

As the Chancellor made clear today, that has become one of the reasons why things are not operating in the way that he would choose. Had he used seven years of oil revenues to build up our industrial base, that reduction would have been an unprecedented boom, but, tragically, we are particularly vulnerable to fluctuations in oil revenues because of that dependence, because of the way that the Chancellor has chosen to lean upon them. Because of our tragic dependence, he has made sterling particularly vulnerable to changes in market valuation of our future prospects.

The most desperate example of that was the depreciation of the pound to $1.06 in March 1985. The most recent example was in August this year, when the markets discovered that even with oil we were in massive trade deficit.

The House will recall that the Chancellor told us at the time of the Budget that the reductions that were brought about by the fall in oil prices and oil revenues

"should not cause us undue concern."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 168.]

During the Budget debate the right hon. Gentleman's complacency either rose to new heights or sank to new depths, depending on how complacency is evaluated. He said that, having lost half the value of oil in 25 weeks and survived, we could easily accommodate losing the rest over the next 25 years. I hope that he recalls what has happened since he told us that all was well, that everything was on course, that the economy was moving in the direction that he chose, and that we should not concern ourselves with the change in oil prices. Since then the balance of payments, which at that time was forecast to produce a £5 billion surplus, has moved into deficit. The best that the Chancellor can say about it now is that it will break even, as distinct from the surplus of £5 billion.

Interest rates have gone up again. The Chancellor still shrugs off increases in interest rates—that is, when they are not likely to take place during the Conservative party conference—but as a result of his attitude towards those matters, and as a result of the market's judgment about the economy when the oil runs out and the discovery of our true trade position, and despite the massive intervention in which he was involved in October, the pound still required an increase in interest rates, which inevitably caused enormous damage to investment prospects and enormous hardship to home owners.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): In what way does the right hon. Gentleman think that the policies that he has proposed would have reduced interest rates to the level of those of some of our industrial competitors?

Mr. Hattersley: The straight answer to the question is that the repatriation of funds recently invested overseas will produce an upward pressure on sterling and make it unnecessary to run record interest rates in the way in which the Chancellor has done it.

Having answered the question, let me tell the hon. Gentleman—[Interruption.]—and his colleagues that we chose this debate so that we could talk about the Government's policy. The Chancellor emphasised that by deciding to make his autumn statement today. Now and in future debates neither the hon. Gentleman nor the Chancellor will run away from the consequences of the past seven years by trying to divert attention to other things.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: I shall not give way.

I was going to mention the intervention in October and say that the Chancellor, having spent seven or eight days encouraging and supporting that proposal and that attitude, was still driven to the increase in interest rates, with enormous damage to the economy, as well as the loss of the funds that were used for intervention. I suppose that it made it possible for the Conservative party to end its conference on a happy note. It made the Prime Minister participate in not only the longest ovation in political history, but the most expensive.

Although the inevitable was postponed for a week or so, the cycle of long-term collapse continued. Interest rates went up, and manufacturing industry was damaged again. That damage meant that the economy went into further decline. It meant an emphasis on, and acceleration and continuation of, the trends since 1979. It meant less investment than in 1979, less output than in 1979, and a further erosion of the manufacturing base on which our economy is so dependent. Inevitably, the result has been another bad balance of payments performance and another sterling crisis, and the whole damaging process is repeated again and again. The only question is how soon the cycle will once again come round.

In a moment or two the Chancellor will, as is his way, reject all the blame, deny every allegation and reject all criticism. However, he will do so with less than complete conviction, because if he really believed in his own innocence he would not spend so much time tampering with the evidence. I offer him the chance to make his defence more plausible than it has been during the last four years. I shall do so by asking him five specific questions about what he has produced, what the medium-term financial strategy, for which he is responsible, has produced and what the Government have produced since 1979.

My first question concerns unemployment. I shall make it as easy as I can for him to answer this question, knowing his pathetic reluctance to answer questions on unemployment. For a moment, I suppose wrongly and irrationally, I overlook the 18 statistical changes that have been introduced to reduce the total of the registered unemployed. I overlook the new tests and targets that have been introduced this week to squeeze unemployed men and women off the register. I overlook even the special schemes, measures and projects introduced for the same purpose—the artificial jobs which the Prime Minister condemned during the 1979 election campaign. Allowing for all the Government's statistical figures, for all the bullying to take men and women off the register and for the schemes which are not real jobs, will unemployment be down to 3 million at the next general election?

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge) rose—

Mr. Hattersley: I am sure the Chancellor will recall that the chairman of the Conservative party said—ironically, on BBC television—that if the Government were unable to bring unemployment down to 3 million by the next election they would not be worth re-electing. Will the Chancellor and his colleagues be worth re-electing on polling day? Even on the Chancellor's phoney figures, will the unemployment figure be 3 million by that date?

Secondly, the labour force has fallen by 1·2 million and 2 million full-time jobs have been lost. When will the number of jobs in the economy be back to its 1979 level? That has nothing to do with the demographic change to which the Prime Minister constantly refers, and nothing to do with the fact that, as the Prime Minister prays in aid, more women are entering the labour market.

Thirdly, when will real interest rates, now about 8 per cent., fall to their 1979 level? From experience, I know that the Chancellor usually claims that high real interest rates are the result of his success. His claim enables us to measure the recklessness with which he replies to such questions. He claims that high real interest rates are the product of low inflation.

If the right hon. Gentleman is going to make that claim today and say that the only reason why real interest rates in this country remain at about 8 per cent., I should like him to answer another question. When will real interest rates in Britain be as low as those in comparable countries where inflation is even lower than ours? I gave the Chancellor a list of the countries with better inflation records than our own, and in most cases their real interest rates are lower than ours. When will we aspire to, let alone achieve, the success of our OECD and EEC competitors in either of those regards?

Fourthly, may we hear more about the August balance of payments "freak"? I agree with the Chancellor that one record catastrophic month proves nothing. That catastrophic month was followed by a bad month. In themselves, two months of pretty grim figures may not prove anything. So, what will the Chancellor tell us about the year from August, the year from that freak figure to next August? Will it be in surplus, or in deficit?

Finally, what are the prospects for manufacturing industry? Since 1979, manufacturing output has fallen by 7·5 per cent., manufacturing investment has fallen by 17 per cent., and the manufacturing balance of trade has shifted from a £4 billion surplus to a £4 billion deficit. Under existing policies, will manufacturing output, investment and trade ever return to the 1979 position?

I have to confess that to a degree each of those questions is rhetorical. Anybody who has listened to the Chancellor in the House, or elsewhere, knows that the chances of his even essaying an honest answer are negligible. In the light of that, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question, in her absence, about what I hope will become her most notorious statement during the general election campaign of 1979.

On 19 April 1979, at an election rally in Birmingham, the Prime Minister promised to cut unemployment and described how that would be achieved. We are, she said, "going to do it by creating the conditions for real jobs, not artificial ones, so that once again the products stream from our factories and workshops whilst the customers of the world scramble over each other to buy them."

The right hon. Lady has done the exact opposite. Unemployment has risen by 2 million, the register has been reduced by artificial jobs and arbitrary disqualifications, factories and workshops have been starved of investment and have gone into liquidation in record numbers and the salesmen of the world fall over themselves to sell their goods in our markets.

It is a big claim, but even the Prime Minister has never made a more cynical promise, nor broken her word more consistently and cynically. I make it absolutely clear that my hon. Friends and I will vote tonight against the cynicism and deception that are an integral part of Tory economic policy, as well as against the Government's obvious failure.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"congratulates Her Majesty's Government on the success of its economic policies, which have brought inflation down to its lowest levels for two decades, combined with sustained economic growth, a million new jobs created since 1983, steadily rising living standards, and record levels of investment.'.

The last part of the speech of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was even more extraordinary than usual. He not only claimed that the result of the 1979 election was a foul, but seemed totally oblivious of the fact that the British people had an opportunity in 1983 to record their own verdict, not his verdict, on the Government's economic performance and returned us with an increased majority.

In my statement earlier this afternoon, I set out the prospects for the economy over the next year. It is above all a prospect of yet another year of the steady progress that we have seen over the past five years, with healthy economic growth, inflation at low levels, and 1 million new jobs created since 1983.

Mr. Hattersley: I spoke for 28 minutes and that was not half enough to get the truth out of the Chancellor. He has given us the figure of new jobs since 1983. Will he now give us the figure of job losses since the Government were elected?

Mr. Lawson: I shall make my speech in my own way. It really is no use refighting the 1983 election. The country gave its verdict on our performance between 1979 and 1983. That is over and done with. We are now talking about what has happened since we were re-elected in 1983 and since then there are very nearly 1 million more jobs. That is a fact.

That steady progress is something that we have come to take so much for granted on both sides of the House that it now seems almost routine. The only questions that we ask ourselves are whether growth will be, say, 2·5 per cent. or 3 per cent., or whether inflation will be, say, 3 per cent. or 4 per cent.

Yet, when one thinks about it, this is a pretty remarkable turnround. Not so long ago, we used to debate whether Britain could have sustained growth without a sharp and damaging increase in inflation. The 364 economists were not the only people who said that it was completely impossible. Well, we have put an end to that argument and it is one debate that has been decisively won. It has been won by the Government sticking to their guns. But if ever there was a year in which that has been tested, this is it. The dominant event has clearly been the collapse of the oil price—halving from almost $30 a barrel at the time of last year's autumn statement to around $14 a barrel today.

There were those who would have said, a year ago, that this halving of the oil price would wreak enormous damage to the British economy, and many did so. That is another argument which has been decisively won. Earlier this year, there were some who gambled that pressure on sterling, combined with the loss of our oil revenues, would cause us to abandon the free market policies which have made our North sea oil industry the success it has been. The Opposition, as short sighted as ever — the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) will well remember this—urged us to do so. Yet is there anyone now, at home or abroad, who doubts our resolve to keep the North sea free? I very much doubt it.

What has happened to the United Kingdom economy in a year when we have lost more than half of our oil revenues and half of the value of our oil exports? As I explained earlier this afternoon, public borrowing remains on track, despite the fact that oil revenues this year are set to be no less than £6½ billion lower than last year. Despite that, the PSBR is on track. To have weathered a revenue loss of this magnitude is a remarkable achievement. The reason we have been able to weather it, and the impact of the oil price fall generally, is the underlying strength and resilience of the British economy as a whole, coupled with the prudence of the Government's financial policy.

Domestic demand has been growing steadily, and the forecast for this year as a whole is a rise of 3½ per cent. over last year, with consumer spending particularly strong. Some of the commentators and some Labour Members have woken up to that a bit belatedly and with something of a start.

When I said in May that we were seeing a pause in economic activity but that I expected it to be short, the conventional wisdom, and certainly the view on the Labour Benches, was that the pause was not a pause but a halt, that the economy was underperforming and in danger of grinding to a stop. That was what was said as recently as May this year. Now that the extra spending power to which I pointed then is feeding through into demand, in much the way that I expected, the conventional wisdom on the Labour Benches has changed tack. Suddenly I am told that the economy is overheating—

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): Sucking in imports.

Mr. Lawson: —with a consumer boom destined to do nothing but, in the startlingly original words of the hon. Gentleman suck in imports.

As usual the Opposition do not know which horse to back. One moment they tell us that the economy is flat on its back, and the next moment they say that we are engineering an irresponsible pre-election boom. Indeed, the hon. Member for Thurrock has written to me suggesting that I am engineering what she called a "post-election boom"—that is precisely what she wrote. They clearly do not know whether they are coming or going.

I can, of course, fully understand why they are so worried about the next election, whenever that may be. But the plain fact is that demand at home is growing very much as I expected at the time of the Budget, and as I reiterated in May. Indeed, its growth has been remarkably steady.

What has fallen short, it is true, has been this year's growth in exports, largely because of the worldwide slow-down in trade earlier this year, and the cut-back in spending by OPEC and other primary producers. But that has only reduced our overall growth rate this year from about the 3 per cent. that I forecast in the Budget to the 2½ per cent. that I now expect. Looking ahead to next year, there is every reason to expect demand at home to go on rising steadily while our export performance picks up again. The outlook for exports is very encouraging.

Mr. Hattersley: The Chancellor makes a typical point about the fall-off in our exports and world trends. Why have we lost a disproportionate share compared with similar countries?

Mr. Lawson: The right hon. Gentleman is, as usual, completely wrong. He is so concerned about manufacturing. The only accurate figures that we have are for manufacturing trade. Manufacturing exports' share of world trade has been steady; if anything, it is rising slightly. It has certainly been steady for the past five years, whereas under the previous Labour Government it was steadily falling, year in, year out. There has been a remarkable change in trade.

As I was saying, the outlook for exports is encouraging. The recent CBI quarterly survey shows that companies themselves are a good deal more optimistic about export prospects than they were earlier in the year. Non-oil exports have resumed a vigorous growth and stand at an all-time high. The right hon. Gentleman once again made much of the difficulties of the manufacturing sector, but just as the fall in exports had a particularly marked impact on manufacturing companies, so the pick-up will be of particular benefit to manufacturers.

The signs are encouraging. In the third quarter of 1986, exports of manufactures were some 3 per cent. higher in real terms than in the first half of the year. World trade in manufactured goods is likely to grow more rapidly in 1987, and I am confident that British exporters will seize the opportunities open to them. Over the past five years, British manufacturing exports have succeeded in maintaining their share of world markets — a success unprecedented in recent history, and in sharp contrast to the marked fall under the previous Government.

Mr. Hattersley rose—

Mr. Lawson: I shall give way in a moment.

The competitive position of the non-oil economy has been improved by the necessary adjustment of the exchange rate to the oil price collapse. A continuous fall in the exchange rate would simply mean ever higher inflation, and that is something no one wants, and to which this Government are resolutely opposed.

The plain fact is that the pound is now highly competitive.

Mr. Hattersley: The right hon. Gentleman made a number of claims about world trade and our share of it. Will he give the honest accurate figures now, will he ask the Chief Secretary to give them, or shall I give them instead?

Mr. Lawson: The figures for our volume share of world trade are contained in the printed version of the autumn statement and they will show precisely what I said a few moments ago.

I said in my statement earlier today that in the short term the current account of the balance of payments, to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded, is expected to go into a deficit of some £1½ billion next year — after, incidentally, a cumulative surplus of £21 billion over the past six years, compared with a cumulative deficit of about £5 billion under the previous Labour Government.

But we have now had a major improvement in cost competitiveness. As the full benefits feed through, the current account deficit should steadily diminish. Overall, non-oil exports are forecast to rise next year by 5½ per cent., continuing the present strong upward trend. The London Business School is forecasting an even stronger recovery in exports, particularly in manufacturing. This more than offsets some slowdown in consumer spending, while investment continues to rise broadly in line with the economy as a whole.

Looking at the overall position, the prospect for next year is for faster growth that is balanced in two senses: first, between domestic demand and exports; and, secondly, between investment and consumer spending. I have to say that the latter achievement was conspicuously lacking in the upswing that took place under the previous Government. Between 1975 and 1979 under Labour — [Interruption.] — I know that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook does not like listening to this, but he will have to. Between 1975 and 1979, under Labour, consumer expenditure grew twice as fast as investment, whereas over the period since 1981 — which is a much longer upswing, incidentally, and one which is still continuing — investment has gone up by an average of over 4 per cent. a year and consumer spending by less than 3 per cent.

Of course there remains deep concern on both sides of the House about the continuing high level of unemployment. The number of jobs has substantially increased — by 1 million since 1983, more than in the rest of the European Community put together. Total employment has now risen for 13 successive quarters — the longest period of uninterupted growth in employment for almost 30 years. Opposition Members ought to welcome that if they have any concern at all for the unemployed, which they have not. They seek to exploit the unemployed for their own party political purposes. They simply do not care.—[Interruption.]

Here, too, there are signs that the outlook is more promising. Last month's figures show unemployment at the same level as six months previously, and the highest number of registered job vacancies for seven years. But the key to continuing and accelerating the growth in the number of jobs is a more efficient and competitive economy. Next year's faster growth means that the outlook for jobs should be more promising, provided always that pay settlements are at a level that can be afforded.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook spent a long time talking about the decline of the manufacturing sector. The picture, inevitably, is not nearly as uniform as he implied: in certain industries, mostly the metal-using industries, output certainly is still below the pre-recession peak. But in others, such as chemicals, food, and electrical engineering, it is well above the levels of 1979.

I do not, of course, dispute that manufacturing output altogether has fallen slightly under this Government, just as it did when Labour was in office. Indeed, given the forecast of 4 per cent. growth in manufacturing output for next year, the overall fall under this Government will be, if anything, less than under Labour. But there is this critical difference: manufacturing productivity has grown almost three times as fast since 1979 as it did under Labour. Partly as a result, manufacturing profitability is at its highest level since 1973.

Nor, of course, is it right to overlook the non-manufacturing side of the economy — which, after all, accounts for some three quarters of total national output. In looking at the overall picture, it is interesting to compare the six years from 1973 to 1979, dominated by the Labour Government, with the period since, when we have been in office. Overall output growth has been similar, though slightly higher since 1979, up by an average of 1½ per cent. a year compared with 1¼ per cent. a year under Labour. But what is significant is that most of the growth under Labour was simply attributable to North sea oil. Excluding oil, output went up by an average of only ½ per cent. a year between 1973 and 1979 compared with 1¾ per cent. a year since.

Mr. Hattersley rose——

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): Why use the 1973 figure?

Mr. Lawson: That was the last year before the Labour Government took office. That was the base. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook asked me about the comparison between inflation in this country and inflation in the Community as a whole. During the entire period of the Labour Government, inflation in Britain averaged 4½ per cent. more than inflation in the Community as a whole. Throughout the time that we have been in office, inflation has averaged the same as in the Community as a whole and, indeed, is now below it. Not only has our absolute performance on inflation improved but so has our relative performance.

Mr. Hattersley: I am fascinated once more by the right hon. Gentleman's technique. Having chided me for constantly choosing periods going back beyond 1983, why has he suddenly started to make statistical comparisons with periods going back to 1979 and 1974? Is he not doing what he always does — just choosing whatever arbitrary period produces a bogus figure?

Mr. Lawson: That year is the obvious base. As the Labour Government came into office in March 1974, they inherited the 1973 position. The right hon. Gentleman also suggested that we had now abandoned both fiscal and monetary policies. I explained to the House earlier today that fiscal policy remains firmly on track in spite of the £6½ billion fall in oil revenues compared with last year. We have achieved a continuing reduction in public expenditure as a percentage of GDP, whether or not the proceeds of privatisation are included, and at the same time made prudent increases in spending in certain priority areas.

As for monetary policy, I never really expected the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook to understand the complexity of operating it, a skill which would anyway be quite pointless for him to try to acquire since, fortunately for the nation, he will never be required to discharge that responsibility.

There is absolutely no change in this Government's view that the key to controlling inflation is monetary policy, and the key instrument of monetary policy is short-term interest rates. That policy is delivering the goods.

I accept the fact to which the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook referred, that interest rates here are higher than in other major industrial countries. There are a number of reasons for that, including the high level of pay settlements, and the premium needed to cover the market's fear of a Labour Government—however unlikely that may be. But, as I explained in my Mansion house speech, my objective has to be to keep short-term interest rates, on average, at whatever level is necessary to achieve the overriding aim of securing monetary conditions that bear down on inflation.

The trouble with the Opposition parties is that they cannot make up their mind whether they are coming or going. They want to argue both that monetary policy is too loose and that interest rates are too high. They say openly that they would borrow a great deal more and then they say that they would get their interest rates down. They do not know whether they are coming or going or which way to turn.

Opposition Members are always keen to demonstrate their compassion for the needy in society but the rampant inflation that their policies created——

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South) rose——

Mr. Lawson: I am afraid that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook has taken up the time for interventions.

Opposition Members are always keen to demonstrate their compassion for the needy in society, but the rampant inflation which their policies created left millions of people watching helplessly as the value of a lifetime's savings was eroded. Inflation does not create jobs; it destroys them.

Dr. Bray rose——

Mr. Lawson: We have brought inflation down to the lowest levels seen for a generation. We have brought public borrowing under control and are gradually reducing the ratio of public spending to national output, even without taking acccount of privatisation proceeds. But within this overall constraint, and thanks in part to the attention——

Dr. Bray rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) must have seen that the Chancellor clearly does not intend to give way to him.

Mr. Lawson: But even within that overall constraint, and thanks in part to the attention we have paid to improving efficiency and value for money, we have been able to improve public services in priority areas such as education, health, law and order, and housing. The plans that I announced today will bring a further reduction in the ratio of public spending to gross domestic product, and further improvements in priority areas. In a moment I will compare that to the performance of the last Labour Government.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): What the right hon. Gentleman has just said is very important. Right from the beginning of monetary policy it was the monetary aggregates that were the key to the reduction of inflation. Today, he has announced that the prime instruments that he will make use of in reducing inflation are interest rates. Therefore, there has been a switch from monetarism to the old standby of reducing activity and so reducing inflation by the use of high interest rates. It is the old, old story. The right hon. Gentleman has changed completely.

Mr. Lawson: I recommend that the right hon. Gentleman should read my speech to the Lombard Association in April, when I set this out at great length. Given that he was once a Treasury Minister, I am astonished that he makes no connection between the demand for money and the level of interest rates. One relates to price, and the other to supply and demand.

Dr. Bray rose——

Mr. Lawson: I have just given way.

Let us contrast the record of this Government with that of the last Labour Government. They spent money all right—13 per cent. more on public expenditure in real terms in 1974-75 than in 1973-74—and they increased public borrowing eventually to more than 9 per cent. of GDP. But far from leading to the Socialist nirvana that they were expecting, it led them simply to the international equivalent of the bankruptcy court and a lesson in O-level economics from the IMF. Spending then had to be cut, and they cut it in very damaging ways that we have had to make good.

The Opposition's motion accuses us of cuts in public sector capital spending. That is rich. We have kept capital spending roughly the same in real terms. It was Labour who cut it—by 20 per cent. in real terms. And look at Labour's priorities. During their whole time in office, capital spending on the Health Service fell by 30 per cent. in real terms, and with the plans that I have announced today we will have increased it by 30 per cent. in real terms.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Lawson: No, I shall not give way.

Spending on motorways and trunk roads — [Interruption.] Opposition Members do not like to listen to this, but they will have to. Spending on motorways and trunk roads also fell by 30 per cent. in real terms under Labour. Today's announcement means that it will be nearly 30 per cent. higher in real terms in 1987-88 than in 1978-79.

I will admit to cutting the cost of building roads. In real terms the public now gets six miles of roads for the price of five compared with the time that we took office. Given the differences between our record and that of Labour, it is nothing short of an impertinence for the Opposition motion to accuse us of cuts and for the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook to say, as he did in a recent speech, that a Labour investment programme would ensure that "essential and long neglected services — roads, houses, hospitals, schools—are at last funded."

Labour cut those services by 30 per cent. in real terms and by 20 per cent. overall.

Therefore, I am more than happy to compare and contrast our record in office with that of the Labour Government. However, unlike the right hon. Member for

[Mr. Lawson]

Sparkbrook, it is not my habit to dwell on the past for too long. He has given us a few glimpses of how he would manage the economy if ever he were to be given the chance. From his recent pronouncements, some people might think that he was a reformed character. According to one of his recent statements,

"We were, and we remain, determined to promise no more than the nation can afford . . . Of course, the easiest way to reduce the ratio of debt to GDP is to allow inflation to rise".

That is what he said, and he should know, because that is what Labour did when in office, and that is what it would do if it were to get into office again. The right hon. Gentleman also said:

"Working within that firm financial framework, the next Labour Government will have to operate a system of strict policy priorities".

Where have I heard the words "firm financial framework" before? In part these plagiarised sentiments are aimed at the voters because the right hon. Gentleman knows that they rejected Labour's profligate approach in 1979 and 1983.

In part they are no doubt aimed at the financial markets. But most of all they are aimed at the right hon. Gentleman's own colleagues, sitting with him on the Opposition Front Bench — not today, because they cannot wait to get away — who have been so ready to promise the earth and think about how to pay for it later. For example, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) is on record as saying:

"I am sure that it's not important to cost everything in detail."

That is the sort of remark that we normally associate with his hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher).

We have some sympathy with the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, given his difficulties with his colleagues, but the trouble is that he is far too late because the country and the financial markets have already heard enough to understand what another Labour Government would be like. The answer is that they would be exactly like the Government we had before—back to the disaster of the 1970s, with massive Government spending increases.

To try to get some rigour into the debate—which I thought the right hon. Gentleman would welcome—my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary had a costing done of the Opposition's pledges, and they amounted to a total of £28 billion. For months and months the right hon. Gentleman has had no answer to that. The Opposition have a non-answer, and try to pray in aid the Institute for Fiscal Studies, but the right hon. Gentleman's "only" model of reassurance is that the first year cost would be only £10 billion—as if that were not more than enough. At least he admits to that, even though on his own dubious arithmetic it would be another £4 billion or so on taxes and roughly twice as much borrowing as we have now.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): And unemployment down.

Mr. Lawson: How ignorant can one get to imagine that that would lead to a reduction in unemployment. When Labour went on its spending spree, unemployment doubled.

But only the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook could believe that the first year is all that matters. We elect Governments for a whole Parliament, and what happens during the whole of that Parliament is what matters. If Labour were ever to be elected, which pledges would it fulfil? If some are to be deferred, what would they be? The House and the country have a right to know.

I have today published this Government's expenditure plans for the next three years, and the House knows, that they are backed by detailed costings, properly worked out. We have a right to ask the Opposition what alternatives they are putting forward. Which pledges would be met and which would not? I shall gladly give way now for an answer.

Mr. Prescott: We shall certainly answer the right hon. Gentleman's challenge about the use of public expenditure. We can get people back to work, and one example that we shall carry out is the commitment to return to Labour's previous housing programme when 2,000 houses a week more were built than during the period of this Government.

Mr. Lawson: Clearly I should not have given way, because that is no answer to my question. I therefore ask it again, so that there will be time to answer it in the reply. In his letter, the Chief Secretary listed a number of specific Labour pledges. I ask a simple question: which of those pledges will be deferred and which will not?

Mr. Prescott rose——

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman is too late.

It is idle to pretend that Labour's pledges could be funded simply by increasing taxes on the better off. Even the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook has come to realise that, because after vainly trying to maintain that taxes would go up only for the top 5 per cent. of the population, he admitted defeat and said that the point above which people would have to pay more would be "a jagged, or broken, line".

The right hon. Gentleman has a jagged and broken policy, and the overwhelming majority of the population would have to pay more taxes if he were ever to come into office.

In any case, the right hon. Gentleman's attempt to raise taxes for the top 5 per cent. would be most unlikely to raise anything like the £3½ billion which he claims it would. All the evidence suggests that extremely high tax rates reduce rather than increase the amount of revenue raised, and that lower top tax rates bring in more, not less, revenue. That is precisely what has happened. The top 5 per cent. of taxpayers now pay 27 per cent. of total income tax revenue, which is a higher proportion than they ever paid under the Labour Government.

Throughout the world, countries such as India, Australia and New Zealand as well as France, Germany and the United States are realising that and are reducing their rates of tax. It is only the Opposition in this House who are out of step. It is clear that either some of Labour's pledges would have to be deferred, in which case we had better hear which ones, or that the tax burden would have to go up for everybody, or, more probably, both.

Perhaps that is why the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition stepped in last week with his own new suggestion for raising money. He has pledged Labour to what he euphemistically refers to as a "revision" of mortgage interest tax relief. No doubt the 8 million people who currently benefit from it will draw their own conclusions.

Our economic policy has delivered low inflation, sustained growth, and a million new jobs since 1983. That is the way forward. The Opposition offer polices which the electorate rejected decisively in 1979 and decisively again in 1983, and which the people of this country will reject again when, in the fullness of time, they are given the opportunity to do so.

6.1 pm

Mr. Roy Jenkins (Glasgow, Hillhead): Although the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech included some enjoyable debating points against the Opposition, it must have a high claim to qualify as one of the most complacent that I have ever heard from him or from anybody else in the House.

The right hon. Gentleman can at least be regarded as relatively lucky in the sense that this debate takes place today, not a few weeks ago when he was more manifestly up against the ropes. Indeed, I suspect that he will be so again in only a few weeks' time. It is perhaps not a great tribute to the Opposition's sense of timing that they fixed this debate today. Of much more significance is the fact that his respite is short-term, whereas the faults of the Government's management are deep-seated and long-term.

I deliberately used the word "management" rather than "policy" because it is now almost impossible to tell what the Government's economic policy is. Insofar as it exists, it is in a state of complete confusion. In the early days of the Government, the policy used to be clear, perhaps too clear. It was also wrong. It was obsessively monetarist—there is certainly room for monetary policy in the management of the economy—and it sought to keep sterling M3 within a steadily declining range.

Sterling M3 is now growing at about 18 per cent., so the Governor of the Bank of England was encouraged recently to say that it was an unreliable indicator which should be and probably would be abandoned. There goes the old centrepiece of the Government's policy. There is a new form of Luddism—if one does not like the reading on an instrument, one destroys it and picks up another instrument in its place.

Mr. Lawson: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jenkins: I have hardly started, but yes.

Mr. Lawson: I set out at considerable length and clearly the Government's monetary and fiscal policy in a speech which I gave to the Lombard Association in April this year. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will read it before he says that there is nothing clear about the Government's policy. Meanwhile, perhaps he would care to tell the House what his policy is.

Mr. Jenkins: Yes, I have read the right hon. Gentleman's speech to the Lombard Association. In the immortal words Ernest Bevin used when he was asked by Molotov through an interpreter whether he had studied Marx in the commentary of Hilferding,

"You can tell Mr. Molotov that I 'ave read 'Ilferding and I found him tedious."

That is the position.

Whatever else the right hon. Gentleman did in his Lombard Association speech, he certainly did not clarify the Government's monetary policy. Nearly every independent commentator in this country and elsewhere has been even more muddled about the Government's policy since then than they were previously. The idea that he made everything clear then is absolute nonsense. I shall tell him some of the policies that I would pursue, but I shall tell him, as he would do, in my own order, not his.

What other instrument will be put in place instead of this rejected sterling M3 which was such a centrepiece of Government policy? Will it be ML, or MO as it is sometimes called? That seems to be somewhat in favour again—although the Chancellor was not keen on it in his Budget speech—because at present it is giving the right result. Certainly the Bank of England, as is well known, thinks that it is virtually useless as an indicator. It is mostly notes and coins and says practically nothing about the future. It merely gives some indication of some aspects of the present. But as inflation picks up, as it certainly will somewhat, the indicator will also probably start misbehaving in its turn. What will the Government do then? Will they have another Luddite bash at MO and turn to something else? In that way, ML or MO will join sterling M3 in the category of not being "one of us"—not being reliable in its performance.

I hope that the Chancellor, whose manners are absolutely extraordinary and who could not come to listen to the beginning of the speech of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), will at least have the courtesy to listen to some of the speech of an ex-Chancellor. I have a good deal to say before I sit down and it would help him to listen to it.

If sooner or later all the monetary aggregates prove to be unreliable, there will be no alternative to an exchange rate target as a sheet anchor. That is a perfectly good alternative. We cannot have interest rates just stated like that. What is the Government's target? What are we working on? They say that we are working on interest rates. Interest rates can be a mechanism, but they do not tell one how to use the mechanism. If one abandons monetary aggregates because they do not work or work unreliably, one must have something to put in their place and an exchange rate target is the only effective alternative.

First, the Chancellor has declined to define an exchange rate target and, secondly, it cannot be said that his recent interest rate decisions have been coherently aimed at an exchange rate target. If they have been aimed at anything, as opposed to being merely a reluctant, inevitable reaction to circumstances, they have been aimed at political targets, especially the Conservative party conference.

Thirdly, to try to base a policy on a secret exchange rate target—it has never been published—which is incompetently aimed at, while rejecting the support of the European monetary system direction finder, is perversity beyond the bounds of acceptable eccentricity.

We know or think we know that the Chancellor, together with the Bank of England and the Foreign Office, would prefer to be fully in the EMS, but they have all been overruled by the Prime Minister. That says a good deal about the Chancellor's lack of authority within the Government, to which I shall return later.

First, I shall deal with the substance of what is, after all, Government policy, even if the Chancellor does not agree with it. Several years ago, looking at the wreckage caused by largely irrational currency fluctuations, I formed and advocated the view that the way to get some necessary stability back was to construct a tripod of the dollar, the yen and the ecu, with sterling coming fully into the European monetary system mechanism, and with the authorities of those currencies or groupings accepting responsibility for keeping them in a reasonable relationship with each other. A full return to Bretton Woods would be a bridge too far in present circumstances. That tripod seems to be both practical and desirable.

Without fanfares — they do not matter — to a substantial extent that has now occurred. The authorities of the three major currencies are accepting that responsibility and are keeping the three in a reasonable relationship with each other. However, there is one important exception. Sterling has not adhered and is outside the triangle. It is the only even medium-sized currency to be on its own.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): The right hon. Gentleman has enormous experience and was one of the founding fathers of the EMS. He talks about the yen, the dollar and the ecu. Surely he means the yen, the dollar and the deutschmark. The ecu is not a currency but an expression of an indexed unit, the use of which arises only because the European currencies are so volatile that it pays some countries to use ecus. Surely he means the deutschmark.

Mr. Jenkins: I mean the ecu. The right hon. Gentleman has also studied these matters carefully and constructively so he must know that the ecu is increasingly used in private transactions throughout the world. He should not, therefore, dismiss it as a figment. It is extensively used in private and bank transactions.

Let us not worry too much about the nomenclature, but let us consider the tripod with three legs. One of those legs must be a European leg and so long as sterling is outside that leg is hobbled. That is a disadvantage to us and the other countries, not so much because of the importance of sterling, but because of the importance of London as a financial centre.

Beyond that, and looking at the matter from British self-interest, the wider interest is of considerable importance. If I were to choose one significant currency in the world which was least suited to steam off on its own across a tumultous ocean, rejecting the company of any convoy, it would be sterling. That is the perversity of the Prime Minister's choice. It is not only a hazardous choice but it is a ludicrous choice. It would be splendid only if we genuinely rejected all support from others. But do we?

Three weeks ago we were cap in hand to the Bundesbank. The future of the pound now depends very much upon OPEC and its decisions. Only the sheikhs may cut production and send oil up to $18 or $20 per barrel and only they stand between the Government and the total collapse of their policies.

The Prime Minister's attitude to the EMS is, in a financial context, a repeat of the old song that Britain is not as other countries are and that Britain must always remain somewhat outside. In a political context that has been the constant accompaniment to our national decline over the past 35 years.

I come back to the Chancellor. Why is his reputation so low this autumn? The Government, I regret to say, are not doing badly with public opinion according to the indications. But not the Chancellor. He made a technically good speech at the Conservative party conference. That speech contained part of the clue. It was not a Chancellor's speech. It was a success because it told the audience exactly what it wanted to hear, with not a single uncomfortable message.

By the time of the Mansion house speech, the Chancellor seemed to have lost both his new speech writer and anything to say. Perhaps that was because his exchange rate policy had been vetoed by the Prime Minister. As one commentator put it, he stood up and said, "I haven't got a monetary policy, but trust the Chancellor." But the people do not trust the Chancellor. The City does not trust the Chancellor. For the Chancellor to try to found a policy on trust is like the Prime Minister trying to found a policy on humility.

A Chancellor who is so easily vetoed by the Prime Minister on his direct responsibility—the exchange rate policy — is not up to his job. Under the manifold pressure of modern government, the Chancellor is effective only if he is almost as necessary to the Prime Minister as he or she is to him. By contrast, the present Chancellor could be bundled into a political dustbin without a squeak of protest from the voters, the City or even the Conservative party. The right hon. Gentleman is not a Chancellor. He is a mannikin with a thick coating of bombast.

The Chancellor's weakness, the monetary muddle, the exchange rate confusion, would not matter greatly if underlying factors—the real economy—were sound. But are they? Let us start with the Government's strong point —the jewel in the crown, if there is one—inflation. It is down, but it is the highest, somewhat, of any country supporting a major currency. We are one of the five which support major currencies. Whatever else that suggests, it hardly suggests a unique achievement. It is likely to return to an upward trend.

The combined efforts of Government policy since 1979 have been not to improve but substantially to worsen our competitive position. We have gone from a huge manufacturing surplus of £5·5 billion in 1980 to a 1986 third quarter deficit of £8 billion a year. I do not think that that will be repeated in forthcoming quarters. I certainly hope that it will not. It is the road to disaster.

Even with oil production continuing for some time, the current account has gone from a £3 billion surplus to a deficit predicted by the Chancellor of £1·5 billion. The deficit might be even worse. That is not surprising, as the stock of capital equipment in manufacturing industry is lower than it was seven years ago. In addition, we have the Chancellor's complacency and the stark words of the Government's submission to the European regional development fund which states:

"In the present difficult economic climate, investment in directly productive industry is at a low level."

I take it that in an official document the Government were telling the truth and not deceiving the ERDF to get more money.

Sadly, the Government's great contribution, having refused to stimulate the economy by more respectable means, is a roaring consumer boom, which there is not the slightest chance of their moderating before an election. A roaring consumer boom does not, to any significant extent, mean more employment. In our competitive position, worsening under the Government, it means overwhelmingly higher imports, a still worse balance of payments position and a classic path to perdition.

To have produced, after seven and a half years, the combination of total monetary muddle, a worsened competitive position, a widespread doubt in other countries as to how we are to pay our way in the future, a desperately vulnerable currency and the prospect of an unending plateau of the highest unemployment in a major country in the industrialised world is a unique achievement over which the Chancellor is an appropriate deputy acting presiding officer.

Sir Edward du Cann (Taunton): I agree with what the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) said at the beginning of his speech. However much good news there may be, this is no moment for complacency. However much good news there is, there is one piece of consistently bad economic news, and that is the present, high and tragic rate of unemployment. It is excellent that the United Kingdom's employment rate is the highest of the major European Community countries. It is excellent, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer pointed out, that new jobs are up by 1 million since 1983. Incidentally, how good it was to hear him speaking with such confidence and style. Even so, the highest priority of any Government should and must be stabilisation of the unemployment rate and its reduction.

The international context is hardly encouraging. As the most recent Bank of England paper says, "The world economy pauses". The immediate reality is that the United Kingdom is experiencing a disappointing year to date economically. Exports have stopped growing, fixed investment shows little growth, industrial production is hardly buoyant and a rise in consumption, as the right hon. Member for Hillhead said, owes too much to heavy consumer borrowing and increases in incomes for comfort, although, broadly speaking, we are a low-wage economy.

The question is: what is to be done? I make no secret of my views. I wish to see our country pursue an expansionist cause and mount a more convincing and imaginative attack on both unemployment and low wages. Any such advocate is usually told that that is a policy that would put the fight against inflation at risk. I would answer, "Poppycock." In the first place, I am and I always have been a supporter of the Government's medium-term financial strategy — that is sound money. The Government have never been fully committed to monetarism, as the Select Committee on the Treasury stated in its third report, published in February 1981. The Government have never had the courage of what their enemies call their conviction. If there is an author of monetarist policies in the United Kingdom, it is the right hon. Member for Hillhead.

There is no conflict there, and in any case, I care more about people than for any economic theory, for experience disproves them all, in greater or lesser degree, sooner or later.

I have two recommendations for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, both of which are in tune with what I understand Government policy to be. I introduce them by putting a question. Why are the Government so half-hearted about so much that they do? For instance, why are they so unsuccessful in the control of state expenditure? Every year, the all-party Select Committee on Public Accounts, whose distinguished Chairman is here now, reports numerous examples of failure adequately to control expenditure. It is obvious that by comparison with private industry, financial controls in Government are wholly inadequate.

For example, the Rayner exercise rose like a rocket when it first started. Like a rocket, it excited a moment or two's attention, but it and its lessons are now locked away in an anonymous bottom drawer. The reality is that the scope for huge savings in domestic public expenditure in the budget total is largely unexploited. In my view, for what it is worth, it runs into billions of pounds.

As to overseas expenditure, the European Community sucks up cash like a sponge. Our net contribution since 1973 is no less than £7·5 billion. The lack of will on the part of member Governments to exercise a proper discipline over community expenditure is nothing short of pathetic.

The determination to effect a proper economy in the expenditure of taxpayers' money should be a success story for the Government, for everyone is a taxpayer and therefore everyone must be in favour of careful spending. However — here is the paradox that one saw when the Chancellor was making his autumn statement — my colleagues are defensive about their policies in the face of the crescendo of whining complaint about economies that is our daily experience.

It is high time that we changed gear. As the Institute of Directors pointed out in a recent admirable paper, research by the World Bank shows a clear connection between low public spending, low taxes and high growth, including employment growth. However, in the United Kingdom, the total tax burden is higher than it was in 1979, when the Government took office, and that is a shameful fact. We have a succession of public and semi-public arguments and agonisings of one sort or another, year after year, over the Government's public expenditure plans. Always, the end result is the same — total expenditure exceeds expectations, but the public has an unshakeable belief that every part of expenditure has suffered substantial, some would say uncaring, cuts. That is political brilliance — getting the worst of every possible world.

It need not be so. I recommend two priorities to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, which would change the situation dramatically and for the better. On the first, I agree totally with the right hon. Members for Hillhead and for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). It is essential that we give top priority to helping manufacturing industry. The Government set the climate in which industry works and in some respects, they have done extraordinarily well. For instance, a few years ago we were, as the House knows, a strike-prone society. Happily we are now largely a strike-free society, and that is something for which we can be deeply thankful. In other respects, the Government are doing carelessly badly.

Mr. Prescott: In the interests of truth, are not the facts that in the period of this Government, we have lost more working days in disputes than we did in a similar period of Labour office?

Sir Edward du Cann: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, the events of the winter of discontent, for example, are freshly in the memories of us all to give the contradiction to what he is now claiming. The Government create the climate, and in the field of industrial relations, the legislation introduced over the past half dozen years has been a positive force for good. In other respects we have acted carelessly and, I think, badly. I shall give two examples of what must be done. First, we in government could do a great deal to reduce costs for industry. We allow too many costs to be continuously too high. For instance, electricity costs in the United Kingdom are higher than those in most competitor countries. That cannot be right. Interest rates are an enormous burden, especially on smaller businesses.

Apart from costs — no doubt other right hon. and hon. Members can give their own examples — there is the subject of training. Whenever I visit schools or universities, I remain immensely depressed at the unworldliness of academics' approach to life as it really is. There is too much theory and far too little practical interest is taken in subjects, such as mathematics, science, and so on. Manufacturing still represents over 50 per cent. of our exports. Remarkable though the development of small firms has been, they depend on the bigger firms and their prosperity. They are all interdependent.

What I am trying to say to the Government is this: the figures cited by the hon. Member for Hillhead about the decline of manufacturing industry were correct. We should all be deeply worried at present trends. The best thing that we can do is find a multitude of practical ways of ensuring that the burdens on industry are reduced so that it can compete more effectively in world markets.

Second, we must achieve massive tax cuts if we are to have a new prosperity. We need a strategy and we need targets to which we are determined to adhere. We must reject the direction in which, it seems to me, the European Community is moving. It seems to be careless about tax matters, and often it seems ready to consume money in unlimited quantities. By way of contrast, tax reduction and tax reform in the United States have created 9 million new jobs since 1981. Henceforward, the top brackets will be as low as 18 and 28 per cent. The highest rate is lower than the United Kingdom's standard rate.

The United Kingdom's tax and benefits system is quite chaotic. The biggest business in our economy is the transfer industry — Government taking money out of one private pocket and putting it into another. After all that activity, over half the population is in the same position, broadly speaking, after paying taxes and receiving benefits, as it was before. So the transfer industry is the most inefficient business in the country, if not in the world. It is certainly the most expensive.

National Health Service costs are approaching the huge sum of £20 billion a year. Yet, as we all know and complain, quite rightly, the percentage of the gross national product spent in the United Kingdom on health care is lower than that spent in the United States, Sweden, Germany, the Netherlands, France, Denmark and Norway. The transfer industry is the area to attack, and hard.

I have argued many times in this Chamber for a massive increase in capital expenditure to provide new schools, hospitals, prisons, and so on. A boost for the construction industry would be a terrific boost for employment. It could be achieved almost overnight if as many of those desirable projects as possible were turned over to the private sector.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Although it is right to call for increases in capital expenditure, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the building supply industry has reduced its capacity as a consequence of the Government's policy? So even the best intentions will be delayed before they can be implemented.

Sir Edward du Cann: The hon. Gentleman is right. There is always a time lag. That is all the more reason for starting immediately. Many of those desirable projects to build new schools and hospitals should be turned over wholly to the private sector. If that were done, Government expenditure would reduce and, therefore, the Budget total would reduce. The state would acquire a massive accretion of capital assets financed through rental payments after only a few years. There would be as much, if not more, scope for tax reductions as ever have been derived from asset sales.

I argue for setting free the builders, the hospital administrators, the local education authorities and the Home Office — free from the constraints of financial limits, free from capital allocations, and so on, and free from the whole administrative infrastructure that goes with them. Let us say yes to new projects on a massive scale. Following that, the scope for tax reduction is assured.

I believe that my right hon. Friend has a brilliant opportunity in his next Budget. I pray that he takes it with courage and imagination. It was disappointing to hear nothing in today's statement about either the control of Government expenditure or potential tax reductions. We have heard great boasts outside this Chamber about privatisation. A further dose of privatisation in the way I suggest would undoubtedly enable him to both reduce Government expenditure and substantially reduce taxation. I am impatient to see him do so. I think that the mood of the country is sympathetic to the idea generally. The foundation is laid. In my view, we should literally build on it.

6.35 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) was quite right to draw attention to the problems of manufacturing industry under the Government when many of our exports depend on manufacturing industry. It may well be that the Government, who have not paid much attention to manufacturing industry and are faced with a balance of payments deficit for the first time — that is a notable change in the past seven years — will begin to accord to manufacturing industry some of the assistance that was given to it in the past.

I echo the comments made by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) and express my regret at the early departure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The motion before us condemns his actions. We should express our dissatisfaction at the fact that he left the Chamber when the right hon. Member for Hillhead had hardly begun his speech. I hope that that message will be passed on to him. In his Budget statement this year, when dealing with oil and oil revenues, the Chancellor said:

> "Inevitably, we suffer a decline, too, in the value of our net oil exports. But the oil price fall will be beneficial for the industrialised world as a whole. Even for the United Kingdom, what we gain on the swings should, over time, more than offset what we lose on the roundabouts." — [Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c.168.]

I find that statement impossible to understand. It seems to me as egregious nonsense as one can utter on such an important matter. What the Chancellor could have done with oil revenues was to add them to the national income and export benefits that we get, so that we would end up with a higher gross national product. That would have been of advantage to us if it had been used properly.

I call in aid the Morgan Grenfell economic review, which, happily, I found on my desk this morning. It was a useful review, pointing out the advantages that we have had from oil exports and showing the effect of the decline in the price of oil on certain other countries — from Japan, Italy and Germany, which have benefited enormously from the drop in the price of oil, to ourselves, who have lost considerably. It is a clear picture. Our industrial competitors benefited largely, and we lost considerably.

In a number of respects, we must consider oil as a commodity that is not much different from other commodities. If we happened, as a country, to be a big grain producer, such as France or the United States, our interest would lie in a high world price for wheat and maize. If we were a coffee-producing country, such as Brazil, our interest would lie in a high world price for coffee. If we were big potato farmers, we would be happy for a high world price for potatoes.

Similarly, we should be able to recognise our own interests staring us in the face and rejoice in a high world price for oil. Unfortunately, we have not been able to gain the benefits that would accrue from that, but if we want to do so we must act. Both the two forms of action that I have suggested are necessary but unfortunately inimical to the present dogma of the Conservative party.

First, it is necessary to hold talks with OPEC. I am not saying that we should become members of OPEC if it is unwise enough to change the rules of membership, but we can talk and — what is harder for this Administration — listen.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer prides himself on the fact that we have the freest oil province in the world. He said that in his Budget statement this year. Why should we pride ourselves on that? Why should we be less interventionist than the United States or Canada? Why is it thought that we have something to be proud about? I would sooner pride ourselves on the fact that the oil industry is working for the benefit of the entire country and for its future. The level of the output of oil should not be left to companies which may have no involvement in the future industrial performance of Britain. It should be determined by the interest to our country in maximising our resources and the prosperity of Britain as a whole.

Secondly, I would wish to relieve industry, and possibly consumers, of the effects of higher oil prices. For a start, we could reduce oil taxation. That is an easy action to take and a welcome one, and it would provide an offset against higher oil prices. Interest rates also need to be reduced, for reasons that we have heard, and they could be reduced still further as higher oil prices strengthened the pound. Important also is the fact that there could be a trade-off between the benefits to the Exchequer from the higher oil price and the passing on of some of those benefits to our hard-pressed industry.

Genuine investment incentives might be considered. I grant that the best expenditure is made when the manufacturer decides that particular investment is required irrespective of the help that a Government may give but do not let us scorn the investment that comes when a Government are involved. After all, every successful nation practises that form of investment, and so should we. The trouble is that we are not very good at it. We are not very good at merging the interests of the Government and industry. It is a grievous fault that we possess; a fault which other countries do not have to anything like the same extent, and one that we should be busying ourselves in putting right. We should not be adopting the hands-off attitude that is so common now.

I turn to what I call sterling M3 and other good luck charms. I, like a few of my hon. Friends, have a copy of the Financial Statement and Budget Report 1980-81. It is a treasured copy. It is signed by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who happens to be the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. It set out in detailed form how we would obtain all the successes arising from the control of monetary stock. It shows how the money supply was to be connected directly to the reducing of inflation, from 7 to 11 per cent. in 1980-81, down to 4 to 8 per cent. in 1983-84. In fact, it was 10 per cent. during that period. Undeterred in 1985, the Financial Statement and Budget report brought forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer rearranged the timetable to bring the range down to 2 to 5 per cent. in 1988-89.

We have seen the level of inflation reduce to 2·5 per cent., and the latest money supply figure of September 1986 is 18·3 per cent. If there is any connection between the sort of monetarism practised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the reduction of inflation, it is contradicted by the statistics on which the right hon. Gentleman set the monetary targets in 1980. I know that economic targets are not easy to achieve, but a Government who put the fullest possible trust in an economic objective and failed so signally deserve a special page, possibly, in "Guinness Book of Records".

As the right hon. Member for Hillhead said, the Governor of the Bank of England finds himself completely bemused. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, as is his wont when he is challenged, said today that monetary indicators are very important, but no one really believes that he pays much attention to them. We heard today, more clearly than in any speech that the right hon. Gentleman has made previously, that interest rates are much more important than he has ever allowed for in the past. Interest rates interact with the level of exchange rates, as the hon. Member for Hillhead said, but it is only an interaction. If we were to find that it required too high a level of interest rates to achieve the exchange rate that we want, there would have to be a modification. The prime factor is likely to be the exchange rate, but it is influenced by the level of interest rates and the level of economic activity.

Gone out of the window is any attempt to continue with the sort of monetarism that has been preached, but because it was preached it tends to be reaffirmed in some way each time the Chancellor of the Exchequer deals with these matters. We know what the reality is, however.

Very high interest rates have been disastrous for manufacturing industry, as well as the high pound. There was always some sort of a case to squeeze the home market and make the export market more attractive to industry by a combination of high interest rates and low exchange rates. That was the de Gaulle solution in 1958. There is a case to be made also for encouraging the home market to achieve economies of scale, and that was the basis of Maudling's dash for growth. No case can be made, however, for a simultaneous squeeze on export markets and home markets by high exchange rates and high interest rates. We have clearing bank base rates of 11 per cent., which means interest rates of 13 per cent. or more for good-class borrowers. That means that in real terms they are paying over 10 per cent., which is historically high. As for the poor, wretched new companies which get all the crocodile tears from the Government — these are companies which have not established themselves — they are faced with interest rates of 12 or 13 per cent. It is extremely difficult to establish a company on that basis.

In these circumstances, the only gainers are the financial intermediaries. The City booms, in direct contrast to the decline of manufacturing industry. The wretched aspect is that the House is divided, not into political parties, but in the types of constituency that we represent. There are rundown manufacturing towns and there is the affluence that is provided by the City of London and dispersed in an area around it, where those engaged in the City live and work.

In March 1986, 9·6 per cent. of all employees were employed in the financial sector. Is this a wise division of our resources in the present harsh economic climate? We are grateful, of course, for any jobs, but in the long term should the building societies, banks, insurance companies and unit trusts — all the financial intermediaries which take our money and place it elsewhere — have such a dominant role in our economy? I remind the House that 60 years ago Sir Winston Churchill eyed the City of London and compared it with industry and said that finance should be less proud. I regret that the Government have no equal in pursuing a course opposite to that advocated by Sir Winston.

It is right, as the right hon. Member for Taunton said, that we must start giving much more assistance and attention to manufacturing industry, not least because of the damage done to it over the past six or seven years. More than a third of the manufacturing industry within my constituency has been lost, and that is reflected elsewhere. These were small, good and viable firms which could have continued to earn a living by producing medium-tech articles and objects. Sadly, all these firms have gone and they cannot be resuscitated. We must make an early start in trying to build up and build upon what we have.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer looks to privatisation to make up his deficiencies. We know that there is a great deal of money sloshing around in the economy, and we know, too, that house prices have increased enormously. We know that credit levels are historically high and that credit card use has expanded out of all recognition. We know also that, because of the increase in house prices, house buyers' collateral is historically enormous. With a £60,000 house on which repayments of £20,000 have already been made, a number of people have many thousands of pounds of credit which they can use to convert capital to income. It is increasingly easy to convert capital to income, via building societies, among other ways.

The trouble is that the oil money is not enough. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is using that oil money. He is using privatisation money from British Telecom, gas and, later, water for current expenditure. With the use of oil money to finance current expenditure, and privatisation to finance current expenditure, the scene is being set for an election some time next year. That is what it is all about. Once again this country will pay a high price. It normally pays a bit of a price for an election. It will pay a much higher price for the next election, to the disadvantage of every one of us.

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) made a good deal of the importance of high interest rates and the damage that they cause. He must consider also the impact on interest rates of the policies that are seemingly advocated by his party, should it ever come to power. As a certain leader across the Atlantic said, "We ain't seen nothing yet," as far as that is concerned. The right hon. Gentleman should take cognisance of the fact that the creation of new companies at the rate of about 550 a week suggests that entrepreneurs are coming forward and are not deterred by the level of interest rates — much as we would all, of course, like to push interest rates down. Certainly, the way forward cannot be the one advocated by the Opposition parties.

One strange aspect of the speech by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was the absence of any suggestion of his own policies. This was the dog that did not bark. Indeed, when pressed by one or two of my hon. Friends to vouchsafe comments on the Labour party's record or promises for the future, a note of panic entered his voice. He said, "We chose this debate so that we could talk about the Government's policy." That is understandable, given the sort of policies that are offered to the country. Whether we are talking about £10 billion expenditure, £28 billion expenditure or the £8 billion pot of gold mentioned by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) for health and social services, the impact and the consequence would be disastrous, not least, as I have said, on interest rates and the level of the pound. So-called social ownership is the side development of the party that has not changed the red flag for the red rose. Nationalisation is changed to social ownership, but the effect is the same. The same applies to the impact on pension funds, which affect many millions of workers throughout the country, and the threats which the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and his friends have uttered about what they would do about Government interference with pension funds.

I could continue to list the threats and promises of the Labour party, but the debate is on the Government side of the House. As so often happens in important measures, the contributions from the Liberal and Social Democratic parties are difficult to find. It is always difficult to find their policies or, indeed, those who enunciate them. The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) made an extraordinary personal attack on my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. His only recommendation seemed to be that we should join the European monetary system. I listened with interest to a number of comments by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that topic, which will continue to be a subject of debate.

Some of my hon. Friends wish for even more capital spending. I hope that they take account of the autumn statement, which promises an increase of a third of £1 billion in capital spending across the programmes enunciated by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. That is an important step. Those who attach such importance, understandably and rightly, to Government spending should take due account of that fact.

Monetary figures and economic management are other sources of concern. We all recognise that the management of an economy such as ours is very delicate and complex.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House are lured into the belief that the power residing within any Chancellor of the Exchequer to manage the economy is a great deal less than one might suppose from noting the debates in the House or from reading the views of the newspaper pundits. But to the extent that the Government can manage the economy, it is a complex process.

There must be a two-part approach to the economy. The first involves steady adherence to clear medium and long-term objectives and readiness to cope adequately with short-term pressures and dangers. No one has a better record in that regard than my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. Prior to his being Chancellor, he was Financial Secretary to the Treasury. If I may declare an interest, for a short time I had the privilege to serve as his parliamentary private secretary. He is aware of the short-term dangers. We must guard against the danger of the inflationary pressures which are building up within the economy. This is a crucial matter and one on which we have had outstanding success.

I recognise that present conditions are different from those in earlier years. Conditions today are better because of the Government's achievements. For example, unlike the conditions which obtained in the 1970s, the present inflation rate is far below the current level of interest rates. One effect is that, to a much greater extent, people hold a far larger proportion of their wealth in bank deposits than they did before. This is just one of the technical changes in the financial system which have occurred in the past few years. Those changes have disturbed the relationship between the measure of broad money and the national income.

That matter was discussed in detail in the speech, to which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor referred with approbation, by the Governor of the Bank of England at Loughborough university last week in which he said:

"It is fair to ask whether a broad money target continues to serve a useful purpose".

He went on to suggest that perhaps

"we would do better to dispense with monetary targetry altogether."

Whatever difficulties are associated with the measurement of monetary targets and monetary statistics, the Governor was also right, in a speech a fortnight earlier, to point out:

"Liquidity and credit have been gowing uncomfortably fast."

My right hon. Friend reaffirmed that he appreciates such dangers. I was glad to hear—I hope I correctly quoted what he said—that the Government's commitment to a monetary policy which will squeeze out inflation remains unabated. It is important that all his ministerial colleagues adhere to that commitment, but I recognise the pressures on them and feel guilty, as do virtually all hon. Members, about adding to the pressures on Ministers in spending Departments.

It is essential that we recognise, after all the Government's valiant efforts, that surrendering to inflation at this stage would be unthinkable. That must not be allowed to happen. We have come down a long and difficult road. There is too much at stake and the opportunities before us are too great to be missed.

There seems to be a spirit of defeatism—certainly among the Opposition—about what British industry is doing, and can do in the near future, about the opportunities offered to it. British industry enjoys many advantages which have been given to it since 1979. The featherbedding and overmanning of the 1960s are things of the past. They will only return if the Opposition parties seize power. [HON. MEMBERS: "Seize?"] Perhaps I should have said when they are granted power. Perhaps some of the people in Militant Tendency made me use that word. Should the unhappy occasion come to pass whereby nationalised industries and local authorities are told to take on labour, we would be back to featherbedding. But, with this Government's policies, those times have passed.

Record resources are being devoted to training and investment. The past few years have seen sharp rises in Britain's overseas assets, in company profits and in the underlying rate of productivity growth. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said, sterling is now highly competitive. Its value against the deutschmark has decreased by about 30 per cent. since the middle of last year. There can be no country where venture capital is easier to obtain, although I recognise the problems caused by high interest rates.

The labour and trade union scene has been transformed, thanks largely to the Government's sensible trade union legislation, which gave back to trade union members the power they had lost to some of the union bosses. The attitudes which are now being reported on both sides of industry give me great confidence for the future.

All these factors add up to a great opportunity for British industry to compete ever more effectively on overseas and domestic markets. The outlook there is good. Demand in this country is strong. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said, consumer spending will grow by about 4 per cent. next year. As the London Business School pointed out, world trade is expected to grow by more than 6 per cent. next year—twice this year's rate.

Provided that we can keep our unit labour costs under control, I believe that contrary to the Opposition's pessimism, there is every reason to look forward to a sustained continuation of the economy's growth of the past five years. The new jobs to add to the 1 million created since 1983 will come from there. Those opportunities will be taken by the 550 companies that are being created each week.

It is from there that the increasing Government revenues will come to produce yet more schools and hospitals and even better social services. The Opposition clamour all the time for those measures, but only the policies of the Conservative Government can produce the resources to sustain them.

Several Hon. Members rose

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I inform the House that, by order of Mr. Speaker, the ten minutes rule for speeches is now in operation.

7.4 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): The hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) said that he wanted to expand social services but the hard reality is that the Government's attack on the ability of local government to sustain and expand social services decries that aim.

Mr. Maples: How can the hon. Gentleman say that in the light of an autumn statement that has just allowed an increase of £4 billion in local authority spending?

Mr. Barron: In the past seven years, Rotherham metropolitan borough council has lost more than £30 million of rate support grant which would have gone into expanding those services and programmes that have had be put out to contract because of what is happening in the Department of the Environment.

When I looked at the Order Paper and saw the amendment tabled in the names of six senior members of the Government, including the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a phrase that we use in Yorkshire came to mind. I wonder how anyone could have the "brass neck" to table such a motion claiming the success of this Government's economic policies. That view was strengthened when I heard the Chancellor say that the Opposition did not care about the plight of the unemployed. I should like to talk about the problems of the unemployed and what is happening in the regions that I and many other hon. Members represent.

To claim that the Government's economic policies have been successful is difficult if one comes from regions that have faced massive rundowns in those industries that have kept employment stable over many years. It might be good to claim success if one is in the top 5 per cent. of those income earners who, over the past seven years, have been given back more than £3 billion a year by the Government in tax handouts to the rich. One might be able to claim success if people have invested their money in banks and so on, and are in the fortunate position of having money.

The right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann), the hon. Member for Wycombe and the Chancellor talked of how well the Government had done. The right hon. Member for Taunton did not explain that in great detail. The 1 million jobs which we are told have been created since 1983 are certainly not full-time job equivalents. Since 1979, more than 1 million full-time job equivalents have been lost.

Unemployment in areas such as the Rother Valley is becoming critical. Since 1981, unemployment in my constituency has increased by more than 77 per cent. Of course, those are the numbers of registered unemployed, not the real figures. In July 1986, of the 6,421 registered unemployed in the Rother valley, 34·8 per cent. had been unemployed for more than 12 months and 36 per cent. were under 25. Recently, the registered unemployed figure increased to 6,500. It has been increasing every month for a long time.

It is estimated that the cost to the public purse of unemployment in my area is £42 million a year or, to put it another way, each person working in the Rother valley has to find more than £1,100 from his or her income to pay for the unemployed. Real unemployment in the constituency is hidden by certain facts. In July this year, 2,800 16-year-olds left school in the Rotherham metropolitan borough council area, which covers three constituencies. Over 89 per cent. of them are without work or are going on to youth training schemes or courses.

YTS first started in the economic year 1983 and I have only recently been able to get figures relating to its first year of operation, 1983-84, from the Rotherham careers officer for Rotherham borough council. Those figures show that the success rate in the first year of YTS in the area was a little less than 50 per cent. These figures have taken time to collect because not everybody completed YTS training in the first year.

In the earlier part of the debate, Conservative Members spoke of youth training as the be-all and end-all for kids, yet for the majority of kids it is like being in a revolving door. After 12 months — now presumably after two years — they come out of that same entrance. They leave the scheme knowing that they do not have a chance of full-time employment.

Quite recently, a Minister came to the south Yorkshire region and visited many constituencies including mine. The Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey), visited the area. I wish that he was present in the Chamber now so that I could invite him to tell the House what he saw when he visited west and south Yorkshire. The day after that visit he was quoted in the press as saying that he was "deeply depressed by the experience and understood why people in coalfield areas thought that current spending on restoring the coalfield environment was not enough to solve the problem of unemployment and increasing poverty in such areas."

He was quite right. It is a great pity that there is no opportunity for the junior Minister to get that message to the Front Bench, especially the Treasury Front Bench which is not helping these people.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that NCB Enterprise Ltd. has provided significant amounts of money in the area which are facing difficulty. Has his area not received any money?

Mr. Barron: I do not know of one job which has been created in the Rother valley as a result of the work of National Coal Board Enterprise Ltd. The unemployment level in my constituency would account for over 50 per cent. of the jobs that will be created by the enterprise board by the end of the financial year. However, that board was set up to look after problems nationally and not just in my constituency but neighbouring constituencies. Some areas have far worse levels of unemployment than my constituency. Money is not being directed to these areas.

Many of today's speeches have concentrated on how the economy is expanding but we are talking about getting money into areas which are in desperate need of help. The level of unemployment is unacceptable to the Labour party and, I hope, to members of the Conservative party. What is more unacceptable is that more than 30 per cent. of a generation of young people between the ages of 16 and 24 in the south Yorkshire region are being denied the right to go to work and are denied the right to be brought up as we were in years gone by.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) that it is not a question of economics or economic philosophy but a question of people. People are in need in Britain not just in the north but in the south-east and south-west. The Government must change course and direct resources to these areas.

7.14 pm

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): Earlier in the debate the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) called in aid the independent commentators and financial market analysts who he said had been confused by the recent path and progress of policy. However, I believe that those who ended up with most egg on their faces after the last six weeks of policy were precisely those independent commentators and analysts. They have made fools of themselves in predicting and sometimes hoping about what would happen.

The market analysts believed that the short-term interest rate was bound to go up 4 per cent. — they believed that it was only a matter of time—and some of the less ambitious put the level at 2 per cent. The general overwhelming consensus of so-called market opinion—I say so-called because it is the opinion of those who get their views projected by the media through their grumbles—was not the genuine reflection of opinion at all. These analysts were determined to prove the Chancellor wrong and somehow talk interest rates up to stratospheric levels. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor was being judged on absurd standards by some of the market commentators, and some right hon. Members, including the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley).

My right hon. Friend was right to delay the move on interest rates until he did. His timing was precisely right as it enabled the whole strain to be taken by a 1 per cent. increase. He nearly succeeded against the advice of the so-called experts in seeing us through this period with the entire strain being taken by the exchange rate without any interest rate increase. When it turned out that their forecasts were wrong, they dreamed up all manner of excuses such as Sheikh Yamani, the Bundesbank and everything else. The basic assessment of people who thought that sterling interest rates would roar up by 4 per cent. was wholly wrong. Their assessment was wrong for an interesting reason which is useful to consider.

The weakness of these analysts is that they think too much about domestic aggregates. To an extent they are led on by Ministers of all Governments who tend to talk in terms of what they can control on their home ground. In reality there is no real effective control of either the Keynesian aggregates or the monetary aggregates—all of which have proved enormously unruly. We have a wider open economy washed by enormous movements of capital and finance—£90 billion passes every afternoon through the London currency markets. Yet it is against that sort of background that some policy makers seriously believe that the Chancellor is in a position to influence the monetary aggregate in one direction or another and that he is magically responsible for these international forces. That is naive.

The Chancellor has to be totally flexible—more than the Chancellor of three or four years ago, let alone 20 or 30 years ago. He has to be ready to use interest rates, exchange rates and the cash reserves with great agility and inevitably, in a way which constantly changes. Those who argue that the policy is not clear or has changed, or complain that movements have changed over the weeks are absurd and are like those who in a rowing boat in a storm would complain when the oarsman changed direction to avoid being drowned by a wave.

In the past six weeks a great deal has emerged about the way in which our economy and aggregates operate. We have successfully got through a difficult period of pressure on sterling arising in some degree from reasons which had nothing to do with sterling. At the end of it all I agree that we are very exposed currency—about that there can be no doubt. If we do nothing about this and postpone the inevitable decision to join the exchange rate mechanism we shall fall under the gravatational orbit of the Bundesbank and that of the deutschmark. We should seek to resist that. We would do better to enter into arrangements which give us some say in the pattern of currencies in Europe rather than be left as a minor part of the deutschmark bloc. So I think we should get on with the inevitable membership of the European monetary system or exchange rate mechanism. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will prepare the way for action after the next general election. Then once the hothouse atmosphere of politics has cooled down the Government can join the European system when they have resumed office for a third term.

The other issue which has run through the debate so far is whether we have a choice between more public capital spending—my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has that choice—and lower taxes. Is that really what the debate is about? I believe that it is simply not the choice. I have never believed that there was such an intense choice between those two strategies. One reason for that belief was put clearly by my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton, who reminded us that there is now substantial current infrastructure spending. Taxpayer-financed capital spending is roaring ahead. I should like there to be more in many areas.

The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) correctly reminded us of the miserable, dismal and ghastly conditions in which many housing estates in some of our great cities remain. But my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton further reminded us that the potential for such spending not just through public but through private finance—increasingly through private finance—is enormous and growing. That is not a fantasy being put forward by Conservatives in Britain—the idea is being adopted by Governments of all colours in almost every country.

Franchise financing is now beginning to be used for infrastructure and major public works throughout the planet and at last, we are doing it here successfully. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has at last persuaded the Treasury to drop its ridiculous arguments about crowding out and accept that the new bridge across the Thames at Dartford can be financed privately. It is a magnificent new infrastructure project and it is being financed privately.

We can go ahead with very much bigger infrastructure and enormous public works on the basis of new techniques for private finance. I hope that we adopt them. That leaves us room for substantial tax cuts as well. We have the resources to do both. They are essential because of the crucial effect that high taxes have on low earnings.

I do not understand Opposition Members, especially members of the Labour party, who do not seem to sympathise over the evil effects that big tax deductions have on pay slips, especially for people on very low earnings or people on pensions. It seems an utterly soulless approach and I plead with them to have a new look at the conditions experienced by some of their constituents.

Tax cuts are a major social priority, and they are a priority as well because they are a crucial element in job disincentives. Anybody who has seen how pay slips are reduced by national insurance contributions and tax must realise that those reductions have a great deal to do with the lack of job opportunities. They deter people who long to go to into work from taking a job.

It is questionable, too, whether tax cuts reduce revenue. We have evidence, on which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor touched this afternoon, to show that, at the higher levels, the more we cut taxes, the more revenue we get. That is what has happened under the present Government. We have halved capital taxes and doubled the revenue. Perhaps tax cutting produces more revenue, which can be used for the social purposes that Opposition Members so often advocate. It beats me why they regard tax cuts as so dreadful.

Countries all around the world are cutting taxes. The United States is doing so and Japan and Germany are thinking about it. Those nations understand that lower taxes means lower costs on industry, more jobs, more choice, better opportunity and better social conditions for families. We would be crazy not to follow suit.

7.22 pm

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I wonder what Sir John Nott, the chairman of the merchant bankers Lazards, who doubled his salary last year to £366,436, would do with his tax cuts. I wonder about the others.

"He was among hundreds of top City staff earning six-figure pay packets even before the Big Bang, according to a report published today . . .

24 directors and nine employees earned more than £250,000 a year. Another 361 directors and 667 employees in 42 companies earned more than £100,000 prior to the summer round of recruitment."

So reports this evening's edition of the London Standard.

I am not against tax cuts, but I often wonder what happens with tax cuts for people in high income brackets. Presumably they have another holiday abroad, for example. In the meantime, my people, like those about whom my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) spoke, suffer massive unemployment and continue to live in bad housing where the drug problem is increasing and where there is despair among youth because they do not have jobs. They would like to be earning some money so that they could get some tax cuts.

The right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) made a telling point. He said that he believed more in people than in economic theory. That seemed to bring him right up against the Chancellor who said, as he always does, that the Labour party, when in power, doubled unemployment. I do not deny that unemployment increased from 2·6 per cent. to 5 per cent. between 1974 and 1979, but, in May 1979, 1,218,000 people were unemployed, and within three years, to October 1982, the number had increased to 3,049,000. That is a large increase in three years.

It is indeed people, the unemployed and their families, who matter. The hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) mentioned strikes, but if people do not have work, they are hardly likely to go on strike—there is nothing to strike about. The Govenment's trade union legislation and unemployment have been used to discipline workers who still have jobs and to weaken the power and strength of the trade union movement.

Unemployment has another effect, especially in conjunction with high interest rates. In areas such as mine, which have high unemployment, one can go down streets of council houses which people bought because they thought that it was a grand thing to buy their house, and accepted the Government's policy, where there are a dozen or more "For Sale" signs. Because of unemployment, people cannot pay their mortgages. That is what unemployment and the Government's economic policies mean.

Of course, some people have done very well. I have mentioned a few who have done very well indeed out of the present economic system. I support the Opposition motion. If I have any criticism of it, it is that it does not go far enough. It does not say what we intend to do. I have probably been involved in every economic debate since I came to the House 22 years ago. We always get involved in great arguments about the best way in which to run the existing economic system.

The time has come to stop arguing about the best way to run the economic system. The time has come to change the economic system and get rid of it. We should have the principle of co-operation, working together rather than being in competition man against man, woman against woman, employer against employer and industry against industry. We need to have an entirely new concept if we are to begin to deal with the economic problems. I accept that all Conservative Members, and some Opposition Members, although those I am referring to are never here, would not agree with me on that concept. I am not talking about a command economy with which the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) used to frighten the life out of everybody, believing that we wanted an east European type system. We have never argued for that. We must have greater planning of the resources of our country and we must have greater control of our industry. We must also concern ourselves with the planning of our exports.

I said that I thought the speech of the right hon. Member for Taunton was excellent. However, I do not agree with him when he talks about setting the builders free. I want private builders or any other builders to build the houses, schools and roads that are required. However, we still have to do that with some measure of planning for, financial assistance and aid and it has to be paid for through the Government and local authorities. That is not feather bedding. That is putting people to work on the basis of seeing what the people need and planning the resources properly in order to deal with those needs.

That is the issue with which we are faced. If we do not do that, we will sink even further into the mire. The thought of another five years of government of the type we have had since 1979 fills me with absolute horror. For example, some Labour and Conservative Members are going up to Knowsley. Let them look around the areas where the factories used to be and see what has happened to them. Many of those factories are now closed. Those assets have gone. It is not like it used to be even in the 1930s. The factories closed down then, but they could be opened up again. We have reached a crucial stage. I support this motion but, my goodness, I believe that we must go much further, much faster and much more resolutely than at present.

7.32 pm

Mr. Mike Woodcock (Ellesmere Port and Neston): Quite rightly, we have heard a great deal about job losses and oil. I represent a constituency which is not very different from that of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer). It has many similar problems. However, no doubt he will realise that my view of the reasons for those jobs losses is not the same as his. It is an industrial constituency which has a large motor vehicle plant. It has the nation's only nuclear enrichment facility, a massive chemical complex and the country's largest oil refinery. Last week, we reached something of a milestone because when that refinery announced a further 700 job losses, it brought the total of job losses in my constituency over the past six years to a staggering 7,000.

During the 1960s, my constituency was booming. Vauxhall Cars established its second United Kingdom factory. A large oil and chemical complex was created and we had massive investment in housing and infrastructure. many people from Liverpool and the west midlands moved to the area because of its relative prosperity. I regret to say that, by contrast, during the 1980s we have had major problems and major job losses. Burmah Oil closed its refinery, Bowaters closed its paper mill, Vauxhall Motors shed 1,200 jobs, Associated Octel — makers of lead additives — cut back on workers as the world began to decrease the amount of lead in petrol. British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. reduced its staff by 600. Only last week Shell announced 700 further jobs losses on top of the 1,000 job losses last year, effectively bringing the work force of the nation's largest refinery down from 3,400 to 1,700 in less than two years. Even as I speak, a threat hangs over a further 300 jobs at the plant of UKF Fertilisers. As I said, there have been 7,000 jobs losses in six years, with hardly a family in my constituency unaffected.

It would be tempting to say that the job losses are the result of the Government's economic policies. Many Opposition Members would argue that that is the case. Many local politicians invariably argue that what is happening in my constituency is a direct result of the Government's economic policy. They say that the Government should pump in more taxpayers' money and that they should introduce import controls and increase regional aid. Those actions are not solutions. They avoid the economic reality.

I shall look at the genuine background to the 7,000 job losses in my constituency. The reality in the oil industry is that the demand for oil products has decreased by 30 per cent. There is a massive over-refining capacity in Europe and all of that has brought about much greater competition. My constituency entered this phase of greater competition with the largest United Kingdom oil refinery and one of the smallest. Neither was in any way competitive in international terms. Burmah, the smallest refinery, quickly closed, paying the price for being uncompetitive. It closed its doors for good in 1981, and now stands empty and derelict as a reminder of what happens when industry fails to adapt and improve.

The larger refinery, rather belatedly, took note of an independent assessment which showed it to be one of the most inefficient refineries in Europe in terms of manpower utilisation. That inefficiency was brought about by a set of factors which were endemic in British industry in the 1960s and 1970s. Those factors included restrictive practices stemming from over-powerful trade unions which prevented necessary change, weak management which failed to face up to the challenge of a new economic environment, and a regional grant structure which subsidised inefficiency and led to increasing uncompetitiveness and nearly led to the permanent closure of Britain's largest refinery.

The choice for that refinery was stark — either become efficient or go out of business. I am pleased to say that the company and the work force chose to face reality. The result has been the tragic loss of 1,700 jobs, but we now have a refinery with a bright future which has secured £400 million worth of new investment.

The reason for the job losses was not the Government's economic policy, but the sort of policy advocated by the Opposition. Those policies would have led to the extinction of that refinery. The present policies, although painful, have led to long-term survival. Similarly, job losses in Vauxhall Motors and Bowaters paper mill were brought about by the lack of competitiveness and poor industrial relations. The Vauxhall site in my constituency could have been the centre of General Motors' expansion in Europe. Instead, because of appalling industrial relations, those investments went to Germany. The acres of unused land stand as a monument to the poor industrial relations of the 1960s. Vauxhall is now producing more competitive products.

In both cases, the answer was to face competition and produce the right product at the right price. That is the only meaningful response. That is what the Government are advocating. By contrast, the Opposition continue to preach protectionist policies. Yet even that fundamental belief in protection did not prevent the Opposition spokesman on trade and industry from arriving at the Vauxhall plant in my constituency recently in a Nissan car provided by the local Labour party agent.

In the nuclear industry the job losses that we have sustained have occurred because of increased efficiency. The development of the centrifuge process of uranium enrichment has inevitably led to job losses. It is inevitable that as the world becomes more competitive, as stocks of fossil fuel become exhausted, and as we realise that fossil fuels are more valuable as a chemical feedstock than as an emergency source, we will have to rely more and more on nuclear power.

As industry gears up to face the challenges of the 21st century, what do the Opposition propose? They propose phasing out nuclear power and returning to an over-dependence on coal. They propose a return to the days when the National Union of Mineworkers held the country to ransom. As the Confederation of British Industry stated only this week, the rejection of the nuclear option will mean slower growth, reduced competitiveness, higher unemployment, higher costs and lower living standards.

The job losses in my constituency are not the result of the Government's economic policy. They are the inevitable outcome of years of restrictive practices, overmanning, unreal jobs, uncompetitiveness, Government subsidies, indecisiveness over the future of nuclear energy, over-taxation of industry and overspending by local authorities, all of which were encouraged by the Opposition's economic policies.

Mr. Barron: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Woodcock: I will not give way, because I have only two minutes left.

By contrast, as a result of Government policy I now have an oil industry in my constituency that is secure and efficient; a car industry that can beat any competition; a nuclear enrichment facility that is a major foreign earner; a new paper mill that is achieving production levels that were never dreamt of before, an industry that has more to invest after tax and which is now investing for the right reasons and not the wrong reasons. We have an enterprise economy that is producing hundreds of new firms that will grow and provide thousands of new jobs.

We all know that we need more jobs, but the only jobs that are worth having are real jobs that come from a competitive and efficient industry. What my constituency and this country needs is not the dreadful policies of the Opposition, but another seven years of the Government's economic policy.

7.42 pm

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Page 25, paragraph 61, of the autumn statement reads:

"Throughout the current financial year growth in £M3 has been above the target range in the MTFS, with growth in excess of 18 per cent. in the year to mid-September. In part this has reflected the increased attractiveness of interest-bearing bank deposits relative to other retail deposits. PSL2, which includes most of these other deposits, rose by 14 per cent. during the year to mid-September."

I have to tell you, Mr. Deputy Speaker — and you know Oldham as well as I do — that in my constituency of Oldham, Central and Royton very few people will get their hands on the autumn statement, and of those who do there will be fewer still who will understand the paragraph that I have just quoted. However, despite the complacent boastings of the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the Dispatch Box this afternoon about the improvement in the economy, so many years of continual economic growth, and the million jobs that he claims to have been able to create since 1983, the working people of Oldham understand only that since the Government came to office their position has gradually deteriorated.

No matter where we look in Oldham, that is the case. If people want a job, they have to face the fact that 8,000 men and 4,000 women are registered unemployed in the town. At the jobcentre there are 508 vacancies for 12,000 unemployed people.

It may happen that someone in Oldham might want hospital care for his mother. Perhaps she has a cataract that needs attention. That person will be told at the local hospital that of course his mother needs treatment, but the waiting time is two to three years. However, if the mother has £1,800 and wishes to pay, she can have a private operation the following week. Arnold Broadbent and his wife, or Kevin Clegg and his wife, who do not have £1,800, cannot understand how the Chancellor can be so complacent about these matters.

Perhaps someone's son or daughter is to be married soon and needs a house. Perhaps they may be able to buy one of the splendid little houses that are still for sale in Oldham for £20,000, or they may want a council house. Of course, as soon as they try to borrow money on a mortgage to buy the house, they find that the rates have increased steadily during the time that the Government have been in office. Contrary to the claims that the rate of inflation is falling, they would have to pay more for their mortgage than they would have paid one month ago. They ask how that can be squared with the Chancellor's claims.

No matter where we look — at jobs, housing, health or education — we find that matters have deteriorated since the Government came to office. Yet time after time the Chancellor makes his claims from the Dispatch Box. He has claimed that jobs have been created. I would not want to be unfair to the Government. Of course jobs have been created in Oldham in an attempt to make up for the famous firms that have gone to the wall. Platts International, the textile machinery firm which was famous throughout the world, disappeared. Indeed, textile mill upon textile mill has disappeared.

Oldham metropolitan borough council has been trying to create jobs. It is one of those much maligned bodies — the local authorities — which the Government have lost no opportunity to deny funds. During the whole of the Government's term of office Oldham metropolitan borough council has tried to step in and do the job that any decent, self-respecting Government would have done. It has tried to encourage people to come to Oldham, and it has been successful, but without much encouragement from the Government. The council has tried hard to make up for the drop in jobs. It has been successful, but not successful enough to enable the Chancellor to stand at the Dispatch Box, as he did this afternoon, and expect people to support him again at the next election unless he does something about his policy.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) said, the Chancellor must face reality and not suggest that there is nothing wrong, that his policy is working wonderfully, or that the fall in the value of the pound had nothing to do with him but is the fault of the City of London. We do not believe that for a moment.

With all the opportunities that the Government have had during their lifetime, such as the enormous revenues from North sea oil, which have not been enjoyed by our competitors — the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Spain and Italy — people of Oldham want to know why our currency, which is the measure of the confidence of the outside world in the future of our country, has fallen steadily against the currencies of other European countries.

How can it happen like that if everything is so successful? It may be that the Chancellor can produce statistics in the autumn statement which are difficult to follow for the man in the street, but all the statistics in the world will not convince me and the people of Oldham, and the many millions of other working people, that our country's economy is all right and that the Chancellor deserves another chance. He clearly does not.

There must be a solution — a very radical solution. I do not have time to go into that in 10 minutes, but I shall vote for the motion. I have every confidence that when our Government come into office, which may be within the year, we shall face a difficult task, but we shall resolutely tackle the most important matter of all, which is to get the unemployed back to work and create the wealth with which we shall be able to carry out the rest of our programme.

7.50 pm

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): It is appropriate that at the end of a parliamentary Session we should be debating economic policy because it enables the Government and the country to take stock of what has been achieved and, of course, it enables us to explain what remains to be done.

The Official Opposition are on dangerous ground when they use the subject for one of their Supply days, because it enables their own policies as well as the Government's to come under much closer scrutiny. As the election draws ever nearer, the electorate will be looking not just at our record but at what the Opposition propose. For that reason all of us in the Conservative party welcome the debate.

The debate enables us to expose the frightening cost of the promises made by the Opposition over recent months. It is easy, in the heady atmosphere of one's own party conference — we have all done it — to say things that please one's own side, and to promise the earth. It is less easy to explain to the electorate in the ensuing weeks and months precisely how it will be paid for. It is even more difficult to explain to the electors that they, the electorate, will have to pay for those promises. Those promises, so easily made, are now being costed. They will continue to be costed, and until the election is over and the Labour party has been trounced at the polls, we shall ram home the expensive nature of what it proposes.

The Opposition will, of course, point to the unemployment figures and compare them with the figures when they were in power. It is absolutely fair for them to do that as a political argument, but what they will not tell the electorate is that in 1979 this country was grossly overmanned in virtually every large industry, the Civil Service had swollen to figures hitherto unknown and inflation was approaching that of some of the South American banana republics. But for today's Opposition, the 1970s were the golden days. They were the days of financial irresponsibility, of spending more and more money, which had not been earned, but which had come from people's taxation or increased borrowing. They were the days of the gimmick and the cosmetic fix. They did more damage to stable, long-term employment and the value of people's savings than they care to admit. That is one of the many reasons why they were defeated in the 1979 general election.

We have seen Labour's economic policies in operation before. During the years of socialism our overseas economic debt doubled. It is a debt that this Government have had to pay, and are repaying. Spending on the Health Service was cut in real terms, although one would never have recognised it when one listened to some of the utterances by the Labour party, or the utterances of its Liberal and alliance partners, who have departed the scene of today's debate.

The Opposition, who posture before us today, promised before and did not perform. Now they promise more of the same medicine to the electors. They have the nerve to criticise this Government for what they have achieved. They offered, and imposed, nationalisation, with all the horrendous burdens that it brought for the taxpayer and the customer. They now call it social ownership, but the effect on the taxpayer will be just the same, and the change of a name cannot conceal their true intentions for the future of this country. Nor have they learnt anything from France's experiment in Socialism, yet today French men and French women cannot wait to get to the polls to turf out their Socialist masters and have done with that experiment. If this country were to follow the economic sirens from the Labour party, it would regret that. We would suffer as the people are suffering in some of the London boroughs that are under Socialism — Ealing, Lambeth, Haringey and Hackney. We would suffer the thought police that people are having to endure in Brent. We would have the economic drabness of Birmingham and Manchester.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), who is not in the Chamber, said that he was not advocating an eastern European state in what he intended to say, but I would tell him now if he were here that that is precisely what would be achieved if his proposals came into effect.

The Government have nothing to apologise for to the Labour party. Inflation is lower than in any year under the Labour Government. Output is at the highest ever and is still increasing. Economic growth is higher than in any year under their Government. The economy, which is what we are debating, is sound, and the Opposition, for all their rhetoric, know it. The electors know it. That is why we shall win the next election, whenever it is called.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): I think that there will be general agreement that the biggest problem that all Governments have faced since the war has been to marry a reduction or containment of unemployment with controlling inflation. To get inflation down and at the same time keep employment up is the $64,000 question that has never been answered by any Government since the war. The present Government make a great boast of the way in which they have reduced inflation. If one takes the bare statistics, they are impressive. The annual rate of inflation when the Labour Government went out of office in 1979 was 10 per cent. That figure is hardly admitted by the Government.

It has subsequently gone down, although it rose rapidly in 1980 as the direct and immediate result of the Government's first Budget, when VAT was doubled, contrary to the promises that they made in the election campaign.

Leaving that aside, it is true that the figure is now about 3 per cent. That has little to do with the Government's policies. The violent fluctuations in prices in the 12 years since 1974 have been due not so much — in fact, hardly at all — to the Government's policies, as to the rapidly fluctuating prices of the raw materials upon which our industry is based, and especially the price of oil.

I should like to put on record some figures that I got from the Library. Between 1973 and 1979 the United Nations world export price index of primary products, excluding crude petroleum, went up by 62 per cent. That increase in raw material prices took place mostly in the lifetime of the Labour Government. In the same period, crude oil import prices rose by 600 per cent. A vast amount of our industry depends on oil for its supply of energy. Between 1973 and 1979, the retail price index reflected those prices and rose by 140 per cent. That frighteningly high rate of increase was primarily due to the escalating prices that we had to pay for our raw material imports, and especially for oil. In comparison, between 1980 and 1985, raw material prices went down by 23 per cent., as against the increase of 62 per cent. in the lifetime of the Labour Government. Crude oil import prices between 1980 and 1985 rose, not by 600 per cent. as under the Labour Government, but by a little over 50 per cent. In the same period, the retail price index rose by 67 per cent.

The achievement suggested by those figures had very little to do with the Government's policies, or with the North sea oil bonanza, which was not created by the Tory party, although the Prime Minister might try to convince the people that it was. The fact is that the Government have had the bonanza of £53,000 million in oil revenues since 1979.

In 1985 alone, the Government got £11·5 billion, or almost £1,000 million every month from North Sea oil revenue. Every penny of that £11·5 billion has been squandered. The revenue collected last year from North sea oil can be compared with the £20 billion that was paid out in dole money, unemployment benefit and lost taxes. So oil revenue paid for just about half of the dole money that kept 4 million people kicking their heels in idleness, instead of giving them gainful employment. If we had invested that money instead of spending it on unemployment, we could have modernised our industry and our infrastructure — our roads, schools, hospitals, houses and communications system. The economy would have been in a much better state than it is now.

Despite what the Chancellor says, manufacturing investment in our industry today is one sixth what it was in 1979. Since 1979, £96 billion of British money has gone abroad and has been invested in modernising industry abroad. We are getting more and more imports because as our industry declines it becomes less and less modern. Our money is financing the modernisation of industry abroad and so imports sweep into this country. I challenge anybody in the House or elsewhere to say that he does not have something Japanese, Italian, German or whatever, in his garage or house, for example a television set or radio.

That is a sad state of affairs and the results of it are seen in many ways. The Government should understand that, unless they dramatically change their policies, the situation will get worse. For example, the attention of the House has been drawn to an article in The London Standard this evening about the colossal salaries that are being paid in the City and in big business. Sir John Nott, a former Secretary of State for Defence who was also at the Treasury, used to lecture ordinary workers on the importance of restraining their greed when asking for wage increases of £3 or £4 a week. As the chairman of merchant bankers, Lazard Brothers, he doubled his salary to more than £366,000 last year. That is not exceptional, many people in big business in Britain make that sort of colossal salary. So the Government should not lecture ordinary workers about their greed in wanting an extra £3 or £4 a week to maintain a reasonable standard of living for their wives and families.

The big complaint about this Government is the gross unfairness and injustice of their policies. I compare Sir John Nott's salary of £366,000 with the figures given in an article that appeared in The Times a few months ago:

"A big increase in employment of school leavers in Britain's hotels and restaurants, at weekly wages of between £35 and £40, is now expected after the reform of the wages councils."

Those wages will be reduced by £20 a week as a direct consequence of the Government's abolition of the wages councils. The Government want an increase in service jobs — in hotels and restaurants — where those kids will be fully employed and taken off the dole queue at a wage of between £30 and £40 a week. People in the City are earning £100,000, £200,000 or £250,000. Such are the figures paraded in the City.

The British people are seeing through this gross unfairness and will vote against the injustices which will be perpetrated and extended by the Government if they get the opportunity at the next election. The British people have rumbled the injustices and unfairness, the vastly increased unemployment and the likely prospect of their continuing increase. The people will say, "Get the hell out of it," at the next election, and a damned good thing too.

8.9 pm

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): I shall vote for the amendment this evening and nothing that I say now should be taken as anything other than wholehearted support for the Government's economic policy.

I hope my hon. Friends will accept that no economic policy can be considered entirely successful if all cannot share in its success. One group especially has not yet fully shared in the success of our economic policy, and it should now be enabled to do so. I refer to those who are on less than average earnings and who, at the moment, bear a quite penal burden of taxation.

Let us be clear about how many people are involved. About 8 million people in Britain earn less than £7,000 a year. Some 4 million, even on official Government definitions, earn less than 140 per cent. above the supplementary benefit level. Some 500,000 people receive family income suppolement. All those people have to pay tax at 29 per cent. That is a lot better than paying 33 per cent. tax, and a lot better than having to pay some of the tax rates that will be necessary if the Labour party ever comes to power, but those low-paid people are paying tax at a rate of 29 per cent.—a rate higher than the top rate of tax in the United States next year. Moreover, they must pay it at a starting point very much lower — at one of the lowest points in the Western world. They must pay 29 per cent. tax as soon as they start earning £2,300 a year. A person would not pay 29 per cent. tax in the United States at the moment unless he earned £17,000 a year.

It is not possible for the Conservative party to promise to increase the living standards of the low-paid, those on benefits who are being taxed, and the 40 per cent. of pensioners paying tax, except by reducing the burden of taxation upon them. Therefore, I have to say that I am disappointed that in the autumn statement we heard this afternoon we did not get any clearer idea of the scope that is available for those tax cuts for low-paid people in the Budget next year or of a medium-term taxation strategy for bringing down the basic rate of tax to well below its present level of 29 per cent., and indeed, for devising a much lower base rate for the low-paid in our society.

It should be obvious to everybody that such deep cuts in taxation will not be possible without substantial reductions in public expenditure. We must ask ourselves, after a series of autumn statements in which public expenditure has slightly increased from year to year, perhaps not as a proportion of GDP, why it has been so difficult for my right hon. and hon. Friends to achieve the reductions in public expenditure which they have honestly and earnestly sought.

There are three reasons why they have so far failed to make substantial reductions in public expenditure. The first is the public expenditure system itself. The system remains constructed, despite all our endeavours, on the basis of political entitlement rather than on the basis of pure economic and social need. We have only to look at the details in the Estimates to see the extent to which that political entitlement is reflected in over-provision in the Scottish and Northern Ireland blocks, in the dominance of defence procurement spending and in the sacrosanct nature of spending on agricultural support.

It is not simply the system that is at fault. We do not fully understand why the PESC survey and the Star Chamber do nothing to eliminate that political entitlement, but actually consolidate and perpetuate those entitlements by refining them and matching them, and eventually attempting to reconcile them.

Secondly, built into the public expenditure system is a massive proportion of expenditure on public sector pay, allowances and pensions. Some 60 per cent. of all public expenditure, nationally ordained and laid down, is somehow elusively outside the control of the Treasury and my right hon. Friends. It is controlled by agencies which stand between the Government and spending on the ground. It should be obvious now to everybody that there are only two courses to take: either we bring such public sector pay within the full control of the Government—as indeed we are proposing to do with teachers' pay—or we devolve it to local bodies which can effectively reflect the real economy in our regions and make the necessary adjustments.

The third reason why it has been so difficult to reduce public expenditure is the benefit system and the extent to which it is simply demand led. I am not suggesting that our benefits are too generous. They are open-ended, and they are non-motivating in that they help to perpetuate dependence on the Giro, but, nevertheless, the extent to which they can continue to upset our public expenditure reviews is well brought out in paragraph 22 of the autumn statement that we heard today. There can be no finer indictment of the difficulties that we face in trying to control public expenditure than the wording of paragraph 22.

In conclusion, I must tell my hon. Friends that, despite their best endeavours, it is clear that we have not yet been able to refine and reform the system to achieve the sorts of reductions that we need in public expenditure to finance the necessary and permanent cuts in personal taxation that are essential if all are to share in the enterprise and success of our economic policy.

8.15 pm

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): I find this a very depressing debate, as indeed I am sure most people find any debate on the economic situation. But I find it depressing for a different reason. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer was as good as he says he is, and if any future Chancellor of the Exchequer were to be as good as he thought he might be and together they were given a magic wand, and if I spoke in the debate on this subject in a year's time, I should be facing the same problems. If that magic wand worked, and if the analyses and strategies that we have heard here today were all correct, I should still be facing a structural problem which would leave the area where I live and which I represent at a disadvantage in comparison with the rest of the people represented in the House.

That structural disadvantage is that while we are part of Britain politically, we are not of Britain. We are an offshore island of an offshore island. We are given parity when it suits the Establishment here, and we are denied that parity when it may be of tremendous advantage to the people in the north of Ireland. For that reason, I must draw attention to Northern Ireland's unique position in that regard and address my remarks not just to the Government but to previous Governments and to future Governments. Our problems did not start with this Government; they started long before they took office and will continue for as long as that structural problem remains.

It is even more important to set the matter in the context of the whole of the north of Ireland. I shall resist the temptation to speak exclusively about my constituency. I do not claim to speak for the 1·5 million people in Northern Ireland, but I hope that I speak on their behalf. The region is suffering more than any other part of the United Kingdom under the jurisdiction of the House in economic, human and social terms. In my constituency alone one person in four people is unemployed. Thirty-two per cent. of public sector vacancies advertised are community programme vacancies, as opposed to 14 per cent. in the rest of Britain. That tells us something about that type of programme and the demand for it. Forty-four per cent. of the population are under 25, and almost 30 per cent. of them are out of work. In a politically volatile situation, that surely is a recipe for disaster. Sixty-six per cent. of the population who are employed are in public services. That gives some idea of the deficiency in other areas of employment. The most startling fact of all is that Northern Ireland is the only region in the EEC where more people are unemployed than are working in the manufacturing industries. That is frightening, and is worth thinking about.

A similar phenomenon is present in the wages structure, in that there is also a lack of parity. The wage rate for males in Northern Ireland is 89·9 per cent. of that in the rest of the United Kingdom. I agree with what has been said about the pittances for which young people work because they are not protected by wages councils. In Northern Ireland only 10 per cent. of young people have contracts of employment. They are being used, and that position will blow up. Unemployment now officially stands out 22·3 per cent. It is even more startling that 11,700 more people have become unemployed in the past 12 months. Of those, 50 per cent. have been out of work for more than a year.

When those statistics are added up, they reveal a human tragedy which suggests strongly that the position in Northern Ireland is unique and that it must be considered differently from the rest of the United Kingdom. I repeat that even if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a magic wand those problems would still have to be faced. Irrespective of a possible upturn in the economy, those deficiencies will remain.

The unemployment gap in Northern Ireland differs from that in the rest of the United Kingdom. During the past 12 months, male unemployment in Northern Ireland has risen by 9·8 per cent. My figures are taken from the annual report of the Northern Ireland Economic Council, which was published this week. That increase in male unemployment is startling compared with the increase for the same period in the rest of the United Kingdom. Again, that shows a disparity that is not made up through benefit or social security. That must be considered.

The construction industry is crucial to Northern Ireland, yet 2,500 jobs have been lost during the past year. If that loss of jobs is not halted now, half the jobs in the construction industry will have been lost by 1990.

The most serious position can be seen in agriculture. Northern Ireland has only two natural resources: people and grass. Agriculture is approaching a crisis, and many people would say that it has already reached it. The food processing industry is now almost non-existent in a country that produces beef, milk and a limited amount of cereals.

The Government should give their full support to the proposed EEC study of an integrated rural programme for Northern Ireland so that all the attendant problems in agriculture in Northern Ireland can be dealt with. They must be dealt with because Northern Ireland farmers now receive 48 per cent. below the 1984 farm income level. Farmers are receiving almost half what they received in 1984. Do not take my word for it. Take the word of the

[Mr. Seamus Mallon]

Northern Ireland Economic Council. The farm labour force has dropped by 2 per cent., which is understandable with such returns.

The Government have treated Northern Ireland farmers very unfairly over the milk levy system, because none of the special EEC allocation of an extra 4·5 per cent. quota in 1984 came to Northern Ireland. The small producer in Northern Ireland does not receive the same level of quota as the small producer in England, Scotland and Wales. The Government cannot have their cake and eat it. This Government, or any Government ruling Northern Ireland, cannot continue with this unfair system of parity when it suits them, but not when it does not suit.

I began with a reference to the report of the Northern Ireland Economic Council, and I shall also finish with one, as it contains some constructive suggestions. I turn, first, to the restoration of a housebuilding programme, with increases in new buildings and rehabilitation. Expenditure on new build in Northern Ireland is £60 million, while expenditure on refurbishing stock is £58 million. The difference between the money spent on rebuild and on refurbishing is £2 million. That tells us something.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is approaching the 10-minute limit.

Mr. Mallon: I shall not continue, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall leave it to hon. Members to analyse the position in Northern Ireland, and I hope that they will consider my suggestions.

8.25 pm

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): Today's debate has been somewhat overshadowed by the autumn statement, but I wish to spend some time talking about interest rates and why I think that Britain is suffering from a very high level of interest rates. I shall offer a perhaps somewhat unusual explanation.

The inter-bank rate in the United Kingdom is 11 per cent. Most borrowers have to pay interest of between 12 and 13 per cent. With inflation at 3 per cent. that implies a real interest rate of 10 per cent., which is obviously extremely high. When that is contrasted with interest rates of 4·5 per cent. in West Germany and in Japan, 6 per cent. in the United States, and 7·5 per cent. in France, we must ask why there are such high rates in the United Kingdom. Several reasons have been advanced for that, such as the United States' deficit and the exchange rate, but the reason that I offer has nothing to do with those factors. It is a largely domestic factor.

Let us consider interest rates as the price of money and accept that the price of any commodity is affected by the relationship between the demand for it and its supply. In the context of interest rates, one can think of the relationship between the demand for credit by borrowers and the supply of savings from the economy. If there are consistently double digit interest rates, one can draw the fair conclusion that demand for lending and for credit is excessive in relation to the supply of savings. One must ask why that should be. After all, one would expect the two things to make a fairly neat balance.

A fairly convincing explanation is the liberalisation of the banking system during the past 10 years or so, and the extraordinary way in which the banking and credit industries in this country, and in other countries, but especially in the United Kingdom, have arranged new ways of lending people money. There has been an enormous increase in credit cards, in mortgage lending by building societies, and now also by banks, much of which leaks into consumption. There has also been an enormous increase in hire purchase, personal loans, and all forms of credit. All these forms of lending money have expanded considerably.

It can never have been easier to borrow than it is now. That comes back to the banking system and the way in which it operates. It used to be a system for saying no. If one asked one's bank manager 20 years ago for a loan, the odds were that he would have said no. Now bank managers say "Do you not want more?" They are almost selling loans to people. Indeed, they are inventing ways of creating lending and of expanding their own activities. That makes perfectly good sense to them, but it results in the extraordinary boom in lending that has occurred. Perhaps one of the bad things about that boom is that the banks have concentrated on the personal and property sectors, at the expense of others.

Let us consider the lending offered by the big banks during the last five years. I shall pick one example, but it could well come from any of the big banks. The loan portfolio growth for the five years from 1981 to 1985 has risen by 33 per cent. in lending to manufacturing, 94 per cent. in lending to financial services and distribution, 120 per cent. in lending to construction businesses, 170 per cent. in lending to property companies and a staggering 215 per cent. in lending to individuals.

The reason for it is that the big borrowers — the personal sector and property companies — are not very sensitive to high interest rates. Banks can increase their lending to them, and they are willing to pay higher interest rates. Individuals are usually concerned about the amount of the monthly payment and whether they can meet it, and not about the theoretical interest rate. Someone involved in a relatively short-term property deal does not mind paying high interest rates for a short time. On the other hand, if a manufacturing company is making a long-term investment, the decision is very different.

I suggest that banks, by their own activities, have swelled the volume of lending by persuading people to borrow more money. They have done so above the rate at which the economy normally supplies savings. The banks have therefore had to raise interest rates to bid back from the economy the savings that they need for funding. The only way they have been able to obtain those savings is effectively by raising interest rates.

Technically, that is done on the inter-bank market, although it is not necessary to go into that. However, it is a fallacy to think that this procedure works in reverse and that the bankers are sitting in their offices waiting to see how much is taken in in deposits before deciding how much they can lend. I do not believe that that is what they do.

The consequences of what I am saying are illustrated if one compares what is happening here with what is happening in West Gemany. In West Germany, bank lending is increasing at about 5 per cent. a year and the interest rate is about 4·5 per cent. In the United Kingdom bank lending is growing at more than 16 per cent. a year and our interest rate is 11 per cent. That confirms my view that the expansion of bank lending and the activities of the banks have almost of themselves driven up interest rates. They are certainly a substantial factor.

While the people at whom the banks have targeted their lending are not sensitive to interest rates, important parts of the economy are, particularly manufacturing industry. If a manufacturing company is thinking of making a fairly long-term investment in new plant or a factory, borrowing money at 13 per cent. for five or 10 years is a fairly terrifying prospect. One would want to be sure of achieving returns of around 20 per cent. before being prepared to enter into that type of loan commitment. Very often it is decided that the risks simply do not justify the cost, and that has an effect on manufacturing investment. That is shown, not just in the manufacturing investment figures, but in the amount of big bank lending to manufacturing companies.

The bad consequence is not just that investment by industries that cannot afford such high interest rates is effectively discouraged. There are other consequences. High interest rates devalue current assets and encourage takeovers. It is often more profitable and easier to buy existing assets on a devalued basis than to invest in new plant and equipment. That leads to a short-term view of investment opportunities, for which the City is often criticised. If one can get 10 or 11 per cent. by leaving one's money in the bank or by lending it to the Government at virtually no risk, it is not surprising that investment managers take short-term views.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend accept that manufacturing investment has increased since 1983 by as much as 25 per cent.?

Mr. Maples: I do accept that, but the bank lending figures speak for themselves. Although I am glad that manufacturing investment has recovered over the last few years, it is still down on what it was before 1983.

One of the other consequences is that because the City and the financial markets look at credit expansion figures, that of itself is a weakening factor on the pound. The raising of interest rates to protect the pound is simply the treatment of a symptom. In my view the same credit expansion is causing both the weakness in the pound and the growth in interest rates.

We are also seeing a very dangerous level of lending to the personal sector, and one is now seeing increasing defaults on mortgages, credit card payments and hire purchases. Personal sector liability has risen from 50 to 85 per cent. of personal sector disposable income in the last five years, and that must be dangerous and worrying for credit and financial markets.

Perhaps the worst consequence is that most of this lending to the personal sector goes into consumption, particularly on imports. We have a peculiarly high propensity to import, and every month we seem to hear of record retail sales, record levels of manufactured imports and record levels of personal credit. I cannot help thinking that they go together.

If this is accepted as a cause of high interest rates and the things that flow from it, we must take some steps to restrain the growth of credit and these high levels of imports. We should try to channel some of this lending away from the personal sector and into productive investments in industry. The Bank of England and the Treasury have the power to achieve that end if they want to. If we do not do so, we shall continue to suffer high interest rates and their consequences for a very long time.

I hope that the Chancellor and his colleagues in the Treasury will give this some thought. It is not an original analysis. It has been suggested by other people. However, it is not commonly propagated, and it is worth some investigation and action. If we take intelligent action to restrain credit growth, we could end up with lower interest rates, a stronger pound, a reduced level of manufactured imports and all the other good consequences that would flow from that.

8.34 pm

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I hope that the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) will forgive me if I do not follow him at length, except to say that I welcome his comments about the effect of high interest rates, especially on manufacturing industry and job creation.

Like many of my hon. Friends, I am suspicious of economic indicators, and I am obliged to my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) for describing them as good luck charms. I am suspicious of economists as well.

Indeed, if the Chancellor looks at our historic development, he will see that the decline of the British economy is almost in direct relationship with the employment of economists in the public sector. Instead of indulging in the jargon to which my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Lamond) referred, it might be better if the Chancellor let rip his natural instincts and operated, not as an amateur economist, but as a transient secondhand car salesman. In that situation, Britain might well be better off than it is now. The right hon. Gentleman might not then have made his reference to another good year, which will be seen as a foolish comment by everyone living above a line from Watford to Bristol. If the Chancellor and his hon. Friends think that people in the industrial areas of the north believe that the last five or six years have been good, they are deluding themselves.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) referred to the unemployment figures. Today, the situation in our area is as bad as it is in the constituency of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon). Once relatively prosperous areas of Britain are now suffering the economic condition of Northern Ireland, bringing with it long-term ills, risks and perils for our communities. Does the Chancellor think that such communities can long withstand a situation in which the majority of their young people are unemployed? Does he consider that British industry can survive when, for example, the special steels industry in my constituency is competing against the French, who in direct aid provide between £4 and £5 a tonne, while the British Government are providing 56p per tonne? Can the record-breaking, highly successful and recently privatised special steels industry in my constituency compete when the Italian Government allow their steel industry to receive energy at 37 per cent. of the price that our people must pay for electricity for their electric arc furnaces?

It is no good the Chancellor talking about cheap nuclear power. That has nothing to do with it. The Governments in Italy, France, Germany and almost every other OECD country recognise that they cannot afford an arm's-length relationship with industry and that their own industries must survive — [HON. MEMBERS: "The Chancellor is not paying attention."] Of course not. The Government are paying no notice. They are happy to see the young people of Britain blighted and our manufacturing base destroyed.

[Mr. Peter Hardy]

After six years, it is time that the Government did something about that. In the last 12 months there have been tremendous improvements in productivity in the coal industry, yet the Government cannot even perceive the logic of that achievement. When the CEGB sites its two new power stations on the south coast, it will not be required to ensure the shipping orders to enable the coal to be brought from the Humber or the north-east to feed those power stations. The Government will not even urge the CEGB to apply the logic of the research and technology carried out in Yorkshire on pressurised fluidised bed combustion. They will continue to say that the technology is not proven, although the Americans ordered two last month. We are at a pretty pass. For the Government to rely on the jargon which my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, Central and Royton demonstrated to be stupid is no answer.

I ask the Government to consider the cost of unemployment and to recognise that for each young person in my constituency entering the youth training scheme there is a basic cost of £50 a week. If only we had spent half that money on sustaining British industry and preventing the disease which now affects us, instead of treating the symptoms, we would be a great deal better off.

In the past 12 months the deutschmark has gained 23·1 per cent. against the pound. We once made fun of the Italian economy. I wonder how the Italians see us now that the lire has improved 21·1 per cent against the pound. The franc has improved 17·6 per cent. against the pound. What is worse, those countries have not had the benefit and boon of offshore oil. There we have it. The Government have enjoyed the enormous benefit of offshore oil and have simply presided over the erosion of our industrial bases and the betrayal of areas such as mine.

8.40 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I congratulate the Government on their economic policies. During the past seven years the United Kingdom, through the Government's activities, has managed not only to survive the difficulties which were directly related to a period of appalling Labour government but to come through what can fairly be described as 40 years of terminal decline. The Government have provided the opportunity for the country to get back into contention with the rest of the world. That is a tribute to the quality of my right hon. Friends the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister. They have persevered with determination against the background of a serious world recession, such as was almost impossible to imagine in 1979 when they first came to power.

The speech of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) substituted adjectives for policies. I am sorry to say that that is becoming increasingly characteristic of his speeches. The difference between the realism with which the Chancellor put forward his arguments and the third-rate, tawdry approach adopted by the right hon. Gentleman was a salutary lesson.

At the end of the day much of the economic performance of other countries depends, and has depended for some time, on a number of important factors — savings, low inflation and investment. Against that background, the policies that we are pursuing are paying off with great dividends. On savings, we should look to the experience of Japan and the United States. One of the lessons that we had to learn was undoubtedly from the Japanese experience in the 1950s and the American experience in the 1920s. Tax-cutting policies provided substantial opportunities for their economies to take off and that enabled them to build substantial savings which in turn enabled them to invest in new industries.

In the early 1950s, Tashan Isabaki enabled the Japanese economy to take off and achieve the success that it has achieved over the past 30 years, despite the prognosis of the American adviser to the White House at the time that Japan was flat on its back with nowhere to go. The provision of incentives is the way to achieve enterprise in society. A main ingredient of the provision of incentives is to cut taxes, as the Chancellor and Prime Minister are proposing. That has great support from most of the British people, particularly from Conservative Members.

Manufacturing industry has increased by 25 per cent. since 1983, as I said in an intervention in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples). The importance of that is that, by providing the environment in which investment in manufacturing industry can increase, we are at the same time enabling our companies to engage in quality production. Over and over again we hear Opposition Members saying that we need to increase the volume of production. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said that today and the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) said the same recently. That is wrong. We do not need to increase the volume of production of goods which people do not want or need to buy, especially if the quality of the goods is not sufficiently high. In an intervention in the speech of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, I pointed out that one of our great difficulties is that our industries are not achieving a sufficiently high quality. There are many other factors involved, but that is an important one.

The gravitational pull of the argument of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook was that the Government were encouraging imports. The point is not that imports are being sucked in, but that the quality of goods from abroad is, regrettably, superior. We must take that point on board for the sake of the constituents of the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) and others. I lived in Sheffield for 20 years and saw the industries decline. I knew many of the managers and people who worked there and I have great sympathy for the predicament in which they find themselves.

The reality is that we cannot compete with imported goods unless the quality of our products is good enough to ensure both that we can export them to other countries which want them and that they can compete in design, quality, price and marketing with other countries' products. I challenge hon. Members to tell me that they have not bought a Seiko watch, a Japanese car or a Japanese television set. If they were honest about why they bought those goods, they would admit that it was because they believed that they were getting something worth having.

Mr. Barron: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Government should intervene in private industry, as the Japanese Goverment do, to ensure that products on the bench and in scientists' minds are brought into production? Or does he agree with the Government that the Government should leave that to the free market?

Mr. Cash: In Washington the situation is different. I have sympathy with the car workers at Longbridge, but as individuals they now have to compete with fellow car workers in Washington. It is a question of the quality of production.

We must take on board this essential ingredient in our economic strategy. We have lived through a period when economic decline seemed to be with us. It was directly attributable to nationalisation and to the dead hand of bureaucracy which goes with it. That is now being substituted by the semantic alchemy of social ownership, which is utterly meaningless. It is nothing more than a change in emphasis. Many moderate Opposition Members know that it is just a con and a fraud on the British people.

When Opposition Members are joined by the expected flood of militants in the new Parliament, the word "nationalisation" will reappear. All the vague semantic differences between social ownership and nationalisation will be back with us again. That will be the means by which this country goes back to the dark ages of the economy if the British electorate vote for them in sufficient numbers, which I doubt will happen.

8.50 pm

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): I am sorry that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not have the grace to give way when I sought to intervene this afternoon. I am glad that he is back in the Chamber, and I hope that I shall have the chance to allow him to intervene.

The point that I hope to make was made eloquently by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, who quoted a document which is well known to the Chancellor because he was the author of it. He was not just the signatory, he was the author and inspirer — one of the three musketeers. They consisted of himself, Sam Brittan and Peter Jay. All three have flown from their loyalty to the document. One disciple is left — young Tim Condon, who was Peter Jay's deputy at The Times, and who is still weeping bitter tears at the Chancellor's desertion from his former policy.

I remind the House of that policy. In the Financial Statement and Budget Report 1980-81, which laid out the shape of the medium-term financial strategy, the Chancellor said:

"Control of the money supply will over a period of years reduce the rate of inflation. The speed with which inflation falls will depend crucially on expectations both within the United Kingdom and overseas. It is to provide a firm basis for those expectations that the Government has announced its firm commitment to a progressive reduction in money supply growth . . . To maintain a progressive reduction in monetary growth in these circumstances it may be necessary to change policy in ways not reflected in the above projections. The Government would face a number of options for policy changes to achieve this aim, including changes in interest rates, taxes and public expenditure. But there would be no question of departing from the money supply policy, which is essential to the success of any anti-inflationary strategy."

The words "exchange rates" are not even mentioned in the text of the medium-term financial strategy. They began to creep in after two or three years and today the Chancellor explained that adjustments to the exchange rate due to the fall in the oil price have now taken place and it was now at a level which should be sustained. The strategy has been completely abandoned. Some new hon. Members do not remember just what it was that tied the Government down.

Just the other day the Governor of the Bank of England said in his lecture at Loughborough:

"Monetary targetry is only a means to an end. There may be circumstances in which the relationship between the intermediate target and the end objective changes unpredictably" that has happened in the relationship between money incomes and money supply—

"as has indeed been our experience during the 1980s. In that case if the marksman does not have the wit to adjust his aim he may inflict severe injury on the economy."

That is precisely what happened. The severe loss of competitiveness in Britain because of the rise in exchange rates between 1980 and 1982 resulted in a swathe of destruction of manufacturing industry — more than Hitler managed to destroy in the war. It was destroyed by the pigheadedness of the Chancellor. Today the economy rests in the hands of this pigheaded man.

Where have we got in terms of the conduct of monetary policy to stabilise the exchange rate? The major change is the switch from a money supply target to an exchange rate target. That is what the Chancellor has done, although he will not admit it. While he was pursuing a money supply target, he neglected the behaviour of other economies. It was a marvellous idea. He could forget about international economic co-operation. It did not matteer what the other guys did. We could get automatic stabilisers working correctly in our own economy by stabilising the growth in the money supply.

However, it takes two to make an exchange rate. Exchange rates are vulnerable to the movement of United States interest rates and to the United States deficit, to whatever happens to the Bundesbank, to interest rate policy and to intervention policy.

We have heard references to international economic co-operation at various meetings. The Chancellor has complained about the misbehaviour of the American economy in particular. That economy is far more successful than ours, under a man who is every bit as Right wing, but he is less mistaken technically and less pigheaded than those who have shaped our Government's economic policy.

The management of the more complicated exercise of trying to stabilise exchange rates must have an eye on the prime objectives — of unemployment and inflation. It must also keep an eye on the intermediate target of the exchange rate. That can become complicated with movement of interest rates elsewhere. It is natural that the Treasury should have now adopted methods of analysis which come under the generic label of policy optimisation on which in 1975, by way of an amendment to the Industry Act, I required the the Government to issue forecasts.It is as a result of the discharging of that statutory obligation that the Chancellor made his statement today.

Also in that amendment, for which the Chancellor voted, was a requirement on the Treasury to implement the methods of policy optimisation on the Treasury model. Under a Tory Government, that has been done, and the Chancellor has adopted the computer programmes of the research group that I established in 1971 at Imperial college. Those are a practical guide to the complex business of trying to stabilise the exchange rate where others are playing their own game in other countries. That now needs to be carried on to the international level.

[Dr. Jeremy Bray]

I suggested to the Chief Secretary that the Treasury should help to introduce such work in the design of international economic co-operation into the OECD, because that is now technically a much more sophisticated animal than the International Monetary Fund. The IMF is talking about taking over the OECD analytical system. The Chief Secretary fluffed it. He inquired at the wrong level in the OECD, and the opportunity for the United Kingdom Treasury to exercise some seminal influence on the development of methods in the OECD seems to have slipped.

Let us move from the broad macro-strategy to the control of public expenditure. I thought that the Chief Secretary was a person of some integrity, and I was astonished that he should have lent himself to that fraudulent act of examining speeches made by Labour Members, taking every little phrase, misinterpreting it and taking it out of context, leading to the absurd estimates of what effect Labour proposals will have on public expenditure. The Chief Secretary has shown himself in that office simply as the pawn of some scruffy little researcher in Conservative Central Office. That list has all the evidence of a Central Office hack job that Ministers are normally sensible enough to ignore completely. The Chief Secretary lent the weight of his office to a so-called costing of these policies, of which the Treasury officials who lent their hand to it should be thoroughly ashamed.

Again, to help us in the serious analysis of public expenditure questions, I made a further suggestion to the Chief Secretary, that the annual public expenditure White Paper should be presented to the House in such a way that we could genuinely examine alternative policies, so that if we wanted to argue for a change in the pupil-teacher ratio, or greater expenditure on the youth training scheme so that it could be made effective, or whatever, the effects could be traced through in all the interactions and ramifications within the expenditure of the different Departments involved. Again, the Chief Secretary fluffed it, and has presented to the House simply that document, which I agree is an improvement over what it was, but is still a totally inadequate basis for the serious costing of alternative policies.

The Government are not concerned about informing the House or the national debate on effective alternative policies. They are simply exposing themselves to the same hack attitude that the Conservative Central Office, under the chairmanship of the Tory party leader, is showing to the BBC.

There is then the effect on the micro-structure of the economy. Up to a point, we had an honest speech from the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Woodcock), who represents various areas around Stanlow, the Shell oil refinery, outlining the factors that have caused the 7,000 redundancies in his constituency. It is important for the Government to be able to follow the implications of the changes that they are making on the fortunes of the major companies and on a representative sample of the smaller companies, so that they can see, for example, when corporation tax provisions are changed, whether companies have any taxes that they are liable to pay against which they can offset allowances.

The person who pioneered that work in the United Kingdom was Dr. John Kay, who has just moved from the Institute of Fiscal Studies to director of the centre for business strategy at the London Business School. He led the way to the Treasury implementing a similar way of analysing the tax liabilities of companies. So anxious was the Chancellor for Dr. Kay's insights into the workings of the markets to play a part in the regulation of the stock exchange that he knocked Dr. Kay off the list of nominees of the Department of Trade and Industry to be on the Securities and Investments Board.

On the question of what should be done about companies, again the Treasury is moving. I have argued for years that our analysis of the economy is inadequate if we do not, and cannot, look at the position of individual factories, establishments and companies within our constituencies, where we know perfectly well what the real impact of Government policies will be, but which are a shut book to the Government, using simply aggregate statistics.

Again, we have an initiative, which I warmly welcome, financed by the Chancellor through the so-called consortium of the Treasury, the Bank of England and the Economic and Social Research Council to develop a micro-to-macro-economic model system. For example, a model might be constructed to take into account the behaviour of competing firms and the factors influencing individual management decisions on output, prices and factor demands.

I refer to the work done on the Swedish economy. Sweden has individually modelled enterprises, down to the production division level, of 80 per cent. of Swedish manufacturing industry. Therefore, it is able to trace what the effects of, say, the exchange rate shift would be on different firms. The Chancellor's PPS may smile. He comes from a city that has just been through an enormous big bang. The investment analysts are paying themselves fantastic sums of money. I am sure that he is not aware of the fact that the biggest market for company level analysis in responding to Government behaviour is the investment analysis market. That will be the market which the London Business School will supply under the consortium that I mentioned.

Arrayed on the Government Front and Back Benches is the old, incompetent guard of the pigheaded, highly privileged but incompetent tradition within business, banking and finance in the Tory party. While those are the intellectual influences that prevail, and while that is the level of complete incompetence of which the Chancellor is aware—nobody knows better his changes of position—there is no hope for the economy. The dishonesty, as well as the incompetence, of the Government, will see them out of office.

9.6 pm

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): Notwithstanding the tragic problem of unemployment in my home city of Nottingham, I am more than content to support the amendment in the name of the Government and to reject the Opposition motion. Many contributions have been in the customary macro-economics of debates of this kind. I join with the comments of one of my colleagues, my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Woodcock), who made an excellent speech. He related this debate to his constituency and outlined how events in his constituency had led him to support the Government's policy.

In Nottingham, 23,500 people are unemployed. That is a great personal tragedy to thousands of families. A Labour party pamphlet that has been circulated in that city has the same disregard for the truth as most of the speeches that we have heard from the Labour Benches. For example, the pamphlet talks of seven disastrous years and says that our city has 14,000 more unemployed than it had in 1979. I cannot deny that. It is a fact. However, the pamphlet slips up because it points out that there have been 30,000 job losses in the city during the past seven years. Perhaps the Chancellor, with his great knowledge of mathematics, will confirm my calculation that that means that we have created 16,000 jobs in the same period.

I draw the House's attention to the reasons that the Labour party gives for unemployment and the companies that it lists that are shedding jobs. Two companies appear to account for half the number—TI Raleigh, which has shed just under 6,000 jobs in that seven-year period, and Players, which has shed just under 2,000. It is being suggested that that is the result of Government policy, and I accept that it is in one small respect. My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who was a Minister in the Department of Trade and Industry, will be well aware that one of the results of regional grant aid was to shift quite a few hundred jobs from TI Raleigh in Nottingham to South Wales. I am delighted that we have reformed our regional policy since then. Far too much money was spent merely shifting jobs from one area of the country to another.

The real loss of jobs at Raleigh has nothing to do with Government policy. Nottingham is the proud home of a vast university as well as a vast technical college and polytechnic, which means that if it were in another country the city would be full of cyclists, yet we hardly ever see them. Our young people, unemployed or not, drive bangers or ride motor cycles. My son has a banger, and he will not thank me for calling it that because it is his pride and joy. There has been a massive decline in the home market of the cycle industry because many people no longer ride bicycles, and there is no point in blaming the Government for that. If there are no customers for cycles, cycles will not sell.

The other company that is referred to in the pamphlet is John Player. As I have said, the pamphlet is seeking to blame the Government for the loss of 2,000 jobs in the tobacco industry. There is great dishonesty on both sides of the House in the debate about smoking. Everyone complains about the habit, but when smoking declines it is the height of hypocrisy to publish a leaflet that claims that Government policy has destroyed 2,000 jobs in Nottingham.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I shall try to bring the hon. Gentleman down to earth. What would he advise the 42 per cent. of all those under 24 years of age in my constituency to do? The males would have gone normally into the mining industry but that is no longer possible, and there are no other opportunities and no Government aid to assist employment in the area. They have no bangers or motor cycles.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I cannot speak for the hon. Gentleman's constituency. He represents a mining constituency, and I think that the entire House sympathises with the towns and cities throughout the length and breadth of the country that relied on one industry. When that industry has to die there is a social problem, and nobody will argue on that ground. The single-industry town is our nation's tragedy and there are no quick fix-it answers to the problem.

Another company is referred to in the pamphlet and the job losses in it are not, as claimed, the result of Government policy. The company is in the textile sector, and as I spent about 30 years in that industry, courtesy requires me not to name it. I do not wish to intrude on private grief. It is sufficient to say that the group in which I was engaged — I was proud to be one of its chief executives — employs more people now than in 1979, even if the group that is named in the pamphlet has shed 3,000 employees.

No one denies that there has been a decline in the textile industry, but I take this opportunity to thank my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench for the work that they have done. They listened honestly to representations by hon. Members on both sides of the House on the multi-fibre arrangement. The author of the pamphlet is supposed to be on our side in fighting for a good multi-fibre arrangement, but when the county council in the area which I represent, which is Labour-controlled, organised a local conference to enable us to put our case together prior to putting it before Ministers, he began to criticise the British retail trade. In particular, because he happens to be one of the far-Left politicians, the author chose to criticise one of our most successful high street chains, Marks and Spencer plc. Somebody should have told that prospective Labour party candidate that, but for companies such as Marks and Spencer, there would not be a textile trade in this country. Job losses would have been 10 times worse. [Interruption.] Labour Members can rattle on, I do not mind.

The pamphlet went on to state, in the same dishonest vein as members of the Opposition Front Bench adopt, that, somehow or other, unemployment can be cured in the lifetime of a Parliament. The leaflet sets out a scheme to create 5,000 jobs in each of the five years' duration of a Labour government. Lo and behold, there will be nil unemployment in the city of Nottingham. It is utterly dishonest. Fortunately, the author of the pamphlet knows as much about the city of Nottingham as Arthur Scargill did. The people of Nottinghamshire told Arthur Scargill where to go when he tried that stupid business two years ago. I thank my right hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench. I would thank them much longer, but I have only a couple of minutes in which to conclude my remarks.

Hon. Members on the Government Front Bench have targeted real help to cities such as Nottingham. One of the Government's great unsung successes has been urban development grants. This week, I was grateful for yet another grant to our city. In the past three or four years, about £4·5 million of public money has produced investment of some £25·5 million in Nottingham. That policy is one of the great successes. Nationally, though it is decried by Labour Members, £100 million of public money has produced well over £400 million of private investment.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend acknowledge that, at the end of this debate, when the Opposition have apparently attempted to censure the Government on their economic strategy, the Chamber is almost devoid of Opposition Members, including the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who led the debate for the Opposition. Does my hon. Friend also acknowledge that this has been one of the most tawdry exhibitions by the Opposition that we have witnessed in this Parliament?

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: That is a fair point. [Interruption.] May I conclude? That is the arrangement that was made, if that is what the Opposition Front Bench is getting so uptight about. I ask the Government Front Bench to hang on tightly to the basic policy of restraining inflation. Nothing destroys confidence, savings and jobs more than runaway inflation. My great worry is that, in a city such as Nottingham, there are thousands of young people who have no real memory of the monster of runaway inflation that so characterised the Labour Government's term of office. Heaven help us if Labour Members have a chance to do that again.

9.15 pm

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): At the outset, I wish to direct a very serious matter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. During his introduction of the autumn statement, he informed the House that the information about it would not be available to hon. Members or, presumably, to anyone else until he sat down. He sat down at approximately 10 minutes to four. At about five o'clock he discovered a Conservative research department brief, marked "confidential" in a telephone booth in the House. That document contained all the details of the statement, but came from the Conservative party office. Clearly, that is a serious matter. Obviously, the Chancellor would wish to address his mind to it, particularly as the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is also the chairman of the parliamentary party and sits in the Cabinet. Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer assure us that this information was not available confidentially to the Tory party central office so that it could make notes on the statement? I am quite prepared to give way to the Chancellor.

Mr. Lawson: I can give that assurance.

Mr. Prescott: Do I understand the Chancellor to say that he gives the assurance that it was not given to the central office before 10 minutes to 4 o'clock? If that is the case, I must say to him that the detail of the six or seven pages of his statement would have had to be printed, produced and brought to the House, all within one hour.

Mr. Lawson: I will happily double check. I shall explain the procedure that we use. That document was produced by my special advisers in the Treasury. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] The top page was stapled on later. It was not done by Conservative Central Office.

Mr. Prescott: I do not find the Chancellor's answer satisfactory. I now give him notice that I should like him to reflect on the answer he has given to the House. At the end of the debate and after the House has met, we could consider through the normal channels whether the right hon. Gentleman wants to think further and give the House a more informed reply.

Undoubtedly, the debate has shown us that the exchange between the two sides of the House and the nature of the autumn statement have dominated the Opposition's motion on the economy and employment. Perhaps that was inevitable, but it has been clear that, apart from the Government Front Bench and one or two other Conservative Members, most hon. Members have been highly critical of the performance of the economy after seven years of this Government. Having listened to the speeches, one would have thought that Labour went out of office 12 months ago and we were still being blamed for all the problems in the economy, or that it was the Labour party that paid for the advertisement that said that Labour was not working, when unemployment was just over 1 million.

The debate has flowed between both sides of the Chamber. It has shown that the level of investment, particularly in manufacturing, is still below the 1979 level. There is a crisis in the balance of payments and a trade deficit in manufacturing. Exports may be increasing, but imports are increasing much faster. Even much of the evidence on interest rates — we already know that we have record interest rates compared with other economies — and the Chancellor's facts on inflation had been somewhat tampered with, inflation being taken as an average for the rest of Europe and the averages during the terms of the Labour Government and the Tory Government being compared.

We have seen a great deal of manipulation of statistics and even a picking of years. Unusually, the Chancellor chose 1973 as the base year. Most of the evidence given for the revival in the British economy, according to the Chancellor, is taken from before 1981 or 1982, as though the Conservative party did not come to power until then.

One particular aspect missing from the autumn statement was a projection of what would happen with employment. There is a debate about unemployment. Few Conservative Members, with honourable exceptions, mentioned the problem of unemployment. A great deal of play was made of inflation, but the consequences of the mass unemployment which we have seen develop after seven years of Tory Government rule are clear for everyone to see, no matter how the figures are dressed up.

The Opposition are grateful for one factor in the speech — the Government claim that the levels of public expenditure now are higher than they were under the Labour Government. The intention is to raise the contingency reserves, to use other resources, such as those obtained from privatisation, to increase the levels of public expenditure. Those wasteful bodies, as the Chancellor and other Ministers regard them—the local authorities—will be used to spend the money. Those are precisely the sort of methods that the Labour party has argued should be used to get our people back to work. This very much reflects the evidence—it had to be dragged out by way of a leaked document—given by the Government to the European Commission when they were pleading for more money to deal with the collapse of aspects of the infrastructure — the decline in our inner cities and the stagnation of our housing programmes. All those items are spelt out in the documents given to the Commission because the Government were seeking money. They are precisely the type of public investment projects that the Labour party believes can be used to get people back to work.

I was somewhat surprised to hear almost cheers from the Conservative side when the Chancellor claimed how good the Government were at using public expenditure. Although we may argue that the expenditure is not large enough—there will be differences between us—we would be churlish not to welcome the fact that public expenditure, in certain areas, will be used to considerable effect in providing real jobs.

When the Chancellor was pressed for his predictions on unemployment he could not answer. He discussed whether unemployment might reach 3·2 million. The document that was given to the Commission suggested that by 1990 it would still be about 3·2 million. That is before the Government get to work on a further fiddle—the 18th—of the unemployment figures. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster may well regret his statement that the Tory party should not be re-elected if unemployment is not below 3 million. I suspect that more and more pressure is being applied for an increase in public expenditure, to chase more and more people from the employment exchanges, to create more and more low-pay schemes and more part-time and self-employed jobs in order to doctor the figures in an attempt to massage them down below 3 million.

We heard the arguments about the real levels of unemployment and of employment. The Government said that they have created a million jobs — indeed, that figure is in the amendment to our motion. The Chancellor is well aware that that 1 million is made up of over 823,000 self-employed. The level of self employment has increased by 823,000 during the Conservatives' term of office. That increase is largely due to a statistical exercise. The Chancellor is aware that the figures were based on a 5 per cent. survey and they have been constantly rejigged. That has caused concern among statisticians as to whether one can prove the claimed increase in new jobs. That is the least of the Government's statistical offences.

It is true that more part-time work has been created, and, indeed, it is the Government's policy to encourage that. If one wanted a fair measure of an increase in employment one must consider the 142,000 extra people in work when Labour left office compared to when it took office, and the fact that almost 1·5 million more people are unemployed now compared to 1979. I do not deny that there will be more and more part-time and flexible working within the economy, but one must judge that in terms of full-time equivalents. It is a crude measure, but it has been used by the Bank of England. I asked the Library to compare the period when Labour was in power—1974 to 1979 — with the period of this Administration. Between 1974 and 1979 the increase in full-time equivalents was 93,000. My hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) suggested that, under this Government, 1 million full-time equivalent jobs had been lost to the employment market. The Library's calculations show that that loss is 1,936,000.

That is the scale of the decline in employment prospects since 1979. However it is measured, it is a catastrophic decline. When Britain's unemployment is compared with that of any of our competitors, using the OECD average, the EEC average or the figures I have here from a very authentic source, we find the same story. The British average is 13·3 per cent.; the EEC average is approaching 10·8 per cent.; and the OECD average is 8·1 per cent.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John MacGregor): What is the source?

Mr. Prescott: My source is the private and confidential document given to Lord Young to brief him on the unemployment figures. We presume that that document is acceptable.

In reality, whether in percentage or absolute terms, the Government's policies have had a catastrophic effect on employment, and are a direct cause of the high level of unemployment. Perhaps, as suggested in the debate, the Government will switch from a monetarist policy. I believe that they will.

It is important to compare what has happened to Britain's patterns of public expenditure with those of our main competitors in Europe. They increased their public expenditure, as did Britain, but they put less into defence and more into housing and infrastructure — the very things that the Chancellor complained about in his evidence to the Commission when he was asking for money. One of the essential differences between us and our European competitors is when it comes to managing the economy. It concerns the quality and the type of public expenditure.

It is a bit much for the Chancellor to suggest that the Opposition exploit the unemployed when his party gave us "Labour isn't working." More important than that, the Government have conducted 17 fiddles of the unemployment figures. Their latest pernicious activity is the suggestion that the unemployed should be subjected to an interrogation about whether they are working.

The Government are suggesting that those who suspend people's unemployment benefit if they fail a questionnaire should become bounty hunters and be paid according to how many people they suspend from the employment benefit. That is shown by another Government document. The evidence has been debated in the House. That demonstrates the Government's pernicious approach to the unemployed.

The Government's policy is to drive people off the employment exchange and not to provide them with work. When the Government say that the Opposition exploit the unemployed, I must remind them of a notice that we received in our post this morning. The Government create part-time employment and talk of successful business and of removing the barriers to business. The right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) said that the burden of costs on business should be relieved. He mentioned electricity costs, but the Government talk about reducing health and safety protection and removing employment protection rights.

The Equal Opportunities Commission told us today that anybody who appeals against unfair dismissal will now have to pay a £25 tribunal fee to have a complaint heard. That £25 fee will presumably be taken from a single householder who gets £30 a week benefit, supposing that it has not been suspended. That is the kind of priority that the Government give to the unemployed and people in part-time and other forms of employment about which we have heard today.

Hearing the right hon. Member for Taunton speak of reducing costs reminded me of the Chancellor saying that the Government had managed to secure increased revenue from corporation tax. The reason is, presumably, that corporation tax has increased by about 25 per cent. since the Government came to power. It involves many thousands of millions of pounds made by companies.

The prevailing wisdom is that companies will invest. We know that they have often not invested in machinery but, more to the point, they have not put their money into training either. We have the worst trained labour force of any developed country, yet companies put only one fifteenth of 1 per cent. of turnover into training. According to the Manpower Services Commission, most of our competitors put between 2 and 3 per cent. of turnover into training.

Mr. Lawson: I have said that.

Mr. Prescott: The Chancellor should remember that he has relieved companies of the training levy, dismantled several of the industrial training boards and witnessed a collapse in the number of apprenticeships. If British companies invested only 1 per cent. of turnover on training, that would raise between £6 billion and £8 billion. The taxpayer would then not have to find the £2 billion now needed for the skivvy youth training and community programme schemes.

The Chancellor asked me how much Labour's programme would cost. The Chief Secretary to the Treasury has made some scandalous charges. He should be thrown out of accountancy in view of what he said about the costing of Labour's programme. The Chief Secretary has trawled through various speeches and documents, some of them quite wrong, and discovered, apparently, that our training programme would cost £900 million. Let me tell him, the analysis was incorrect. More importantly, why should we not impose a levy on industry to pay for training? Previous Tory Governments used to believe in levies because industry would not invest in training. Do not be surprised, industry will pay for training as our competitors and many industries abroad already do. We are short of every kind of skill in this country and we have to make a rapid and radical change in our training programme. There is no doubt about that. We know that it costs money. Industry is not paying anywhere near its fair share, even on the Chancellor's own evidence.

Many of the 26 proposals mentioned in the document are wrong. The Chief Secretary has already admitted that perhaps on education he was wrong. He quotes speeches and documents. The Labour party will put through its commitments in the manifesto when we decide them in the normal way. I shall give the House some examples. The Chief Secretary said that there is a commitment to a 35-hour week. That is not a commitment anywhere in our document, although we might like to move towards it. The Chief Secretary gives us a bill of £3,000 million for that. He also mentions early retirement at 60. That is something that the Government have regrettably changed. He gives us a bill of £2,600 million, but that is not a commitment. We also have no commitment as to precisely what the minimum wage would be. There is a commitment to a minimum wage but one cannot possibly estimate the cost without knowing what that wage will be. Yet the Chief Secretary tells us that it will cost £1,000 million. Therefore, there is a total bill of £6,600 million and no commitments. It is a charade. The Chief Secretary should answer those questions.

If the Chief Secretary looks at our document he will also see that money should be made available for housing. We are witnessing the building of 2,000 houses fewer per week than we did under a Labour Government. That is one indictment of the Government. The local authorities have the money—£6 billion in capital receipts—and there are 500,000 building workers unemployed. My constituency has worked out a programme for 1,000 houses at a cost of £66 million a year. That would provide 4,000 jobs and good training. I can give the House many public expenditure examples where the Chief Secretary calls for the money from the EEC.

We are working extremely hard to see where the extra jobs will come from, whether in nationalised industries, local authorities or the private or public sectors. Yes, they can do much more to provide jobs and they will, make no mistake about it.

There is one carefully costed document that I would like to give the Chief Secretary. It has been worked out in detail with the financial people and spells out precisely what the jobs are and where they will come from. It is an inner-city authority with a massive housing problem and is in massive decline, which is recognised by the Government in their inner-city partnership schemes. That authority is Southwark. It has produced a plan which shows precisely where the jobs will come from. There will be 5,800 jobs, 25 per cent. of them in housing and about 20 per cent. in social services. I notice that many of the jobs provided in social services are to deal with the problem created by the Government when they kicked people from mental hospitals in the name of community care and dumped them on local authorities without providing the resources for the authorities to deal with that.

I hear the Government talking about £4·5 billion they are giving local authorities to assist them in their expansion programmes. Local authorities have lost over £20 billion in the reduction in the rate support grant. That is why we have seen a reduction in jobs and services. We must be prepared to look at the needs of our inner cities, the needs of our services, the need to build houses and the need to train. Many of our local authorities, which have been doing a valiant task trying to create jobs and improve services, could provide a considerable amount of the jobs we are talking about.

I shall let the Chancellor into a secret. A proportion of the 1 million job target that we have set to achieve over the two-year period will almost certainly come from local authorities. I have three projects before me now; Lancashire enterprise body, Southwark and the Hull corporation. We could certainly put together 10,000 jobs there if he is prepared to take those targets now. We can do that if the resources are available. Local authorities are engines of growth. They are important in the development of our economy.

It is all very well for the Chancellor to smile but his proposals today hope to use the local authorities in the spirit of election because they learned a lesson. In 1983, the only time when the figures showed a flip upwards in reducing unemployment, the Chancellor told local authorities to spend, spend, spend public money because he wanted to reduce unemployment before the general election. The Chancellor has done the same today. No doubt the Budget statement in March will add to the tax cuts in today's proposals.

The Opposition believe that local authorities and nationalised industries can play a role in keeping real jobs, with real money, meeting real need. We shall provide the alternative to the skivvy community programme and YTS schemes which the Government have used to reduce the figures. We shall provide real jobs and real money to meet real need.

9.40 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John MacGregor): One of the penalties of trying to allow everyone to speak in the debate and therefore having only short wind-ups is that I cannot, alas, refer to as many contributions as I would have liked.

All of us recognise—and no one would claim to the contrary — that, despite the improvement in the economy, there are still, and always will be, enormous challenges even to sustain our present standards of living, given the highly competitive world in which we live, and to keep our industries constantly competitive, changing and flexible. There are also enormous challenges to deal with unemployment.

The contributions from Opposition Members showed that they were living in the past. They fail to recognise the highly competitive world in which we live. They fail to recognise how things change. They seem to believe that past habits, structures and types of industry can go on for ever. They would do well to heed the contributions of my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Woodcock) and for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) who made pertinent comments on that point. Opposition Members also fail to recognise the considerable progress of the past five or six years, which must be the background to this year's spending plans.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think you will have been told that there is considerable concern on the Opposition Benches about a document which has been produced by Conservative and Unionist central office, which contains considerable details about the public expenditure statement.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that this matter has already been raised and that it may be raised again later.

Mr. Madden: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Surely the Leader of the House should make a statement about who produced the document, when it was circulated, and to whom. Will we receive some information about this, as clearly the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is very reluctant to reveal details of the party political activities of senior Treasury officials?

Mr. Speaker: I must tell the hon. Gentleman that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury has been on his feet for only two minutes. I have had an intimation that this matter may be raised as a point of order later. I think that we should leave it at that.

Mr. MacGregor: That intervention has taken two minutes of my time. For the hon. Gentleman to raise that point in a debate about employment, jobs, and the Government's programme shows how serious he is about these matters. If that is all that the hon. Gentleman can do —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The debate has proceeded in good order until now. I ask the House to give a fair hearing to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury.

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, as I should like to deal with the debate and the Government's expenditure programmes, which are extremely important.

The background is that we are now into our sixth successive year of economic growth at an average so far of nearly 3 per cent. per annum. That is the longest period of uninterrupted growth since 1973. The volume of total fixed investments, to which many hon. Members have referred, is at an all-time high and manufacturing investment—and we heard so much about manufacturing investment from the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley)—is up 31 per cent. since the last election. Company profitability is the highest for more than 20 years—almost three times the 1975 level.

Mr. Hattersley rose——

Mr. MacGregor: This is the last time that I shall give way.

Mr. Hattersley: I am concerned about the right hon. Gentleman's selective use of figures. He said that manufacturing investment had risen since the election. Will he tell us its relationship with the election when his party became the Government in 1979?

Mr. MacGregor: The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that there was a deep worldwide recession after 1979, but what actually matters is the progress since then. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would welcome the fact that manufacturing investment is up by 31 per cent. Export volumes—non-oil—rose by 2·5 per cent. in the third quarter of 1986 to an all-time high. It is worth pointing out that there has been no previous five-year period in recent history over which manufacturing has so successfully held its world market share.

Recently, inflation has been at the lowest level for almost 20 years. The lowest on-year inflation rate recorded by the previous Labour Government was higher than any inflation rate since the election. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook suggested that inflation was the only successful indicator of the Government. As I have demonstrated, it is not. But how wrong he would be to downgrade the importance of inflation, as his Government did. It is on the way to a level that is well below any level that the previous Labour Government ever achieved in one year. I tell the right hon. Gentleman that the battle could so easily be lost again, at such damage to our economy and international competitiveness, as it would be under Labour policies.

That is why today the Chancellor put such emphasis on the fact that there would be no relaxation of our fiscal stance in the medium-term financial strategy published at the time of the Budget. It is vital, underpinning all that we set out in our programmes today. As my right hon. Friend said, there can be no question of allowing the projected increases in public expenditure over the next two years to undermine the prudence of the Government's overall fiscal stance.

Equally vital is the continuation of our objective to reduce public expenditure as a proportion of gross national product, which we have succeeded in doing over past years and in the programmes now before the House. The success of the economic strategy, reflected in inflation at levels not seen for almost two decades, and economic growth averaging nearly 3 per cent. for six successive years —that prudent management of the economy—enables us to make further increases in priority services. [Interruption.] I want to say a word about them. This debate is about our public expenditure programmes as well. The first point that I should like to make is this. Over the past few years, when we have been succeeding in getting public expenditure down as a proportion of GDP —[Interruption.]—we have also succeeded——

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is impossible for us to hear the debate. Only 30 members of the Labour party are present for this important debate, and they are shouting and buffooning —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to hear what the Chief Secretary has to say.

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker.

Dr. Bray: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: I shall not give way now. I have only a short time left.

As I was saying, over the entire period we have been increasing public expenditure in key priority areas. I now want to say a word about how we are doing it in the plans announced today. We have made a major increase in the current three-year plans in provision for education, for both schools and higher education. The universities are being offered substantial increases in funding in return for their agreement to an approach that embraces a greater emphasis on quality in teaching standards, improved financial management, greater selectivity and some rationalisation. We are providing more for local authorities' capital and current spending on schools.

Funds have also been made available for the city technology college initiative announced recently by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. We have made provision to cover the full costs of the offer on teachers' pay that he announced to the House last week. As he made clear, that offer is tied to terms and conditions of service for the teaching profession which mean that teachers would have enforceable contracts of employment which would specify their professional duties. We believe that that is a fair, reasonable and generous deal for the taxpayer and the ratepayer who will have to find the money and for the teachers.

In the three-year plans, education features most prominently, which demonstrates the Government's commitment to give the education service the resources that it needs. That is what we have been doing throughout, because the amount of education spending per pupil has increased considerably in real terms over recent years.

Let me deal with the next priority area. Our plans provide for a 2·2 per cent. real increase in expenditure on the hospital service next year. That will enable the Health Service to respond to growing needs and an increasing number of patients, with improving services. In addition, the hospital service will retain the full benefit of increasing resources being released through the cost improvement programme.

I have often noticed how little attention the Opposition give to value for money in terms of the use of the taxpayers' pounds. That programme has already achieved £390 million of cumulative savings since 1981-82, plus other improvements in efficiency. In the current year we expect a further £150 million in savings and we expect those savings to continue to accumulate throughout the survey period.

The result is that there are now 75,000 more front-line staff in the Health Service—17 per cent. more than in 1978. As a result of the survey decisions, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has also been able to announce further major initiatives in the Health Service. Capital expenditure on the hospital building programme by the NHS rose by 31 per cent. in real terms between 1978-79 and 1985-86. No wonder the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) does not want to know. That is in contrast to the 31 per cent. reduction under the Labour Government.

As my right hon. Friend has announced, over the next three years more than 100 Health Service building schemes, with an estimated value of nearly £700 million, are due to be completed. The total capital programme for the hospital and community health service will increase from about £1 billion this year to £1·2 billion by 1989-90. Health authorities will also retain in full receipts from sales of surplus land and buildings. What a contrast that hospital building programme is with the previous Labour Government's programme.

The same applies to the road programme, which has increased substantially in real terms, and to which we are giving further additional resources this year. Under the previous Labour Government the road programme was slashed in real terms.

We are also planning increased capital investment in housing. We have increased the provision in 1987-88 to honour the commitment given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin) in 1984 to local authorities that we would guarantee them 80 per cent. of the 1985-86 allocations. In addition, substantially higher capital receipts from the highly successful programme of the sale of council houses are now forecast throughout the survey period, which will enable greater investment in housing and will allow carefully targeted increases to be made in gross spending on some vital programmes at relatively low cost to the Exchequer. We are targeting additional provision for the renovation of the housing stock through the urban housing renewal unit and are providing for the Housing Corporation to start on private finance schemes to provide additional low-cost housing.

We are also maintaining the priority that we have given throughout our years—an increase of 39 per cent. in real terms—to all issues dealing with law and order; to the police, the prison building programme and in many other ways; for example, in tackling the drugs issue.

Those are particular priorities on top of the priorities which were given to the employment programmes in the Chancellor's Budget, which increased our employment measures by £300 million next year and the year after. I was extremely distressed to hear the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) describe them as "skivvy schemes". The youth training scheme, the community programme and many others are doing beneficial work throughout the community. We are spending about £3,000 million this year on such employment and training measures. It is typical of the hon. Gentleman to say that we are not spending money on employment and then to describe those massive sums as "skivvy schemes".

I wanted to cover many issues where we have achieved much greater value for money for the taxpayer through many measures that we have taken in efficiency scrutinies, competitive tendering, purchasing initiatives and in many other ways. All I can say is that I know that those are always criticised by the Opposition. They do not understand the concept of value for money. They do not understand why we are getting much more in output from our public expenditure programmes than has been achieved before.

Equally, I dismiss the idea that we have been neglecting capital investment. Infrastructure spending is likely to be up by about £1 billion next year on the previous figure of £20 billion. As a result, there are many examples all over the country of very significant capital expenditure programmes. Tonight, alas, I do not have time to deal with them, but I shall do so on another occasion.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East referred to some of the Opposition's employment measures. It was interesting that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook stressed that in all future debates he would concentrate on the Government's policies. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) pointed out, that is no surprise. The right hon. Gentleman wants to avoid people focusing on his policies. It is no wonder that he got such a cheer from behind him. The probing of Labour's policies causes them as much embarrassment as it causes him, but he will not get away with it. It is right that the country should know, just as the national and international business and financial community already knows, just what disarray his policies are in, and what damage they would do to all the things that he spoke about today.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East gave us some idea of which programmes would be dropped from those which I costed in that £28 billion.

Mr. Prescott: We have not decided.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman said that he was committed to a minimum wage. Does he still stick to the policies outlined at a recent Labour party conference, which involved the minimum being two thirds of average wages? We would all like to know the answer. Will the hon. Gentleman say which pledges he intends to drop?

Opposition Members have argued that their so-called poverty programme of £3·6 billion will be covered by taxing the very rich, or top 5 per cent., but that would do considerable damage to many people who will be most surprised to discover that they fall into the category of the very rich. It will also do considerable damage to the economy as a whole and to the wealth creators.

In addition, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East claims that a Labour Government would borrow an additional £6 billion on top of what we are doing in terms of job creation programmes. I have looked at the Southwark programme mentioned by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East. He said, interestingly enough, that it would form the sort of basis for the local authority programmes that he hopes to encourage—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman is certainly moving away from what he said in The Guardian. I have read about the Southwark blueprint, but such a programme would mean that the Labour party was claiming to achieve an additional 1 million jobs in two years.

Mr. Prescott: I did not say that. Just in case the Chief Secretary starts on another false trail, I should point out that I said that jobs would come from local authorities, nationalised industries and other industries. We have already begun discussing with local authorities the sorts of plans that we have in mind. That was one discussion yesterday. This is what I said and meant.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman will know that to achieve 1 million jobs over two years—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman does not want to hear, but achieving that over two years would cost another £20 billion. Moreover, it would lead to higher rates for existing businesses, which would destroy jobs. During the next year or so we shall probe just to discover what is the basis of that programme.

We have produced public expenditure plans based on prudent management of the economy which enable us to increase resources in key priority areas. The Labour party's programmes would do enormous damage to jobs, investment and inflation, and that is why we reject the motion.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 33 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

Mr. Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House congratulates Her Majesty's Government on the success of its economic policies, which have brought inflation down to its lowest levels for two decades, combined with sustained economic growth, a million new jobs created since 1983, steadily rising living standards, and record levels of investment.

10.14 pm

Mr. Hattersley: Earlier this evening my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) raised a point which affects the rights of hon. Members. I now raise it with you, Mr. Speaker, and, through you, the Leader of the House on a point of order.

When the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his autumn statement, he told the House that details of the statement would be available to hon. Members when he sat down. He did so at approximately 3·50 pm. Shortly after 5 pm — say, 70 minutes after he sat down — a printed document was found in a telephone booth. The document contained detailed information of the Chancellor's autumn statement and a detailed analysis of that statement. It could not have been produced and printed in one hour and 10 minutes.

When my hon. Friend raised the matter in the debate, the Chancellor, much to my hon. Friend's surprise and mine, rose to give an explanation. He said that the information had been prepared in advance of its being made available to hon. Members, and that it had been prepared by special advisers in the Treasury. I confess that it is not clear to me whether the special advisers were on the Conservative party payroll, who should not have seen the information, or whether they were on the public payroll and should not have been working for the Conservative party. However, what is clear, on the Chancellor's admission, is that before hon. Members received the information a digest was prepared for circulation to Conservative Members and for printing in Conservative Central Office. The Chancellor made that clear in your absence one hour ago, Mr. Speaker.

Clearly the matter affects the rights of every hon. Member. Many of us would regard it as abuse of the information which is at the Chancellor's disposal, not as a party politician but as a Minister. I do not expect the Leader of the House to make a statement on the subject tonight, for I have no doubt that, to protect the rights of hon. Members, he will choose to make inquiries into the matter. I simply tell him that we believe that he will want to make a statement on the subject at 11 am tomorrow. I advise him to confirm that he proposes to do that.

Mr. Lawson: The right hon. Gentleman is barking up the wrong tree. When the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) raised the matter, I replied immediately and gave an explanation. I said that I would double check. Since then I have double checked, and I can say that the story I told was correct. The document was prepared and copied in the Treasury by a special political adviser. The document was paid for by Central Office, which supplied the front cover. It was not released until well after I had sat down. That is a practice of long standing.

Mr. Hattersley: The Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to think that the answer that the document was paid for by Central Office covers everything. Hon. Members who are interested in rights and privileges will not believe that information being paid for by Central Office entitles Central Office to that information before hon. Members. I believe that the Leader of the House, whose honour in this matter I trust absolutely, should consider the position and report to the House on the propriety of it, according to our general custom, tomorrow morning.

Mr. Madden: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. The matter is of considerable concern. Earlier this evening, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that there was nothing unusual about the preparation of the document. It contains a great deal of additional information that was not contained in the statement made by the Chancellor at 3.30 pm. It is extremely important that we know the time when the document was circulated and to whom it was circulated. It is clear that the contents of the document could be used for personal gain by those who had advance knowledge of it and received it. It is not good enough for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to attempt to laugh off this matter. The contents of the statement were not available to Members until nearly 4 o'clock, and it is clear that this Conservative Central Office document was available long before that.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take further points of order, but I cannot see that there is anything in this matter for me.

Mr. Skinner rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that the Chancellor of the Exchequer resumed his seat at 3.48 pm. The House heard him say that the document, or a document, would be available at that time. I have no idea what this other document is, and it is not a matter for me.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the document were in the public domain, why has Conservative Central Office marked it "Confidential"?

Mr. Skinner: On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Chancellor of the Exchequer failed to mention to the House just when the document was made available to those in Conservative Central Office, the people who wanted to read it. You will know, Mr Speaker, that the last important document that was leaked resulted in the issue having to be debated by various Select Committees, and it would be worth while seeing the same procedure take place on this occasion, especially as one in eight of Tory Members is a member of Lloyd's. Half of the Tory Back Benchers represent companies on the stock exchange. With the kind of information that was available in advance to them, they could have made a killing. They could have lined their pockets—[Laughter.] This is not a laughing matter. It is all right for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to try to laugh it off, but he is the man who is responsible for doubling the number of people who live in poverty in this country. At the same time he is lining the pockets of others——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a debating point.

Mr. Douglas: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It will be within your knowledge that, although the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not a Budget statement, there were significant tax elements in it, especially on petroleum revenue tax. Therefore—[Interruption.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer is interrupting from a sedentary position. We require a statement from him not mutterings from a sedentary position.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to study carefully the Hansard report, especially the reply which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) when he asked a question about Scottish expenditure being lumped with other elements in the statement. He was told—I cannot quote verbatim, and I have not had the opportunity of checking this—by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Cabinet met this morning and that there was no time to apportion Scottish expenditure in a manner that would be apportioned when the autumn statement was fully prepared.

Time is of the essence, Mr. Speaker, and I ask you to try to prevail upon the Leader of the House to accept his responsibilities for the House and to ensure that what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said—that this is not a precedent—is the truth. We have doubts about the authenticity of what the Chancellor is saying about this not being a precedent. Will the Chancellor quote other examples of political advisers in the Treasury behaving in a similar fashion?

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is a matter of the utmost gravity. Conservative hon. Members have had made available to them today not one document but two on this matter. I understand that for some time the Labour party has been trying to persuade us that there are some 4 million people unemployed, rather than nearer 3 million. This document revealed that the Labour party was not prepared to believe that.

At approximately mid-day today, I was photocopying a letter to a constituent, and I read the rules about the photocopier——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is very interesting, but it is not a point of order for me.

Mr. Key: We are dealing with a point of order, Mr. Speaker, on an abuse of this House. I understood that it was an abuse of the House to misuse photocopiers. I have a document here which was revealed to Conservative Members, published, apparently, by Labour Members and headed "Lawson Questions, 6 November 1986". It was a mass distribution to Labour Members of planted questions to the Government. Before they accuse us of receiving one document from an unauthorised source, they had better check their facts with their own Member about the other document.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House knows that this has nothing to do with me as a point of order. These are debating points which should be raised at the proper time, on the Floor of the House, not at this time of night and not through me.

Visas (Fees)

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I draw your attention to a matter on which you have had occasion to comment in the past — the Government's making available information to the press before it is made available to Members of the House. Today, an Under-Secretary of State at the Foreign Office planted a question with his hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) about an increase in visa fees. The information shows that visa fees are to be increased by 66⅔ per cent. for some people and are to be doubled for others.

That information, Mr. Speaker, has been in the possession of the Government for some considerable time and could have been provided to the House in the debate on visas on Monday of last week. It was deliberately withheld by the Government, and now it has been given in a written answer. But that written answer was made available to the press at 3.30 pm. It was only because the press informed certain hon. Members about it that they know about it, and — this is the important point — would know about it before the House is prorogued and before the next Session commences next week.

This is a deliberate attempt — a piece of sharp practice — by the Government to smother this reprehensible information in a way that will prevent hon. Members from raising it in the House for a considerable time. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to do what you have done in the past, with the appreciation of hon. Members on both sides of the House, and rule that it is not acceptable for the Government to provide information to the press before it is available to hon. Members so that they can raise it on behalf of their constituents.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have no way of knowing whether this was made available in advance to the press. I accept what the hon. Gentleman has said. I know that question No. 281 was on the Order Paper today. The answer was given to the hon. Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) at 3.30 pm. I am sure that hon. Members have seen this answer, as I have just done, which states that the new fees will come into operation on 18 November. It seems to me that there is adequate time in which to debate this matter.

Mr. Kaufman: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. That is the very point. The whole House has not seen the information. The hon. Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) has seen the information. No other hon. Member had it available to him or her while members of the press had it available to them. Therefore, it was an abuse of the House of Commons to give information to the press when the House as a whole did not have it.

Mr. Speaker: I would certainly deprecate it if the information was given in advance to the press. The whole House knows that written answers are available at 3.30 pm in the Library.

Mr. Kaufman indicated dissent.

Mr. Speaker: They are. It is a practice which has been going on for many years. I do not see that there is a point of order for me.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since this alleged point of order has been raised so late in the evening, may I point out that what the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who raised the point of order, refers to as the "whole House" is an almost empty House on his side of the Chamber. In other words, his own hon. Friends are not interested in the matter.

AGRICULTURE

Ordered,

That Mr. David Maclean be discharged from the Agriculture Committee. [Sir Reginald Eyre, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITION

Hypothermia

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I present a petition from constituents of Islington, North and all other constituencies. It contains the names of some 13,000 petitioners. The signatures were collected by pensioners' organisations, health campaigns, tenants' associations and such groups which believe that deaths through hypothermia are an insult to a civilised society. They are concerned that in the forthcoming winter there will be further deaths from hypothermia in our so-called civilised society.

The petition calls for a substantial increase in old-age pensions. It states that pensioner households should not be forced to pay standing charges for their gas and electricity and, above all, should have their supplies guaranteed so that they do not face the indignity of having their fuel supplies cut off, with a consequent danger to health and death from hypothermia.

The petitioners pray:

that the honourable House do urge the Secretary of State for Health and Social Services to put into law the Pensoners' Right to Heat, Light and Communications Bill to protect pensioners from fear of cold homes every winter.

The petition is signed by some 13,000 people, many of them elderly—many are over 80—who have written to me in support of their demands for urgent action by the House before prorogation to protect them in the forthcoming winter.

To lie upon the Table.

Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Malone.]

10.34 pm

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): Earlier this week the third follow-up meeting of the conference on security and co-operation in Europe – the so-called Helsinki process – opened in Vienna. It takes place against a very different background from its two predecessors.

The first review conference in Belgrade in 1977 and 1978 represented a great disappointment to those participating states which had hoped to see some progress in the two years following the euphoric signing of the Helsinki Final Act. It dashed the hopes of those in Communist Europe who were monitoring the implementation of the humanitarian provisions of the Act in the courageous but naive expectation that they would enjoy a degree of international protection for so doing.

It contributed to the growing realisation on the part of the free world that detente was proving to be a one-way street for the Soviet Union, which was seizing all the advantages of trade, credit and technology transfer while delivering nothing on the human rights issues spelled out in the Final Act. It was also, we now know, taking advantage of the spirit of detente to build up its own offensive capabilities, while we in the West were doing precisely the reverse.

The second review conference in Madrid in 1982 and 1983 took place against a background of the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, the imposition of martial law in Poland, continued repression in eastern Europe, and, during the course of it, the shooting down by the Soviet Union of the South Korean airliner.

Despite such a deterioration in East-West relations, it was perhaps both surprising and encouraging that the concluding document at Madrid added to the original Helsinki commitments and provided for a series of subsidiary meetings on confidence-building measures, the peaceful settlement of disputes, human rights, and human contacts and scientific and cultural co-operation. By contrast, the Vienna conference this week begins with a far more encouraging background.

Last year in Helsinki at the tenth anniversary meeting of the signing of the Final Act all 35 Foreign Ministers recommitted themselves to full implementation of the Act. The confidence-building measures arrived at in Stockholm represent an encouraging step forward in verification through on-site inspection, which could well contribute to other arms control negotiations.

General Secretary Gorbachev is giving all the appearance of a new broom following the moribund Brezhnev, Andropov and Chernenko years. There is a more public Soviet perception of its immense economic problems which a significant reduction in defence expenditure and Western technological aid can help to reduce, although, as we all know, only a free economy will deliver the goods to the Russian people as it has to ours. We are in the middle of summitry. Geneva — followed by Reykjavik and Washington — hopefully in the new year — may yet lead to meaningful reductions in arms before President Reagan retires to go down in history as one of his country's greatest Presidents.

All this augurs well for Vienna but only at first sight, because we must never allow ourselves to ignore the formidable realities and challenges that remain. There is, as yet, absolutely no evidence that the new leadership in the Kremlin is any different from that which so cruelly and effectively put an end to the Hungarian attempt at neutrality and political pluralism exactly 30 years ago, or indeed the Prague spring in 1968. Perhaps Vienna as a venue, just a few miles down the road from both Budapest and Prague, will remind all those participating there that these were the same roads taken by thousands of Hungarians and Czechoslovakians seeking refuge and freedom from Soviet domination. Nor is there any real evidence that the Soviet Union is to withdraw from Afghanistan, and I regret that the European Community is resuming those negotiations with Comecon which it broke off six years ago because of Afghanistan. What has changed?

The treatment of the Soviet Union's so-called dissidents has not improved. Police brutality, harsh treatment in labour camps, abuse of psychiatry – the case of Serajim Yevsyokov is particularly tragic – a wide variety of punishments and pressures, harassment and discrimination – in reality apartheid – remain the norm for anyone seeking true freedom of expression, assembly, unions or worship. Indeed, if anything, pressure on dissidents has intensified under Gorbachev. There is a practice – now commonplace – of re-sentencing dissidents while still serving sentences. That is surely contrary to natural justice. Conditions in penal establishments are deteriorating, and new laws against contact with foreigners and receiving gifts from abroad have been introduced contrary to the spirit of Helsinki.

As the whole world knows, one crude measure of repression is the number of Jewish refusniks denied exit visas and of the growing number of Christians who, like the Siberian Seven, are seeking to leave for countries where they may bring up their families in a religious manner free of state interference. It has been no different in every other eastern European Communist country.

In Poland, while we must but welcome the release of political prisoners, there is no relaxation of party control despite the clear support of the majority of its people for both Solidarity and the Church. In East Germany the number of political prisoners has reached 7,000 and the Federal Republic pays immense sums to purchase their freedom. In Czechoslovakia, in addition to the continual persecution of the Charter 77 campaigners, in recent weeks the authorities have called in some 300 young members of the so-called Jazz Section, an independent group which publishes books and music. In Bulgaria the entire Turkish population is being forcibly subjected to a total loss of their ethnic identity. In Rumania repression against religion continues unabated. Churches in Bucharest and elsewhere have been deliberately demolished to make way for housing blocks.

Last month I visited for the second time the Second Baptist Church in Oradea, in north-west Rumania, which holds 1,000 people, where Pastors Nichole Gheorghita and Paul Negrut have built up a congregation of more than 2,500 people at every service, and where last year the authorities withdrew their original permission for them to rebuild a larger church to hold 2,200 people on a new site.

[Mr. David Atkinson]

Now the old church is deteriorating and will collapse because of the way the drainage from the surrounding development has been laid.

I mention the Second Baptist Church in Oradea in particular because it was the present Romanian Deputy Foreign Minister, Mr. Ilonne Totu — who is to visit London shortly for consultations — who was the official on the Central Council of the Romanian Communist party who was responsible for granting the original approval for the new larger church to be built, and which has since been withdrawn after his promotion. Perhaps my hon. Friend will ensure that this matter is raised with him when he comes to Britain.

Nor should we be fooled by the release recently of a number of well-known campaigners for human rights on whose behalf the free world has been campaigning, such as Shcharansky, Orlov and Father Calcui from Romania. While their release proves that perseverance on behalf of those whose names have thus become internationally known can succeed, if only to be exchanged for spies or as pawns in pre-summit propaganda, there are so many more who remain, like Sakharov, Father Gleb Yakunin and Lev Rengelson — of the Moscow Committee for the Defence of Religious Rights — like Valerie Sendarov and Ratislov Endikomov — the free trade union campaigners and even Irana Ratsushinskaya, the Christian poetess, who though released this autumn is being denied a visa to obtain hospital treatment in Britain, and many thousands of prisoners of conscience whose names we do not know, as my right hon. and learned Friend said in Vienna on Tuesday.

Of course, we must hope that in time internal developments in all these countries will one day lead to the establishment of that pluralist democracy which we know offers the best guarantee of human rights and an end to the separation of Europe between freedom and slavery. In the meantime, it is the Helsinki process which offers the best and only peaceful way forward and it is in that realistic spirit which I know the Foreign Secretary and his colleagues will be negotiating at Vienna. They will, I hope, be pursuing balanced progress in all areas of existing agreements of the Final Act before any new commitments can be entered into.

There are a number of positive steps which I hope will be considered at Vienna, which I want to put to the House on behalf of the three organisations with which I and several other hon. Members are associated: the International Society of Human Rights, the Inter-Parliamentary Group for Human Rights in the Soviet Union, and Christian Solidarity International.

First, Western participating states should ensure that a detailed report of all known previous violations of the conditions contained in principles VII and VIII as well as basket III should be presented. They should emphasise that the Final Act constitutes one entity. Those who violate the humanitarian conditions of basket III cannot expect to obtain advantages from the economic, scientific and technological co-operation suggested in basket II. Secondly, they should seek to construct a human rights commission and court of justice for the CSCE signatory states. In that way, the right of individual petition for citizens to voice complaints can be protected. Thirdly, they should agree a charter for humanitarian aid which will guarantee every citizen the right to receive and provide such aid, which is currently denied in several states.

Fourthly, they should pass a declaration of the right of every citizen to supervise the observance of the Helsinki agreements and to form monitoring groups operating free of state interference. Fifthly, they should call for an experts conference concerning the question of movement and family reunification. Finally, they should call for an experts conference on ethnic minorities and a charter of rights for such minorities in CSCE participating states.

I think the whole House will agree that we who are fortunate enough to belong to one of the minority of nations in the world which enjoy true freedom and democracy have a moral obligation to raise our voices on behalf of those who do not. Standing up for human rights does not represent intervention in the internal affairs of other states. It is indeed provided for by the very principles of the Final Act without which real and lasting peace, security and co-operation are not possible. That is what I know my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and his colleagues are doing in Vienna at the present time, and the whole House will want to wish them every success.

10.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): The House will be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) for raising this matter and to you, Mr. Speaker, for selecting this subject for debate.

As my hon. Friend said, the third conference on security and co-operation in Europe follow-up meeting opened in Vienna on 4 November. This is therefore a timely opportunity to discuss the Government's approach to the CSCE process.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has just returned from Vienna, where he spoke on behalf of the 12 nations of the European Community. A copy of his speech has been placed in the Library.

My right hon. and learned Friend stated in his speech that in the CSCE process we aim to reduce tension and put an end to conflict, to release new forces for co-operation, and to respect both national and individual rights. He said:

> "The Twelve believe that the Final Act can be a force for good and a force for change in European and East-West relations. If all 35 countries who signed the Final Act implemented its principles the political atmosphere would be transformed, and not only in Europe. Mutual mistrust would give way to mutual confidence. Uncertainty and insecurity would give way to security. Anxiety would give way to optimism".

We are realists. We do not expect such ambitious results to be achieved overnight. Vienna is only one step in a long process of building confidence between East and West, but it is an important one which gives opportunities which must not be missed.

First and foremost, Vienna is an opportunity to take stock of the achievements of the Helsinki process and to review the implementation of the commitments entered into by 35 countries. Secondly, it is an opportunity to look for new ways of ensuring that those commitments are better carried out, and for new areas of East-West co-operation.

Superficially, there sometimes seems to be a tension between these various aspects. Reviewing implementation of commitments means exposing the failure of the Soviet Union and some Eastern European countries to treat their citizens humanely. The Soviet Union used to say that such exposure was unwarranted interference in internal affairs, which contradicted the search for new ways of co-operation.

In reality, of course, there is no contradiction, for greater East-West confidence, and better co-operation, can come about only against a background of frankness and truth in acknowledging where commitments are not being honoured. In the past few years, even the Soviet authorities have come to accept that human rights and humanitarian questions are a proper subject for international discussion.

Readiness to discuss is one thing; readiness to improve respect for human rights across the board is another. We are unfortunately still a long way away from that. The release by the Soviet Union of Anatoly Shcharansky, Yuri Orlov and others is very welcome, but it is not nearly enough.

We must not forget the continued existence of that unnecessary monstrosity, the Berlin wall, the enormous number of German, Jewish, Turkish and other ethnic would-be emigrants from Warsaw pact countries, the systematic wasteful jamming of western broadcasts to the east, the recent cri de coeur from individuals in Hungary, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic and Poland on the 30th anniversary of the Hungarian revolution and the continuing Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. Nor must we forget those many individuals of differing creeds in the Soviet Union who are persecuted merely for seeking freedom of religious expression. Those are things the whole House will want to recollect. That is the reality of life behind the iron curtain.

Those are issues which Ministers and officials raise regularly with the Soviet and East European authorities in the CSCE framework and bilaterally. Recently my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary raised our concern over Soviet human rights abuses when he met the Soviet Foreign Minister, Mr. Shevardnadze, in Vienna. The Vienna meeting offers the opportunity patiently to press the Soviet Union and other East European countries to act more humanely. Change, when it comes, will largely be internally generated. However, we can help that process by reminding those countries of the standards to which they subscribed at Helsinki, by continuing to press for improvement and by showing that our concern is wholly compatible with the contacts and dialogue we want to encourage between East and West.

The meeting starts with fair omens. At the preparatory meeting, which settled the arrangements and agenda, we and our partners and allies obtained some modest improvements on previous meetings. There will be a rather longer period for reviewing implementation of existing commitments. Since that review is at the heart of the meeting, we welcome it. Rather more sessions will be open to journalists and others. That too is welcome. Another good omen is the recent successful conclusion of the CDE Stockholm agreement on confidence and security building measures.

The Vienna meeting will start with a review of implementation, or stocktaking, which will last into the new year. I have said enough to show that we attach priority to this part of the proceedings, and want to see a full and thorough debate which does not gloss over the shortcomings of the Soviet Union and East European countries in human rights and contacts.

But the CSCE process ranges much more widely than human rights. It is a conference on security and co-operation in Europe. The Government's aim is to maintain a balance between all elements of the process. This means maintaining or restoring momentum in each of the three CSCE baskets. I will remind the House that basket I deals with basic principles, including human rights and security, basket II concentrates on economic co-operation, science and technology and the environment, and basket III concentrates on human contacts, information, culture and education.

We will aim at Vienna to reaffirm the West's long-standing view that these areas are linked, and that detente — for want of a better word — is indivisible and not susceptible to partial interpretation in terms of subject or geographical area. We will go on to stress that security cannot be divorced from the political, economic and human aspects of relations between states. Confidence and mutual trust cannot develop properly against a background of repression of human rights. When the conference goes on to consider new proposals for developing the CSCE process, our priorities will be in the areas where performance falls furthest behind commitments – military security, human rights and information.

Let me first deal with security. The Stockholm agreement is a major CSCE achievement. If implemented thoroughly — we will insist on that — it will be an important contribution towards greater openness about military activities in Europe. By establishing detailed provisions for on-site inspection, including on Soviet territory, the agreement breaks new ground. It shows that progress can be made in arms control negotations with the Soviet Union provided we are clear about our objectives.

The Stockholm agreement — the details of which will be familiar to the House — represents a significant achievement for the United Kingdom. Our delegation played a major role in the negotiation, particularly in the crucial discussions on verification. The excellent co-ordination with our partners and allies was an essential condition of success.

The task now is to build on this achievement. The Vienna meeting must help find ways to do this. We and our allies are currently considering the way forward in the NATO high level task force set up — at Franco-British initiative – by Foreign Ministers at Halifax in May. We intend that their final report in December will set the broad lines of the allied approach when discussion resumes at Vienna in the new year. There is clearly scope for further work on measures to increase confidence and stability. But we must also keep in mind our objective of working towards reductions leading to parity at lower levels of conventional forces in Europe. We hope, and will continue to insist, that the Stockholm agreement should now be matched by progress in the mutual and balanced force reductions talks at Vienna, where the major Western proposal — again initiated by Britain — of December last still requires a substantial response from the Warsaw pact.

In the vital "human dimension" of the CSCE process, Vienna must build on the discussions of those specialised meetings since Madrid which did not produce final documents. We will take the Western proposals tabled at the Ottawa human rights meeting, the Budapest cultural forum and the Berne experts meeting on human contacts as our starting point in considering new texts on which we might agree. We also see value in the possibility of an experts meeting on information after Vienna. This is an important aspect of the Final Act which has been rather neglected since Madrid. I can think of no better venue for such a meeting than London, with its tradition of vigorous and free journalism and broadcasting.

The CSCE is about people, and their values, it is about individuals. We are regularly asked to raise individual cases in CSCE meetings. My hon. Friend has mentioned several examples of these—and five proposals—of which I have taken careful note. I will ensure that his comments are passed to the head of the United Kingdom CSCE delegation, Mr. Laurence O'Keeffe. I assure my hon. Friend that we share the concerns expressed and take parliamentary and public views into account when considering which matters to raise.

We do not always raise all the cases brought to our attention in plenary meetings. Sometimes we decide quite deliberately to raise such matters in private, bilateral sessions. There is, after all, a place for quiet, not megaphone, diplomacy.

For long-standing and well-understood reasons, we cannot commit ourselves to raising particular cases on specific occasions, but we recognise our obligation to the individuals concerned; and we will always be alive to opportunities to help them. We will ensure that the problems that their cases represent are fully and fairly addressed at Vienna.

The Government will maintain pressure at Vienna on the Soviet Union and East European countries to improve the lives of the people of Europe. This is an essential factor in maintaining public support for the CSCE process—a process which we believe lies at the very core of East-West relations.

Question put and agreed to.

Prorogation

Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech

Mr. Speaker: I have further to acquaint the House that the Lord High Chancellor, one of the High Commissioners, delivered Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament, in pursuance of Her Majesty's Command. For greater accuracy, I have obtained a copy and also directed that the terms of the Speech be printed in the Votes and Proceedings. Copies are being made available in the Vote Office.

The Gracious Speech was as follows:

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

The Duke of Edinburgh and I were pleased to receive the State Visits of His Highness the Amir of Qatar in November, their Majesties the King and Queen of Spain in April, and the President of the Federal Republic of Germany and Freifrau von Weizsaecker in July.

We recall with great pleasure the State Visit to Nepal followed by visits to New Zealand and Australia earlier this year, as well as the recent State Visit to the People's Republic of China and the visit to Hong Kong.

My Government have attached great importance to relations with countries in the Far East. This was marked by the Prime Minister's visit to the Republic of Korea in May and by visits here of the President of the Republic of Korea in April and the General Secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China in June.

My Government and the Chinese Government have made good progress in carrying out the Sino-British Joint Declaration on Hong Kong.

My Government have enhanced the United Kingdom's defences and played a full part in the Atlantic Alliance. My Government have worked vigorously for balanced and verifiable agreements on arms control in respect of nuclear, chemical and conventional weapons, keeping in close consultation with the United Kingdom's allies. They were active at the Stockholm Conference on Disarmament in Europe which reached agreement in September. They have continued to seek improved relations with the Soviet Union and the countries of Eastern Europe.

My Government have assumed the Presidency of the Council of Ministers of the European Community. My Government signed the Single European Act to amend the Treaty of Rome and legislation to give effect to it has been passed.

My Government have worked to bring about peaceful and fundamental change in South Africa in consultation with their partners in the European Community and with the Commonwealth. They have supported efforts to restore the independence and non-aligned status of Afghanistan and Cambodia. My Government have honoured their commitments to the people of the Falkland Islands, while continuing to seek more normal relations with Argentina.

My Government welcomed the resolution adopted at the United Nations Special Session on Africa concerning the economic recovery and development of African countries. They have provided substantial emergency assistance to victims of famine in Africa, both directly and through the European Community.

[Mr. Speaker]

My Government have worked hard for the launching of a new round of multilateral trade negotiations within the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. They welcome this initiative believing that a successful outcome to the negotiations will preserve and strengthen the world's open trading system.

My Government have made vigorous efforts to combat international terrorism and trafficking in drugs.

My Government have signed a treaty with the Government of France for a Channel Tunnel to be financed by private capital. Legislation has been introduced to enable the treaty to be ratified.

My Government and the Governments of the Cayman Islands and the United States of America have signed a treaty relating to mutual legal assistance in criminal matters. My Government have introduced measures for the better administration of the Turks and Caicos Islands.

Members of the House of Commons

I thank you for the provision which you have made for the honour and dignity of the Crown and for the Public Service.

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

My Government's policies have been successful in reducing inflation to levels not seen for almost 20 years. The output of the nation continues to expand and the number of people in work continues to grow.

In order to give more help to the unemployed, my Government have through the Wages Act removed some outdated obstacles to the creation on new jobs and have expanded existing employment and training measures including the introduction of the national Restart programme for the long term unemployed and the expansion of the Community Programme and the Enterprise Allowance Scheme. The "Action for Jobs" information campaign has been introduced to ensure that employers, employees and unemployed people know what help is available to them.

My Government continue to attach the highest importance to the education and training of young people and to improving the links between school and work. The new two year Youth Training Scheme was launched successfully and the Technical and Vocational Education Initiative has been expanded to a nationwide programme offering the opportunity of participation to all those between 14 and 18 years of age at school.

My Government have taken additional initiatives to encourage enterprise and improve the performance of the economy. The basic rate of income tax has been further reduced.

Continuing my Government's programme of encouraging greater industrial efficiency and promoting wider share ownership, legislation has been enacted to provide for the setting up of new regulatory arrangements for the gas supply and airports industries and for the sale of shares in British Gas and the British Airports Authority to the public. An Act was also passed to enable the Atomic Energy Authority to operate as a trading fund from 1 April 1986 with a capital structure and borrowing powers. The remaining warship yards of British Shipbuilders have been sold as have my Government's residual shares in Cable and Wireless. The National Bus Company has begun to sell its undertakings to the private sector including sales to managers and employees.

An Act has been passed to enable building societies to increase the range of services offered to the public and to provide a new statutory framework for their supervision.

Legislation has been passed to extend and reform the regulation of investment business. This will protect the interest of investors while encouraging the continued development of strong, efficient and competitive financial services.

Legislation has been enacted to improve the management of schools in England and Wales and to promote the professional effectiveness of teachers.

An Act has been passed giving further effect to my Government's policies towards agriculture and the countryside.

Legislation has been passed to encourage the sale of publicly owned flats to their tenants and the wider involvement of private business in the ownership and management of council housing, and to improve the planning system.

Legislation has been enacted to prohibit expenditure on party political publicity by local authorities and to require local authorities to make a rate by 1 April each year.

An Act has been passed to reform social security.

In Northern Ireland, the security forces have continued the fight against terrorism with courage and dedication. My Government has entered into an Agreement with the Government of the Republic of Ireland which it believes can benefit all the people of Northern Ireland and help achieve greater peace and stability.

For Scotland, measures have been passed to extend the rights of public sector tenants, facilitate the private ownership of public sector housing and improve the building control system, and to improve legal aid arrangements.

Further progress has been made in the consolidation of statute law. Legislation has been passed for England and Wales to set fair time limits for cases involving latent damage; provision has been made to settle conflicts of law relating to child abduction within the United Kingdom, and to reform the law of land registration and the administration of funds by the Public Trustee and other authorities.

An Act has been passed to enable the courts in England and Wales to confiscate the proceeds of drug trafficking, and to penalise those who assist traffickers to retain the benefit of such proceeds.

An Act has been passed to reform the law relating to public order.

Legislation has been enacted to establish improved arrangements for the protection of animals used for experimental and other scientific purposes.

An Act has been passed to modify and extend the management structure of salmon fisheries in Scotland and to introduce further measures to prevent illegal fishing in Great Britain.

Proposals have been made to extend the account ability of local authorities and for other reforms in the finance of local government.

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

I pray that the blessing of Almighty God may attend you.

After which the Lord Chancellor said:

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons

By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission which has been now read we do, in Her Majesty's name, and in obedience to Her Majesty's Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Wednesday the twelfth day of this instant November, to be then here holden and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Wednesday the twelfth day of this instant November.

End of the Third Session (opened on 6 November 1985) of the Forty-Ninth Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, in the Thirty-Fifth Year of the Reign of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

A and O-level Passes

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report the percentage of pupils with five or more O-levels or O-level equivalent remaining in full-time education in each local education authority and in England as a whole.

Mr. Dunn: Information is not available in the form requested. The proportions of maintained school leavers in England with five or more higher grades at O-level/CSE who had either stayed on at school or who had left at the minimum school leaving age, intending to continue full-time education elsewhere, are shown in the table. The percentages do not include those pupils who left school without five or more higher grade O-level/CSE passes and subsequently achieved this level of qualification in full-time education or otherwise but do include those who achieved this level of qualification at least in part in the sixth form.

Leavers from maintained schools in England with 5 or more higher grade[1] passes at O level or CSE
Total of leavers aged 15 who intended to pursue full-time courses of further education and leavers aged 16 or over as a percentage of all leavers with 5 or more higher grade[1] passes at O level or CSE

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has received any representations to date from the teacher unions concerning city technology colleges; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has not received any such representations. Copies of the booklet on city technology colleges were sent to the teacher unions, and some have subsequently been in contact with the Department. My right hon. Friend and I believe that the teacher unions will wish to give this initiative careful consideration. We would be happy to discuss this with them, if they so wish.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what differences in social composition he expects as between pupils participating in (a) the assisted places scheme and (b) the city technology colleges.

Mrs. Rumbold: The assisted places scheme is a national programme designed to be academically selective. It extends the opportunities for children from poorer backgrounds to enjoy the best of the secondary education in the independent sector. While the Department does not collect information on the social background of APS pupils, the sole aim of the scheme is to support those pupils who could not otherwise afford to take up a fee-paying place.

In contrast, city technology colleges are designed to offer a demanding education to pupils of varying backgrounds in a number of our cities. Selection will be by aptitude and commitment, and not through formal tests of academic ability. CTCs will be required to admit pupils representative of the community they serve.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what effects the establishment of city technology colleges will have on the availability of science and technology teachers in the neighbouring maintained schools; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: City technology colleges will plainly reinforce the overall demand for science and technology teachers, without automatically guaranteeing an increase in supply. The effects in specific areas will depend on local circumstances, including the methods of staff recruitment used by CTC governing bodies, and the pay and conditions they offer. The Government believe that CTCs stand a good chance of attracting back into the profession teachers who have left it, and of stimulating new entrants.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he proposes to allow the establishment of city technology colleges in the same localities and affecting the same catchment areas as schools operating the technical and vocational education initiative; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The list of possible locations for city technology colleges includes a number of areas served by schools participating in the technical and vocational education initiative. In such areas, CTCs will complement the TVEI and will be expected to build on its achievements.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the governing bodies of the proposed city technology colleges will have elected parent representatives amongst their number.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has made it clear that a major criterion in the selection of pupils for city technology colleges will be the commitment of their parents to full-time education or training up to the age of 18, to the distinctive characteristics of the CTC curriculum, and to the ethos of the CTC. Against this background, my right hon. Friend will be discussing the possibility of direct parental representation on the governing bodies with the promoters, who will have the controlling interest in them.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate his Department has made of the likely effect on technical and vocational education initiative schemes of the proposed city technology colleges; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: City technology colleges will offer some parents and children an alternative to maintained schools in their catchment areas. CTCs will not affect the planned extension of the TVEI and existing TVEI schools will continue to benefit under arrangements which have already been made. More generally, my right hon. Friend expects city technology colleges to provide new models for improving the quality of education in urban areas.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to compulsorily purchase local education authority land and buildings for use as city technology college.. and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Private promoters will be responsible for finding and managing the premises used by city technology colleges. My right hon. Friend has no powers of compulsory purchase.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures he proposes to ensure that entrants to city technology colleges will fully reflect the catchment area from which they are drawn.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend proposes to make it a condition of grant to the promoters of city technology colleges that they aim to secure an intake of pupils which is representative of the community they serve. The precise arrangements will be negotiated case by case.

Pupils (Statistics)

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many pupils there are in England in (a) county schools, (b) voluntary-controlled schools and (c) voluntary-aided schools.

Mr. Dunn: The number of full and part-time pupils in England in January 1986 in county schools, voluntary controlled schools and voluntary-aided schools are as follows:

	Number
County schools	5,524,672
Voluntary controlled schools	529,107
Voluntary aided schools	1,039,883
Total	7,093,662

Single-sex Education

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to the answer of 8 July to the hon. Member for Epping Forest, if he will make a statement on his policy towards the proposed reorganisation of secondary education in the Epping Forest area, in the light of his Department's circular 4/82 concerning the maintenance of opportunities for single-sex education in schools.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend is currently considering statutory proposals for the reorganisation of secondary and further education in the west Essex area. His policy in respect of single-sex schooling remains as set out in my reply to my hon. Friend on 8 July 1986 at column 142.

Liverpool

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State's recent visit to Liverpool.

Mr. Walden: I regret that my visit to the university of Liverpool planned for 22 October had to be postponed because of parliamentary business. I hope to rearrange my visit for next term.

University of Wales

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what were the percentage changes in real terms in funding of the colleges of the University of Wales by the University Grants Committee over the period 1981-82 to 1986-87, including those amounts representing compensation for redundancy and early retirement, provision for capital in recurrent expenditure and local authority rates.

Mr. Walden: The percentage changes in real terms in funding of the colleges of the university of Wales by the University Grants Committee over the period 1981-82 to 1985-86, including those amounts representing compensation for redundancy and early retirement, provision for capital in recurrent expenditure and local authority rates is shown in the following table. Information for the 1986-87 academic year cannot be provided as total grant for that year cannot be finalised until the first instalment of the rates bill for the 1987-88 financial year is known.

Pupil Teacher Ratio

Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will state, for the United Kingdom, England and Wales, the south-west standard region, and Cornwall, the average teacher-pupil ratio in both primary and secondary schools and the average amount spent per pupil in respect of providing this education in the primary and secondary sectors and the corresponding figures for the academic year 1978-79.

Mr. Dunn: The pupil-teacher ratio and the average amount spent per pupil in maintained primary and secondary schools in England, the South West and Cornwall and the corresponding figures for 1978-79 are as follows:

Pupil teacher ratios within schools

	January 1986		January 1979
	Primary	Secondary	Primary	Secondary
England	22·1	15·9	23·1	16·7
South West	23·6	16·8	24·0	17·5
Cornwall	23·5	16·6	24·2	16·8

Net institutional expenditure per pupil (£ in 1984-85 real terms)[1]

	1984-85		1978-79
	Primary	Secondary	Primary	Secondary
England	760	1,085	650	945
South West	695	1,000	605	880
Cornwall	670	965	575	875

Information for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland is the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Royal Greenwich Observatory

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what scientific and non-scientific criteria were taking into account in deciding to relocate the royal Greenwich observatory in Cambridge; what estimate was made of the cost of relocation in Manchester or Merseyside; and if he will reconsider the relocation to Manchester or Merseyside.

Mr. Walden: I understand that the Science and Engineering Research Council took account of the scientific need to associate the royal Greenwich observatory with a university having the following facilities: a strong astronomy department including an active optical observing group, expertise which complements that of the RGO, single site astronomy facilities, and associated strengths in engineering, computing and communications. The council also took account of non-scientific criteria, including cost and, equally important, the potential of the various sites for providing RGO with suitable accommodation.

The net cost after five years of the move to Manchester, taking both capital and recurrent costs and savings into account, was estimated to be: for the option using a refurbished existing building, nil; for the option using a new building, £0·7 million. The first of these two options however had the disadvantage of housing RGO on two sites separated by a main thoroughfare.

My right hon. Friend is considering the formal request by the SERC for approval in principle of the capital expenditure required for relocating the RGO at Cambridge.

EC Students

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about payment of fees by students from other European Community countries.

Mr. Kenneth Baker [pursuant to his reply, 1 July c. 475-476]: In my reply to the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on 1 July I said that the new arrangements for payment of course fees for those European Community nationals studying here on courses designated for mandatory awards purposes would apply to nationals of "other" European Community countries. The arrangements will in fact apply to the nationals of all European Community countries including United Kingdom nationals, and the children of such nationals, who meet the relevant criteria for eligibility, including that of ordinary residence in the Community area. The conditions for eligibility and other details of how the arrangements operate are set out in a letter of guidance (further education circular letter 2/86) to education institutions and other interested parties on 16 October. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

WALES

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales which jobcentres in Wales are managed by Welsh-speaking managers; and which have staff who are Welsh-speaking but managers who are not.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: At 22 October 1986, the 23 jobcentres or jobcentre groups in Wales managed by Welsh speakers, were those at Blackwood, Blaenau Ffestiniog, Caernarfon, Cardiff, Carmarthen, Holyhead, Lampeter, Llandyssul, Llanelli, Llangefni, Machynlleth, Maesteg, Mold, Newbridge, Newtown, Penarth, Pontardawe, Porthmadog, Pwllheli, Treorchy, Welshpool, Ystrad Mynach and Ystradgynlais.

The further 11 jobcentres with staff who were Welsh-speaking but managers who were not were at Ammanford, Bangor, Cardigan, Milford Haven, Morriston, Neath, Newport, Port Talbot, Shotton, Swansea and Wrexham.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy regarding the consideration of the effect of planning decisions on the Welsh language.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: It is a requirement on local planning authorities in considering planning applications and on the Secretary of State and his inspectors in considering planning appeals that they have regard to all material considerations. Policies which reflect the needs and the interests of the Welsh language may properly be among those considerations.

Housing (Marital Breakdown)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what research his Department has conducted into the housing implications of marital breakdown.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Welsh Office receives information on the incidence of homelessness caused by disputes between spouses/cohabitees from local authorities in Wales. This information is published in "Welsh Housing Statistics", the latest edition of which contains data for 1985. A copy of this is in the Library. The Government is considering proposals to carry out comprehensive research into the housing implications of relationship breakdown in England and Wales.

Loan Companies

Mr. Michael Cocks asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will request local authorities to take steps to prevent private loan companies from operating on their housing estates to pressurise tenants into taking out loans with them to exercise their right to buy their houses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No. Council tenants with the right to buy their homes must be allowed to take their own decisions about whether to do so and how to finance the purchase. They have the right to a mortgage from their landlord, subject to an income test, and, if they cannot afford to buy their homes outright, the option of purchase on shared ownership terms.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Terrorism

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received about the review of the cases of those who were sentenced for the Birmingham and Guildford pub bombings; and what reply he has sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Since the beginning of July my right hon. Friend has received about 170 letters, including some 50 from right hon. and hon. Members and several from religious leaders about these two cases. Some letters refer, in addition, to the Maguire case. My right hon. Friend and I have also met a parliamentary delegation from the Republic of Ireland. We have assured all those concerned that we are examining as quickly and as thoroughly as possible the various representations which have been made to us about the respective convictions, including material contained in two recently published books.

Passport Office

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the adequacy of the arrangements for dealing with telephone calls at the passport office in Petty France; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: A significant increase in demand led to abnormal delays in the handling of passport applications at all offices this year. Because the London passport office still has a backlog of work, it is still receiving an abnormal volume of telephone inquiries which may make it difficult at peak times for the public to contact the London office by telephone. Work is being transferred to other offices, where there are no longer any delays, to clear the arrears in London as quickly as possible. As a result I expect that the London passport office will soon be able to respond promptly to all telephone inquiries.

Immigration

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when it became practice to stamp the passports of visitors granted an extension of stay requiring them to register at once with the police.

Mr. Waddington: It is not possible to say precisely when it became the practice to endorse the passports with the requirement to register with the police but it certainly predates the Immigration Act 1971 by very many years.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visitors from the five countries for which visas have recently been required have been sent back to the country of origin since 6 October despite the intervention of an hon. Member.

Mr. Waddington: On 7 October, two passengers were incorrectly returned. On 19 October, five passengers were sent back when a right hon. or hon. Member had expressed an interest in the case prior to the decision to refuse entry, and on the same day a further passenger was sent back when his case was not identified from the details provided by the hon. Member.

Although I am sure the House will understand the special difficulties which have recently obtained at the airport terminals concerned, I naturally regret the discourtesy to hon. and right hon. Members.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if a record is kept of the stated reason for travelling to the United Kingdom of visitors who are refused entry.

Mr. Waddington: Yes, on individual case papers only.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to seek to ensure that nationals of the countries covered by the visa requirements outlined in the statement of 21 October who have the right of permanent settlement in the United Kingdom stamped in their passports do not require to obtain a re-entry visa when visiting their country of origin.

Mr. Waddington: Citizens of Bangladesh, Ghana, India, Pakistan and Sri Lanka do not need a visa if they are settled here and return after an absence abroad of less than two years. The visa requirement for citizens of Nigeria will have a similar exemption. Arrangements have been made to enable those who are exempt from the visa requirement to obtain an endorsement in their passport confirming their exemption.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will state, in respect of the year ended June 1986, the number of passengers from India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Nigeria and Ghana who (a) were admitted to the United Kingdom, (b) were refused admission to the United Kingdom and (c) are believed by his Department to have absconded following temporary admission;

(2) if he will state, in respect of the year ended June 1986, the number of passengers from South Africa who (a) were admitted to the United Kingdom, (b) were refused admission to the United Kingdom and (c) are believed to have absconded following temporary admission.

Mr. Waddington: The available information is given in the following table. Figures by nationality of passengers admitted in June 1986 are not yet available. Figures by nationality of passengers who absconded which cover all ports are only available from 1 January 1986.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report a statement for the year ended June 1986 of the total number of passengers from each country (a) admitted and (b) refused admission to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: The following table gives, by nationality, the numbers of passengers admitted to the United Kingdom in the year ending May 1986 and the numbers refused entry and removed from the United Kingdom in both the year ending May 1986 and the year ending June 1986. Figures by nationality of passengers admitted in June 1986 are not yet available.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any compensation arrangements will be introduced by the Government for the families of visitors detained at Heathrow and other ports of entry to cover their accommodation, travel expenses and loss of earnings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: No.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated cost per annum of a visa immigration officer at Heathrow; how many there are at present in Heathrow; how many interpreters of Indian languages are stationed at present in Heathrow; and what is the estimated cost per annum of keeping them there.

Mr. Waddington: At 30 September 1986, 542 immigration officers and seven interpreters specialising in languages of the Indian sub-continent were based at Heathrow. The other information requested which is readily available is as follows.

The basic salary scale for immigration officers ranges from £5,605 to £10,188, and for interpreters from £6,681 to £9,452. In addition they receive London weighting, premium pay for weekend working, overtime and a shift disturbance allowance of 16·5 per cent. of basic pay for an immigration officer and 10·5 per cent. for an interpreter.

Mr. Janner: asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he made of the cost of installing additional officers at Heathrow to cope with the increased work load of entry applications as opposed to sending additional officers abroad.

Mr. Waddington: On certain assumptions it was estimated that up to 300 additional immigration service staff might have been required at all ports to meet the extra workload imposed by the growth of difficult casework. Extra office, control and detention accommodation would also have been required. Not only is this not available in the existing buildings, but its provision could not have guaranteed a satisfactory solution or an end to congestion and delays in the long term. Complex or difficult cases simply cannot be quickly and effectively scrutinised at the ports.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what basis his Department establishes the numbers and natural origins of visitors alleged to be absconders.

Mr. Waddington: The record of absconders is of people of whom all trace is lost either before a decision is made on whether they qualify for entry or after they have been refused entry and are avoiding removal. The figure includes those who:

(a) abscond from immigration control areas or detention accommodation;

(b) have been allowed temporary admission to a private address or hotel to a specific date, but who fail to report on the due date and with whom contact is lost;

(c) have been similarly allowed temporary admission but without a restriction as to reporting on a specific date, who cannot subsequently be traced when the immigration service seek to contact them;

(d) are reported by their hosts as having absconded from private addresses.

Nationality is taken as that given in the passport produced.

This category is different from that of overstayers, who are admitted as visitors but then stay on.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many passengers in total have been granted temporary admission in each quarter of the current year;

(2) how many passengers refused entry to the United Kingdom were (a) detained, (b) given temporary admission and (c) given temporary admission to hotels in each quarter since January.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 23 October 1986]: The table gives the figures available for the numbers of passengers taken into detention and the numbers of passengers granted temporary admission. The readily available information regarding passengers temporarily admitted to hotels relates to the periods from 27 March to 29 April 1986 and from 20 July to 20 October when 681 and 1,055 passengers respectively were so admitted; passengers temporarily admitted on more than one occasion may be counted more than once and the figures do not differentiate between those refused leave to enter and those whose cases are subject to further inquiry.

	Period in 1986
	1st quarter	2nd quarter	July and August
Number of passengers taken into detention in approved accommodation either pending further examination or after refusal of leave to enter	3,598	3,808	2,668
Number of passengers granted temporary admission
Pending further examination	1,656	1,582	2,074
After refusal of leave to enter[1]	1,948	2,756	2,281

[1] The same person may be counted in both categories.

Mr. John Stalker

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what has been the total amount of police time expended by the inquiry team under the chief constable of the West Yorkshire police into the conduct of the deputy chief constable of the Greater Manchester police;

(2) what has been the cost of the investigation by the chief constable of the West Yorkshire police into the conduct of the deputy chief constable of Greater Manchester police.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A precise calculation is not possible, but a chief superintendent, five inspectors, three sergeants, three constables and a typist worked full-time for nine weeks on this inquiry.

A bill for £25,000 for additional costs such as travelling expenses and overtime has been set to the Greater Manchester police authority. The question of any further charge will be considered by the West Yorkshire police authority.

Motoring Offences

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis towards the priority to be given to issuing on-the-spot fines for motorists crossing red traffic lights.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The commissioner has informed me that his officers deal with traffic signal offences as and when they are detected. Officers have the discretion to give a verbal warning, to issue a fixed penalty notice, or to report such offences for prosecution.

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what action has been taken or is being taken by Jersey to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human rights in the Campbell and Cosans case;

(2) what action has been taken or is being taken by the Isle of Man to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human rights in the Campbell and Cosans case;

(3) what action has been taken or is being taken by Guernsey to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human rights in the Campbell and Cosans case.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand that corporal punishment is not administered in schools in Jersey and Guernsey; and that the authorities in the Isle of Man are keeping the matter under review pending action by the United Kingdom.

Shooting Equipment (Transportation)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he intends to take on the ruling of the Bristol Crown Court on 8 August that no motor vehicle would be considered a secure container, even though locked, for the transport of shooting equipment by members of the National Small-Bore Rifle Association.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The defendant in this case has been granted leave by the judge to state a case for the opinion of the High Court. It would be inappropriate for me to comment before that opinion is known.

Drug Abuse Control

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of 22 October about the Minister of State's visit to South America in respect of drug abuse control, how much financial assistance was offered; and what information he has as to how this compares with that offered by other European countries.

Mr. Mellor: The Government plan to spend around £1 million on drug-related assistance in South America. The main elements of this programme consist of £600,000 and £200,000 in support of the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control law enforcement projects in Bolivia (Los Yungas) and Ecuador respectively. In response to requests from Governments in the region we have undertaken to provide some help with training for medical and technical experts and the police, and training in the use of sniffer dogs for drugs detection. Offers of direct bilateral assistance, the detailed costings of which have yet to be finalised, have also been made in respect of the following items:

Bolivia

(i) contribution towards the cost of a drug treatment and rehabilitation centre in Cochabamba;

Peru

(i) cost of repairs to a Britten-Norman Islander aircraft confiscated by the police from drug traffickers;

(ii) the purchase of a second Islander aircraft which, with the other aircraft, would enable the police to transport a complete 'Condor' team on jungle raids;

Columbia

(i) provision of 2 spectophotometers for drug analysis.

We understand that the other European countries which are supporting UNFDAC's activities in South America are Italy (47 million United States dollars), Federal Republic of Germany (5·2 million DM) and Sweden (0·7 million United States dollars).

NORTHERN IRELAND

Terrorism

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if anyone has been made amenable for the murder claimed to have been committed by Protestants of Martin Love in Fermanagh on 8 April 1985; and if he will give details;

(2) if anyone has been made amenable for the murder claimed to have been committed by the Irish Republican Army of John McVitty in Fermanagh on 8 July; and if he will give details;

(3) if anyone has been made amenable for the murder claimed to have been committed by the Irish Republican Army of Martin Blaney in South Tyrone on 6 October; and if he will give details.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his reply to the right hon. Member for Brent, East on 16 June, Official Report, columns 434-35, what has been the result of the investigation into the events leading to the shooting of Francis Bradley in county Derry on 18 February; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 24 October 1986]: On completion of their inquiries into Mr. Bradley's death the Royal Ulster Constabulary submitted a file to the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland, who directed on 29 July that none of the soldiers involved should be prosecuted. A date for an inquest has not yet been arranged.

THE ARTS

Library Services

35. Mr. Forth asked the Minister for the Arts what assessment has been made by his office of the relationship between the amount of public expenditure on local library services and the number of books lent per capita in the various library authorities.

Mr. Luce: I am circulating a table in the Official Report which shows that there is no direct relationship. Much library expenditure is on services other than lending.

Public library authorities in England: expenditure and use per 1,000 day-time population[1] 1984-85

	Total expenditure £	Issues		Requests for loans	Enquiries
		Books	Other media
Counties	6,389	11,976	213·2	125·4	634·3
London including City	12,897	10,581	567·2	175·0	1,258·6
Metropolitan districts	7,589	11,614	361·9	93·6	746·4
England	7,616	11,689	303·0	124·9	740·7

Business Sponsorship

36. Mr. Chapman asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement about progress on encouraging business sponsorship of the arts.

37. Mr. Hayes asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the progress of the business sponsorship of the arts.

Mr. Luce: I am happy to say that business sponsorship of the arts continues to expand. I announced on 15 October the latest award winners under the business sponsorship incentive scheme, which bring the total new money in the first two years of the scheme to some £10·5 million. The scheme has encouraged 356 companies to sponsor the arts for the first time.

Sadler's Wells Theatre

31. Mr. Pavitt asked the Minister for the Arts if he will now make a further statement on the long-term prospects of securing adequate resources for Sadler's Wells theatre.

Mr. Luce: I am cautiously optimistic about Sadler's Well, though it is, of course, for the theatre, as a receiving theatre, to resolve its own funding problems. It has received increased rents from Arts Council clients; and two sponsors, the Digital Equipment Company and Northern Telecom, have come forward with substantial support. I was very glad to be able to add £25,000 to one of those sponsorships from my own business sponsorship incentive scheme.

SCOTLAND

NHS (Tayside)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much has been spent on the National Health Service in Tayside health board in each year since 1980; and if he will express each of these figures using a GDP deflator for constant prices.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:-

Tayside Health Board

	Gross NHS expenditure at cash prices[1] £ million	At 1984-85 prices as measured by GDP deflator £ million
1980-81	119·718	153·670

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the percentage level of rate support grant made available to Dundee district council and Scotland overall in 1980 and at the latest date.

Mr. Ancram: Rate support grant for Dundee was 35·2 per cent. of relevant expenditure, including loan charges, in 1980-81 and 28·5 per cent. of budgeted relevant expenditure in 1986-87. The corresponding figures for Scotland are 57·6 per cent. for 1980-81 and 47 per cent. for 1986-87. The grant figures used for 1986-87 are based on the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) (No. 4) Order 1985. No adjustment has been made for grant penalties since they will be restored if authorities bring their expenditure down to guideline on outturn.

Tayside Regional Council (Expenditure)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the total expediture of Tayside regional council expressed at constant prices in each year since 1982.

Mr. Ancram: Figures for total expenditure by Tayside regional council, excluding loan charges and interest receipts, on services relevant for rate support grant since 1981-82 are set out below. They have been expressed at November 1985 prices.

Total Expenditure	£ million
1981-82	189,040
1982-83	189,827
1983-84	193,063

Primary Postgraduate Courses

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many places on primary postgraduate courses in Scottish colleges of education were unfilled as at 30 September; how many places are still unfilled; and if he will detail the unfilled places college by college.

Mr. John MacKay: When courses commenced at the colleges of education on 6 and 7 October, 17 of the 300 places available on primary postgraduate teacher training courses were unfilled. By 22 October the number had risen to 18, the colleges with unfilled places being Aberdeen (2), Dundee (6), Moray House (9) and St. Andrews (1).

Heart Disease

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many discharges there have been from Scottish hospitals in each of the past three years of patients who had suffered a myocardial infarction.

Mr. John MacKay: The number of discharges of patients with a principal diagnosis of acute myocardial infarction is as follows:

Year	Number
1982	17,814
1983	18,086
[1]1984	18,731

[1] Latest available date.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many deaths were certified in Scotland as due to ischaemic heart disease in 1984, 1985 and so far in 1986.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Deaths from ischaemic heart disease[1] in Scotland

Year	Number
1984	18,107
1985	18,758
1986	[2]9,532

Health Budget

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the health budget was spent on salaries in each of the past 10 years; and how this was divided up between medical, nursing, scientific and technical and administrative staff.

Mr. John MacKay: Information on wages and salaries costs held centrally relates to current expenditure by health boards on the provision of hospital and community health services. The proportion of HCH current expenditure accounted for by wages and salaries in each year since 1978-79 is shown in table 1. Figures for years prior to 1978-79 are not available on a comparable basis. Information on the breakdown of wages and salaries costs is not available in precisely the form requested. A breakdown of these wages and salaries costs over the various staff categories recorded in health boards' annual accounts is given in table 2.

Table 1

	Proportion of HCH current expenditure on salaries and wages Per cent.

Dental Services

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the total cost of general dental services in Scotland was recovered from patients' charges in each of the last five years.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Income from patients' charges as a percentage of gross cost of the General Dental Services

Financial Year	Percentage
1981-82	22·88
1982-83	24·42

Hospital Beds

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total hospital bed complement of the National Health Service at the most recent available date; what has been the net change since 1984; and if he will break down the figures by health board area.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

	30 September 1984	30 September 1985	Net Change
Scotland	59,680	58,946	−734
Argyll and Clyde	4,587	4,525	−62

Sheltered Housing

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total number of sheltered house units in Scotland; and how many of these are modified for wheelchair use.

Mr. Ancram: There were over 21,500 sheltered dwellings in Scotland at 31 March 1986, of which almost 900 have been adapted for wheelchairs.

Strokes

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of patients admitted to hospital in each of the past five years who had suffered a stroke.

Mr. John MacKay: There are no nationally available statistics on the number of admissions to hospital by condition, but the number of patients discharged with a principal diagnosis of cerebrovascular disease is as follows:

	Number
1980	14,557
1981	15,151
1982	14,711
1983	15,678
[1]1984	15,874

[1]latest available date

These figures relate to episodes of care in hospital, so a patient with more than one such episode will be counted on each occasion.

Operations (Statistics)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) renal transplants, (b) coronary by-pass operations, (c) cataract extractions and (d) hip joint replacement operations were carried out in Scotland in 1985; and what are the figures for 1986 so far.

Mr. John MacKay: The information for the latest years available in each case, is as follows:

(a) renal transplants 1985—126
(b) coronary by-pass operations 1985—1,186
(c) cataract extractions 1984—6,806
(d) hip joint replacement operations 1984—2,877.

Figures for 1986 are not yet available.

Urban Aid

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to reply to the Ruchill community project, Glasgow, about its representations to him on urban aid funding.

Mr. Ancram: There is no record in the Scottish Office of any such representations having been received.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of jobs in Scotland presently funded through the urban aid programme.

Mr. Ancram: A total of 1,922 full-time and 839 part-time jobs are at present directly funded under urban programme projects.

Agricultural Colleges

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many members of staff will be made redundant at each Scottish college of agriculture and at each agricultural research institute in Scotland during 1987; what levels of staff will exist in each college and institute at the end of 1987 compared with the present; and what compensation for redundancy is being offered to those whose contractual age of retirement is 65 years.

Mr. John MacKay: The total number of redundancies announced to date, to take effect from 31 March 1987, are as follows:

	Number
Scottish Agricultural Colleges
East of Scotland College of Agriculture	11
North of Scotland College of Agriculture	Nil
West of Scotland Agricultural College	2
Scottish Agricultural Research Institutes
Scottish Institute for Agricultural Engineering	24
Macaulay Institute for Soil Research	12

The position remains under review but it is not possible to project the likely staffing levels required by the end of 1987.

While redundancy procedures, including compensation payments, do not apply to staff over 60 years of age certain members of the colleges' staff in that age category, with terms and conditions of employment up to age 65, have been advised that they will be retired early. This follows a request from the unions concerned that college management should apply the conditions of the Civil Service model redundancy agreement which require a review of the age of retirement practice within the area concerned before other staff savings are made.

Community Charge

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received about the position of mentally handicapped members of family households being allowed exemption from the community charges or part thereof; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The director of the Scottish Society for the Mentally Handicapped wrote to my right hon. and learned Friend on 16 October on this point among others. All the views expressed in response to the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" will be carefully taken into account in the formulation of the Government's legislative proposals.

Loan Companies

Mr. Michael Cocks and the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will request local authorities to take steps to prevent private loan companies from operating on their housing estates to pressurise tenants into taking out loans with them to exercise their right to buy their houses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no complaints about private loan companies operating on local authority estates in Scotland and he has no plans to take the action proposed.

Medical Care, Dundee

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice his Department offers to the British Medical Association, the British Dental Association, and the British Pharmaceutical Society to ensure that adequate general practitioner, dental and pharmacy facilities are provided in estates north of the Kingsway, Dundee.

Mr. John MacKay: None.

Teachers (Courses)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the intake for secondary teaching qualification courses at Dundee college of education in each year since 1981.

Mr. John Mackay: The intakes to secondary teaching qualification courses at Dundee college of education from 1981 to date are as set out in the following table:

	Number of intakes
1981	99
1982	79
1983	60
1984	45
1985	45

ENERGY

Coal Industry

5. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he will next meet the chairman of British Coal to discuss the present state of the coal industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: I meet the chairman of British Coal regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

15. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the new chairman of the National Coal Board, he will raise with him the board's policy towards the reinstatement of sacked miners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the dismissal and re-employment of employees is a matter entirely for the management of British Coal.

22. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his latest assessment of the effect on the United Kingdom of the new European Economic Community rules on state aid to the coal industry.

Mr. David Hunt: The effect on the United Kingdom of the European Community state aids decision is, as the Government intended, to allow us to continue to give essential financial support to the National Coal Board without breaking our treaty obligations.

24. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of the National Coal Board; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. David Hunt: My right hon. Friend and I have regular meetings with the chairman of British Coal, in which we discuss a range of coal related issues.

26. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will outline Government policy towards coal production in the light of present and foreseeable oil prices.

Mr. David Hunt: Coal has a major role to play in meeting the nation's long-term fuel requirements provided it can be produced efficiently, reliably and at prices which are fully competitive with those of other fuels.

29. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of British Coal; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. David Hunt: My right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of British Coal at regular intervals, and discuss a wide variety of issues concerning the coal industry.

Energy Efficiency Year

6. Mr. Ground asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress of Energy Efficiency Year.

Mr. Peter Walker: Energy Efficiency Year is proving to be an outstanding success. The target of 1,000 events has already been beaten. The number of firms taking advantage of our survey schemes has increased by 40 per cent. Those using our main industrial schemes will save industry £500 million in energy costs. Two hundred thousand homes will have been insulated by voluntary groups.

25. Mr. Ashby asked the Secretary of State for Energy what further initiatives his Department has taken to promote Energy Efficiency Year.

Mr. David Hunt: On 10 September my right hon. Friend launched the autumn Monergy campaign which features striking new TV and press advertising, local newspaper features and special promotions. A free 38 page magazine called "Monergy News" has been produced and will have a 1·5 million distribution through builders merchants, do-it-yourself superstores and other outlets and in response to requests generated by the Monergy advertisements.

Energy efficiency related events, which have already passed our original target of 1,000 events are continuing and I look forward to my Department's national energy management conference and exhibition in December as being a fitting climax to the year's activities.

British Gas

11. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he next proposes to meet the chairman of British Gas to discuss the development of substituted natural gas.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I regularly meet the chairman of British Gas plc to discuss matters concerning the gas industry.

14. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement on marketing plans for British Gas.

Mr. Peter Walker: The sale of British Gas is on course for late November and shows every sign of being the most popular flotation ever.

Offshore Supplies Office

12. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to review the workings of the Offshore Supplies Office; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The Offshore Supplies Office will continue to support the activities of the offshore supplies industry.

Energy Efficiency

13. Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the savings to date which industry and commerce have secured through energy efficiency measures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Energy efficiency measures undertaken by industry and commerce are currently leading to savings of more than £500 million a year. The potential for savings in industry and commerce is, however, £2 billion per year and much more needs to be done.

Gas Prices

17. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last discussed gas prices with the chairman of the British Gas Corporation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Prices are a matter for the commercial judgment of British Gas plc within the framework of the Gas Act 1986 and the authorisation issued to the company on 23 August.

North Sea Oil

18. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will report on and estimate the current and projected levels respectively, of North sea related development work, with particular reference to the implications for the oil-related construction industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: So far this year I have approved 12 new projects. More than £2 billion is likely to be spent on their developmnent. Eighty thousand tonnes of fabrication work worth £200 million have been awarded this year to United Kingdom industry.

Tidal Power

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about his Department's support for tidal power.

Mr. David Hunt: As my right hon. Friend announced on 9 July the Department of Energy's programme of research and development on tidal energy comprises: advanced investigations and site exploration of a Severn barrage near to Cardiff and Weston-super-Mare; support towards the cost of studies into a barrage across the Mersey estuary conducted by the Mersey Barrage Company; a set of generic tidal energy studies complementary to these two major projects.

Wind Power

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Energy what support his Department has given to wind power; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department has spent some £17 million, since 1979, on research and development into the harnessing of wind power for electricity generation. Most of this support has been directed to the development of large wind turbines for United Kingdom grid operation and includes major projects on Orkney and at Carmarthen Bay.

Nuclear Reactors

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many foreign civil nuclear reactors are within 250 miles and 500 miles, respectively, of the shores of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Goodlad: The publicly available figures on the siting of power reactors in Europe show that there are some 140 civil power reactors in operation or under construction within 500 miles of the United Kingdom shore. Of these some 60 are within 250 miles of the United Kingdom's shores.

Northumberland Coalfield

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has any plans to visit the Northumberland coalfield.

Mr. David Hunt: I make frequent visits to the coalfields, and visited Westoe colliery, near Durham on 13 July. I hope to make a further visit to the north-east area in the near future.

Oil and Gas Reserves

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the most up-to-date estimate of United Kingdom oil and gas reserves.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The most up-to-date estimate of United Kingdom remaining discovered oil reserves are 750 to 1,880 million tonnes of oil and gas reserves 648 to 2,015 billion cubic metres of gas.

British Coal (House Sales)

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the average price paid for houses sold by British Coal during the last 12 months.

Mr. David Hunt: This is a management matter for British Coal.

Coal Conversion Scheme

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has any plans to extend the coal conversion scheme beyond June 1987.

Mr. David Hunt: There are no plans to extend the coal firing scheme beyond 30 June 1987.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

South Africa

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what respect residents of Bophuthatswana and other republics situated within the boundaries of the Republic of South Africa are treated differently from South Africans by Her Majesty's embassy in Pretoria in respect of passports, visas and immigration control.

Mrs. Chalker: We do not recognise any of the so-called homelands in South Africa as independent states. All applications on consular and entry clearance matters are treated accordingly.

South Korea

Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom's ambassador designate to Seoul has been instructed to increase the priority given to securing protection for British intellectual property rights to the level that his American counterpart accords the issue on behalf of American rightholders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: This matter was indeed one of the main issues which the new ambassador to Korea was briefed to raise with Ministers. It has already been the subject of strong representations here and in Seoul. Most recently it was raised by my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade with his Korean counterpart on 20 October.

China (Government Bonds)

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 18 July at column 644-45, what detailed proposals have been made by the Chinese People's Republic to repay their pre-1948 debts to British bondholders; if the matter was discussed with the Chinese authorities during his recent visit to China; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I have nothing to add to the answer that I gave my hon. Friend on 18 July 1986.

Chile

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many times in the last year Her Majesty's Government has made representations to the Chilean Government concerning the political situation in the country.

Mr. Eggar: We made frequent and repeated representations to the Government of Chile, both bilateral and with our EC partners, about the political situation there.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information his Department has on human rights violations in Chile.

Mr. Eggar: We liaise closely with human rights organisations based in Chile, Geneva and elsewhere. We take every suitable opportunity to make our concerns known to the Chilean Government about their continuing poor human rights record.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has for the provision of supplies to St. Helena in the event of the Royal Mail Ship St. Helena being denied facilities at Cape Town, Republic of South Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: We are satisfied that, if required, alterations to the present service could be made to safeguard essential passenger and cargo movements to and from St. Helena.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many St. Helenians have attended university after completing their schooling on St. Helena in the last six years for which figures are available.

Mr. Eggar: None.

Jonathan Wash

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information his Department has received to date from the Government of the Ivory Coast in connection with the death of Jonathan Wash of Ipswich.

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received from the Government of the Ivory Coast about the circumstances of the death of Mr. Jonathan Wash there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: We have received a report on the post mortem examination carried out in the Ivory Coast shortly after the death took place. The investigation by the Ivory Coast authorities into the cause of Mr. Wash's death has not been completed. We expect to receive a report in due course.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether his Department has yet received a questionnaire from either the Minister of Justice of the Ivory Coast or the examining magistrate in connection with the investigation into the death of Jonathan Wash of Ipswich.

Mr. Eggar: No such questionnaire or other request for evidence has been received.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations has he made to the Government of the Ivory Coast concerning the inquiry into the death of Mr. Jonathan Wash, with specific reference to co-operation between the police forces of the United Kingdom and the Ivory Coast.

Mr. Eggar: We have repeatedly expressed our concern to the Ivorian authorities at the delay in completing the investigation. No request for information or assistance has been made by the police authorities in the Ivory Coast.

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what action has been taken or is being taken by the Turks and Caicos Islands to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the Campbell and Cosans case;

(2) what action has been taken or is being taken by Montserrat to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the Campbell and Cosans case;

(3) what action has been taken or is being taken by Bermuda to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the Campbell and Cosans case;

(4) what action has been taken or is being taken by the British Virgin Islands to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the Campbell and Cosans case;

(5) what action has been taken or is being taken by the Cayman Islands to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the Campbell and Cosans case.

Mr. Eggar: None.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action has been taken or is being taken by St. Helena to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the Campbell and Cosans case.

Mr. Eggar: The relevant local legislation is at present under review.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action has been taken or is being taken by Gibraltar to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the Campbell and Cosans case.

Mr. Eggar: None. It is a matter of common school practice that corporal punishment is not administered in schools in Gibraltar.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action has been taken or is being taken by Anguilla to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the Campbell and Cosans case.

Mr. Eggar: A new Education Act is under consideration. The European Court's judgment will be taken into account.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action has been taken or is being taken by the Falkland Islands to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the Campbell and Cosans case.

Mr. Eggar: Education legislation is at present under review.

Entry Clearance Officers (India)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which Indian languages are spoken by the immigration officers being sent to India.

Mr. Eggar: One officer is qualified in Punjabi and one in Gujerati, with a working knowledge of Urdu.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what training in Indian languages his Department proposes to give to each of the new entry clearance officers for India.

Mr. Eggar: There is no operational requirement for such training. Interviews are conducted, where necessary, through local interpreters fluent in the different dialects.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the case load of each entry clearance officer sent to India will be.

Mr. Eggar: It is not possible to predict this, but entry clearance officers are expected to handle many more visit visa applications than they do settlement cases.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs where the 12 new entry clearance officers for India will be stationed; how many interpreters will be allocated to them; what is the cost of each interpreter for entry clearance cases, including his salary; when each of the 12 additional entry clearance officers to be sent to India will arrive; and when they will start work.

Mr. Eggar: Details of the disposition of the new entry clearance officers, who normally start work the day after arrival, are as follows:

	New Delhi	Bombay	Calcutta	Madras
15-27 October	2	3	1	3
28 October		2
9 November	1

Authority has been given to posts to recruit 14 additional locally engaged staff in the interpreter-clerical grade. It has been left to local management to decide how many of the 14 need to be interpreters. The individual cost of each interpreter is not recorded centrally, but their average salary is £2,337 per annum.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will open a consulate in Ahmedabad and station entry clearance officers there.

Mr. Eggar: No.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements are proposed for dealing with emergency applications for visas by relatives of United Kingdom citizens in India, in case of severe illness or death.

Mr. Eggar: Arrangements already exist at all our missions to India for dealing urgently with visa applications in cases of genuine emergency, such as illness or bereavement.

Immigration

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what facilities will be made available for Members of Parliament to intervene in emergencies for Indian relatives of United Kingdom citizens who wish to obtain visas.

Mr. Eggar: I am always happy to assist in cases of genuine emergency and to pass on to our missions overseas requests for assistance. In normal circumstances visitors are advised to apply well in advance.

Cyprus

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any recent representations have been made to the Turkish Government about the presence of Turkish military forces in Northern Cyprus; and if he will state Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the continued presence of such forces in Cyprus.

Mr. Eggar: We have made clear to all parties to the dispute our view that the withdrawal of foreign troops from the Republic of Cyprus must form part of a comprehensive settlement to the Cyprus problem. We believe the United Nations Secretary General is best placed to help make progress towards that end. We will continue actively to support his efforts and encourage the parties to the dispute, including the Turkish Government, to co-operate with him.

Diplomatic Documents (Sale)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he intends to take action to prohibit the sale of diplomatic passports, visas and honorary consulships by British-based companies.

Mr. Howard: I have been asked to reply. I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

TRANSPORT

Motorways (Repairs)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport what road works are in progress on the M1 motorway between London and Leicester; how long each has been in progress; and when each is scheduled to be completed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is as follows:

Site	Scheme	Start date	Programmed completion date
J1-2	Drainage work	23 October 1986	6 November 1986
J8	Major renewal	23 May 1986	7 November 1986
J11	Major renewal	29 June 1986	5 November 1986
J14-15	Major renewal	19 August 1986	11 November 1986

In addition, minor repairs take place from time to time. Work on the installation of additional matrix signals and incident detectors will also continue for the next six months.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further roadworks are planned for the M1 motorway between London and Leicester; when it is intended that such roadworks will commence; and when they will be completed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The following further roadworks are planned in 1986-87:

Site	Scheme	Start date	Programmed completion date
J5	Carriageway repairs	28 October 1986	1 November 1986
J10	Repairs to hard shoulders drainage and safety barriers	February 1987	March 1987
J11	Centre reserve repairs	Early 1987	Yet to be determined
J12	Bridge testing	24 November 1986	22 December 1986
J12-13	Cable survey	5 January 1987	26 January 1987

Minor repairs will also take place from time to time.

Further works will take place in future years; the programme for these has not yet been finalised.

Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company (Grant)

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much of his Department's financial grant to the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company for improvement in rail facilities has already been advanced.

Mr. David Mitchell: A formal offer of grant was made to the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company on 8 January 1986. As with all section 8 grants, the Company is expected to claim the grant in instalments as work is completed; so far no grant has been claimed.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether any inquiry was undertaken into the environmental consequences of his Department's financial grant to the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company for railway improvement.

Mr. David Mitchell: As is always the case with section 8 grant applications, a thorough assessment was made of the environmental benefits of switching traffic from road to rail.

Freight Trains (Speed Limits)

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will introduce regulations to restrict the speed of freight trains running through built-up areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. The day-to-day operation of the railways is the responsibility of the British Railways board and I have no powers to intervene.

St. Pancras-Sheffield line

Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent proposals have been submitted to him by British Rail for investment in the St. Pancras-Sheffield line.

Mr. David Mitchell: None.

M1-A1 (Inquiry)

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce the result of the M1-A1 inquiry.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport expect to announce their decision around the turn of the year.

British Rail

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many staff are employed by British Rail in each of their regions; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. David Mitchell: This is of course a matter for British Rail management but I understand from them that the information requested is as follows:

British Rail manpower figures, by Region

	Eastern	London Midland	Scottish	Southern	Western
1979	48,398	50,632	18,997	30,714	24,076
1980	46,801	49,471	18,939	30,047	23,561
1981	44,171	45,885	17,397	28,947	22,009
1982	41,929	43,519	16,999	27,659	20,883
1983	39,836	41,655	16,493	27,069	20,022
1984	37,378	39,609	15,851	26,446	18,752
1985	35,954	38,397	15,445	25,782	18,248
[1]1986	35,571	38,054	15,272	25,858	18,123

[1] As at 18 October 1986.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much has been invested by British Rail in each of its regions on improving rolling-stock and stations in each year since 1979.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Government do not keep records of this sort. It would, in any case, be impossible to apportion BR's rolling stock accurately between regions as much of it operates in more than one region.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether any railway stations are liable to be closed as a result of the introduction of radio signalling on British Rail.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that the British Railways Board has no plans to propose the closure of any railway stations as a result of radio signalling.

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received about privatising parts of British Rail.

Mr. David Mitchell: None. Following the privatisation of British Rail's ancillary activities in hotels, ferries and hovercraft services, the emphasis now is on measures to broaden the participation of the private sector in supplying services to the railway. The objectives which we have recently given to the BR chairman ask him to establish specific programmes to this end.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what subsidy is being paid to British Rail in the current financial year: what subsidy is proposed for the next three years; how this compares with the subsidies paid in each year since 1974-75 in real and money terms ; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Total subsidy for British Rail in 1986-87, including central government PSO grant, payments from passenger transport executives under section 20 of the Transport Act 1968 and level crossing grant is at present estimated at roundly £810 million, of which central Government's PSO grant settlement is £712·3 million. The central government PSO grant target for 1989-90 is £555 million in 1986-87 prices. Levels of PSO grant in intervening years will depend on the board's claims, as will future levels of level crossing grant. Future levels of PTE section 20 payments are the responsibility of the passenger transport authorities.

Comparable figures since 1975 are as follows:

Subsidy payments to British Rail (Central Government PSO grant, PTE section 20 payments and level crossing grant)

£ million

	Cash	1986-87 prices
1975	325	949
1976	334	849
1977	372	830
1978	441	884
1979	545	954
1980	649	949
1981	829	1,087
1982	909	1,106
1983	952	1,103
[1]1984-85	957	1,052
1985-86	914	948
1986-87	811	811

[1] Grant for 15 months to end March 1986 multiplied by 0·8

These figures demonstrate the railway's remarkable achievement in bringing grant back in real terms to the levels of the mid-1970s. We have now set objectives which will secure the future of the network with higher quality, while maintaining improvements in cost effectiveness.

M25 Motorway

Mr. Peter Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will direct that in the tendering process for the widening of the M25, Chertsey-Staines section, particular consideration be given to the provision of concrete safety barriers in the median reserve which will be unusually narrow;

(2) if, when seeking tenders for the widening of the M25, Chertsey-Staines section, he will ensure that competitive quotations for the provision of both steel and concrete safety barriers are obtained.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Consultants are being appointed to prepare detailed proposals for the provision of additional traffic lanes between junctions 11 and 13. When we have their report and have decided how to proceed, the provision of safety barriers will be considered in the light of the Department's standards at the time.

There is sufficient land for a normal width central reservation.

Pedestrianisation

Sir George Young asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he plans to publish further advice for local authorities on pedestrianisation schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Traffic-free streets can help create a pleasanter environment in many shopping and residential areas. They must, however, be well planned to cater for necessary traffic and parking and to allow access including that by people with walking difficulties. We are updating our guide for local authorities "Pedestrian Schemes — Getting the Right Balance" and are now seeking the views of interested bodies about this. Once we have their views, we hope to publish the revised note shortly after.

London Coach Terminals

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the present volume of interchange at London coach terminals for passengers in transit to other locations outside London.

Mr. David Mitchell: The consultants carrying out LRT's coach terminal study have found that nearly a quarter of the total number of coach passengers arriving at Victoria coach station are "interlining" between coaches.

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is his Department's role in the consideration of prospective sites for London coach terminals;

(2) who will be the developer of the proposed new London coach terminal at Vauxhall bridge;

(3) if it is intended that the proposed new London coach terminal should be privately owned and operated;

(4) what is the role of London Regional Transport in the development consortium for the proposed new London coach terminal at Vauxhall bridge;

(5) if London Regional Transport is financially involved in the proposed development of a new London coach terminal at Vauxhall bridge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: In June last year, my right hon. Friend's predecessor asked LRT to undertake a study of current and future terminal requirements for long distance coaches in London. LRT is now consulting interested parties on its findings, and will submit its final report to us once that process has finished. We will then make decisions on the best way forward.

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to which private coach operators have expressed a financial interest in the development of a new London coach terminal at Vauxhall bridge.

Mr. David Mitchell: We are not aware of any expressions of interest by coach operators in developing, as opposed to using, a new terminal at Vauxhall.

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what additional roadworks will be required to accommodate the proposed new London coach terminal at Vauxhall (a) on the immediate vicinity of the site and (b) elsewhere in London;

(2) what estimates have been made of the result of additional traffic generated by the location of a new London coach terminus at Vauxhall Bridge on the rate of traffic flows, noise and congestion in the area of Vauxhall Cross, with particular reference to Vauxhall bridge foot, Kennington lane, Nine Elms lane, South Lambeth road, Wandsworth road and the Albert embankment;

(3) what estimates have now been made of the combined net effect on traffic flows for the road systems and bridges between Blackfriars bridge and Chelsea bridge of the location of: (a) a Channel fixed link international terminal at Waterloo Station and (b) the proposed London coach terminal at Vauxhall bridge.

Mr. David Mitchell: A new London coach terminal is currently the subject of a consultation exercise by LRT on alternative sites. LRT's consultants' estimates are set down in their interim report, in particular in chapter 6. A copy has been placed in the Library.

As regards the Channel tunnel terminal, British Rail has commissioned from Sir Alexander Gibb and Partners a report on the impact of the generated road traffic in the Waterloo area. Copies of this report have been sent to the local authorities concerned, and I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Transport what will be the approximate costs of developing the proposed new London coach terminal at Vauxhall including (a) private investment costs and (b) public investment in roads and infrastructure.

Mr. David Mitchell: An approximate figure of £48 million for the capital costs of developing a new London coach terminal at Vauxhall was given in the interim report by LRT's consultants for the coach terminal study, a copy of which has been placed in the Library. I understand that the consultants are presently undertaking further work on cost estimates.

Urban Roads

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the report of the standing advisory committee on trunk road assessment review of urban road appraisal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The committee's report is published today together with the Government's response to it. Copies of both documents have been placed in the Library of the House. The Government are grateful to Professor Williams and his committee for their work, which represents a further step in the continuing development of assessment methods.

The report provides a foundation of broad principles on which to develop and refine appraisal methods for both urban and inter-urban trunk roads. Some of the recommendation can be applied immediately because of the flexibility which already exists in the Department's methods, which the committee has recognised and built upon. Since the report sets out principles rather than detailed prescriptions, much further work needs to be done before many of its recommendations can be applied to scheme assessment. I therefore do not expect the progress of existing schemes to be held up to await the outcome of such further work. As revised guidance is issued, this will be adopted in the preparation and assessment of urban and inter-urban schemes as appropriate. My Department will continue to keep its methods under review and to introduce improvements where possible.

Self Changing Gears

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about British Rail Engineering Ltd's purchasing policy regarding the axle drive units for the new Sprinter train and the implications of that decision for Self Changing Gears.

Mr. David Mitchell: The purchasing policy of British Rail and its subsidiaries, agreed by Ministers, is based on competitive procurement. The implementation of that policy is a matter for the board.

Traffic Corridors (London)

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now publish the reports of the consultants whom his predessor commissioned in November 1984 to undertake studies in the four corridors, Blackwall to Archway, the south circular, Earls Court to Gunnersbury, and Brixton to Croydon and Purley, respectively.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I hope to do so before long.

Gatwick (Second Terminal)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the second terminal at Gatwick will be opened; what are the reasons for the delay in opening this terminal; and what steps are being taken to cope with the traffic at Gatwick in summer, 1987, as a result of the delay in bringing terminal 2 into operation.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I will answer this question shortly.

A1/M1 Link Road

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the inspector's report on the A1/M1 link road; and how soon thereafter he intends to come to a decision.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The inspector's report was received in July. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport expect to announce their decision about the turn of the year.

London Regional Transport

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many route miles have been run on London Regional Transport's underground and bus services in the last six years for which figures are available.

Mr. David Mitchell: Figures are published in London Regional Transport's annual reports. The number of route miles in each of the last six years were:

Route miles

	Underground	Bus
Calendar year
1980	241	1,750
1981	241	1,750
1982	241	1,710
1983	241	1,710
1984	241	1,730
Fiscal year
1984-85	241	1,730
1985-86	245	[1]1,700

[1] The figures for 1985-86 exclude services operated for LRT by operators other than London Buses Limited, which when included would give 1,735 route miles.

A better indication of the level of service provided is given by vehicle miles run. The numbers of vehicle miles in each of the last six years were:

Vehicle miles

Millions

	Underground	Bus
Calendar year
1980	30·5	173
1981	30·7	174
1982	29·0	164
1983	29·0	163
1984	29·3	166
Fiscal year
1984-85	29·4	166
1985-86	29·7	[1]162

[1] The figures for 1985-86 exclude services operated for LRT by operators other than London Buses Limited, which when included would give 163 million vehicle miles.

Parked Vehicles (Lights)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with current standards and practice of the lighting of parked vehicles at night on roads where such lights are required.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I recognise my hon. Friend's concern. I should be happy to look into any specific problem he has in mind.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

World Bank (Meeting)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of his meeting with the president of the World Bank on 20 October.

Mr. Chris Patten: I had a useful meeting with Mr. Conable. We discussed a number of important issues, including the possibility of a new general capital increase to increase the lending capacity of the bank; the current negotiations for the eighth replenishment of the International Development Association; and the environmental aspects of the bank's development projects and programmes.

PRIME MINISTER

Spending Commitments

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister if she will itemise and specify the cost of all spending commitments announced publicly by Ministers since 25 July.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be announcing the Government's expenditure plans for the next three years in his autumn statement. More detailed figures will be published in the public expenditure White Paper early next year.

Mr. Adley asked the Prime Minister if the speech by the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government, the hon. Member of Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) on 14 October, on planning, represents Government policy; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Yes. My hon. Friend's speech reiterated Government policy on planning and large new stores, and our firm and long-established policy on protection of the Green Belt.

EC (Agricultural Expenditure)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister what steps have been taken by the European Council to seek to ensure that its decision of 4 December 1984 on the claiming back in future years of overspending on agriculture above the agreed level of increase, is implemented; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: 1986 is the first year in which the budget discipline conclusions will apply to agricultural spending. They state that in the event of failure to respect the financial guideline the Council shall, during the following two financial years, ensure that, barring unusual developments, agricultural expenditure is brought back within the limits imposed by the guideline. The 1987 draft budget provides 23 becu for agricultural guarantee expenditure which is at the level of the financial guideline.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister what steps have been taken by the European Council to seek to ensure that its decision of 4 December 1984 that agricultural spending should increase only by the natural increase in their own resources base, is implemented; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The conclusions of the Council on budgetary discipline which limits the increase in agricultural market support expenditure to no more than the rate of growth of the own resources base, also makes specific provision that account has to be taken of exceptional circumstances. 1986 is the first year in which the Budget discipline conclusions will apply to agricultural spending.

The Ecofin Council on 7 July agreed that the limit on agricultural spending in 1986 could be increased by the "amounts which can be justified mainly by the exceptional circumstances of the abnormally large depreciation of the dollar."

The 1987 draft budget provides 23 becu for expenditure on agricultural market support which is at the financial guideline.

Regional Development

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on co-ordination between the Department of Trade and Industry and the Welsh Office on the Government's submission to the European Economic Community entitled "United Kingdom Regional Development Programme 1986-1990", in so far as it relates to the economy of Wales.

The Prime Minister: "Section 8 — Wales" of the United Kingdom regional development programme 1986-90 was compiled by the Welsh Office on the basis of submissions from local and public authorities in Wales, together with largely statistically based information held within the Department. The Department of Trade and Industry co-ordinated the preparation of the full programme document, in consultation with all interested Departments, including the Welsh Office.

Mr. Marmaduke Hussey

Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister which people outside Her Majesty's Government were consulted before she recommended to Her Majesty the appointment of Mr. Marmaduke Hussey as chairman of the British Broadcasting Corporation.

The Prime Minister: It is not the practice to disclose what consultations, if any, precede recommendations to Her Majesty about the apppointment of the chairman of the BBC.

EMPLOYMENT

Wages Councils

Mr. Frank Field asked the Paymaster General if he will list each occasion since 1979 when he or a member of the Government has written to a wages council about the level of wage settlements in that sector; and if he will give details of each such initiative.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The then Secretary of State wrote to the chairmen of the retail food and allied trades and the retail trades (non-food) wages councils on 25 February 1983, and to the chairman of the unlicensed place of refreshment wages council on 9 August 1983, about proposals published by those councils for increases in statutory minimum rates. These letters pointed out the potentially damaging effects on businesses and jobs if the proposals were confirmed, and asked the councils to give serious consideration to representations against the proposals.

The full text of the first two letters was given in answer to a question from the hon. Member on 31 March 1983 (columns 243-44). I shall be pleased to send him a copy of the last one if he so wishes.

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Park asked the Paymaster General how many applications there were to industrial tribunals for unfair dismissal due to trade union membership or trade union activities for the years 1983, 1984 and 1985; how many cases were heard in each year; and in how many such cases the claimant was successful.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The best information available is as follows:

	1983	1984	1985
Number of applications	357	403	864
Number of applications withdrawn/ settlement agreed	225	253	414
Applications heard by Industrial Tribunals	132	150	179
Number of successful applicants	21	21	58

Mr. Park asked the Paymaster General how many applications there were to industrial tribunals for unfair dismissal due to non-membership of a trade union for the years 1983, 1984 and 1985; how many cases were heard in each year; and in how many such cases the claimant was successful.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The best information available is as follows:

	1983	1984	1985
Number of applications	15	24	4
Number of applications withdrawn/ settlement agreed	8	19	1
Applications heard by Industrial Tribunals	7	5	4
Number of successful applicants	3	0	0

War Pensioners

Mr. Corbett asked the Paymaster General if he will estimate the number of war pensioners under retirement age who are unemployed.

Mr. Lee: This information is not available.

Fraud

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Paymaster General how many officers are employed in England and Wales by his Department in investigating fraud; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: My Department's fraud investigation work was reorganised in 1984 and comparative figures for earlier years are not available.

The number of staff employed is as follows:

Year	Number
1984	696
1985	821
1986 September	1,083

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Paymaster General what is his estimate of the ratio of current costs of his deprtment's investigation into fraud to the benefits recouped; and what are the figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: My Department's investigation work was reorganised in 1984 and comparative figures for earlier years are not available. The ratios requested are as follows:

1984-85 1:2·4
1985-86 1:2·9
currently 1:4·0

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Paymaster General what has been the percentage change in the value of unentitled benefits recouped per Department of Employment investigating officer since 1979.

Mr. Lee: My Department's investiagtion work was reorganised in 1984 and comparative figures for earlier years are not available. There has been 46·7 per cent. increase in the value of unentitled benefits recouped per investigator between 1984 and 1986.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Paymaster General what has been the average change in the value of unentitled benefits recouped per Department of Employment investigating officer in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: My Department's investigation work was reorganised in 1984 and comparative figures for earlier years are not available. The average change in value for each year since is as follows:

1984 = £49,450
1985 = £73,000
1986 = £92,700

Trades Union Congress

Mr. Ewing asked the Paymaster General what was the cost to public funds of his attendance at the recent Trades Union Congress.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Approximately £220, including travelling costs and the costs incurred by my private secretary.

Tourism

Mr. Adley asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on recent trends in the tourism industry.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Jobs in the main tourism sectors have grown by 22 per cent. between 1975 and 1985 to just over 1·25 million, with some 43,000 new jobs created last year alone. Following record levels of incoming tourism in 1985, the number of visitors to the United Kingdom in the first seven months of 1986 fell by 7 per cent. compared with the same period last year. However, spending by overseas visitors has fallen by only 3 per cent. We have no firm predictions for the rest of the year, but the British tourist authority and British Airways have reported that forward bookings are back to normal levels. The Government firmly believe that tourism has excellent prospects of long-term growth and the decline earlier this year in visitors from North America was merely a temporary setback.

City Action Teams

Dr. Cunningham asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the first 18 months' work of the five city action teams, giving details of the officials and individuals involved in each team.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The city action teams have been successful at meeting their objectives of better co-ordinating Government action and help in the urban priority areas they cover. They pursue Government urban policy objectives to reduce the number of people in acute housing stress, reduce the number of derelict sites and void buildings and increase job opportunities and the employability of certain groups. Total Government provision for expenditure in the priority areas related to these objectives was estimated in 1985-86 to amount to around £670 million. The Government have provided an additional £1 million to the Newcastle-Gateshead city action team to provide pump-priming finance as part of its response to the recent shipbuilding closures in the north-east.

The teams comprise the regional directors.

Birmingham

Mr. A. J. Pryor, Director, West Midlands Region, Department of Trade and Industry (Leader); Mr. M. Raff, Director, West Midlands Region, Employment and Enterprise Group MSC; Mr. H. Ellis-Rees, CB, Director, Midlands Regions, Department of the Environment.

Liverpool

Mr. D. C. Renshaw, Director Merseyside Task Force, Department of the Environment (Leader); Mr. R. Phillips, Director, North West Region, Employment and Enterprise Group MSC; Mr. R. M. Anderson, Deputy Director, North West Region, Department of Trade and Industry.

London

Mr. P. McQuail, Director, London Region, Department of the Environment (Leader); Mr. J. B. Passingham, Acting Director, London Region, Employment and Enterprise Group MSC; Mr. A. Mantle, Director, London and South East Region, Department of Trade and Industry.

Manchester/Salford

Mr. M. Baker, Director, North West Region, Department of Trade and Industry (Leader); Mr. R. Phillips, Director, North West Region, Employment and Enterprise Group MSC; Mr. F. Kendall, Director, North West Region, Department of the Environment.

Newcastle/Gateshead

Mr. P. D. Carr, Director, North East Region, Employment and Enterprise Group MSC (Leader); Mr. A. Balls, Director, North East Region, Department of the Environment; Mr. R. Simpson, Director, North East Region, Department of Trade and Industry.

Loan Companies

Mr. Michael Cocks asked the Paymaster General if he will take steps to seek to protect recipients of unemployment benefit from the activities of private loan companies who seek to pressurise them to take out a loan to clear accumulated debts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: I have received no complaints on this subject. It would not be appropriate for any Minister to attempt to interfere in the private financial circumstances of anyone including recipients of unemployment benefit. However, information about unemployment benefit claims is treated in confidence and is not disclosed to third parties without the written permission of the individual concerned.

CIVIL SERVICE

Rayner Reviews

38. Mr. Favell asked the Minister for the Civil Service what savings are expected in total from the Rayner reviews undertaken to date.

Mr. Luce: Savings already made as a result of Rayner scrutinies are now running at the rate of £300 million a year and further annual savings of £100 million are expected to be made.

Statistical Services

Mr. Frank Field asked the Minister for the Civil Service if she will detail the changes made by each Department following the recommendations in the statistical service, Cmnd. 8236, giving information on the changes made, the size of any reduction in that and the savings to public expenditure; and if she will list any other changes which the Government intend to make.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Minister for the Civil Service if she will update the Government's table "Estimated and Projected Expenditure and Manpower" which appears in "Government Statistical Services" Cmnd. 8236, by detailing which of the changes costed in the column, "Reducation May 1979 to April 1984", has taken place and in additional column, from changes still to take place.

Mr. Luce: By implementing the changes recommended in the White Paper, "Government Statistical Services" (Cmnd 8236), Departments had achieved total annual savings above the target of £26·5 million by April 1984. Departmental savings were nearly all close to or greater than the individual targets given in the table "Estimated and Projected Expenditure and Manpower". During the 1984-85 financial year further savings were made taking the annual savings to some £5 million above the target given in the White Paper.

Comparisons of departmental expenditure on the basis used in the White Paper have become increasingly imprecise due to developments in departmental financial management systems and reorganisation of some areas of work. It is no longer practicable therefore to distinguish current savings following directly from the recommendations in the White Paper.

The statistical service continues to seek economies and value for money. Future improvements are likely to depend increasingly on the exploitation of computers. Between the financial years 1984-85 and 1985-86 further savings were found but were more than offset by increased investment in computer systems and other automatic equipment.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Food Labelling

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects mandatory fat labelling of food to take effect.

Mr. Donald Thompson: We are still in the process of considering the many comments made on the proposed fat labelling of food regulations. We are also in consultation at official level with the Commission of the European Communities. We hope to be able to make a further statement on the proposals shortly.

Religious Slaughter

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will now announce the Government's decision upon the matters contained in the Farm Animal Welfare Council's report on religious slaughter of animals.

Dr. Donald Thompson: We are consulting interested organisations on the council's recommendations. The Government's response will be issued as soon as possible.

EC (Food and Wine Sales)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report details of special sales of food agreed by the management committee of the European Economic Community; and if he will also detail the tonnages of various foodstuffs, the nations to which the sales have been made and the sale prices expressed in sterling per pound, over the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total amount of food and wine respectively sold by the European Economic Community to the Soviet Union and East Europe, respectively in 1985.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Details of the quantities of the main foodstuffs exported in 1985 from the European Economic Community to the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe (excluding the Soviet Union) were contained in the reply of 13 May 1986 (column 443): in total, these exports amounted to 7,693 thousand and 2,000 thousand tonnes respectively. Exports of wine in 1985 were 35 thousand and 28 thousand tonnes respectively.

Live Sheep Exports

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will ban live sheep exports from the United Kingdom to Spain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My Department does not license exports of live sheep (nor any other food animals) to Spain. Spain has not yet implemented European Community safeguards on animal welfare in international transit and at the point of slaughter. We have urged and are urging the Spanish authorities to do so. I understand that they are now working on a measure to implement the relevant EC transport directives. We shall continue to apply pressure to the Spanish authorities until we are completely satisfied on both the transport and slaughter questions.

Ritual Slaughter

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the extent of ritual slaughter in the United Kingdom; what is his policy towards seeking amendments of the law with regard thereto; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Civil Service (Technology)

43. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is satisfied with progress in introducing new technology into the Civil Service.

Mr. Brooke: Yes. Existing computer systems are bringing about substantial improvements in the efficiency and effectiveness of Civil Service operations; service levels to the public; and the job satisfaction of the staff. For the future, extensive plans for the introduction of further systems are well under way; and these will result in additional operational benefits. To achieve this, Civil Service expenditure on IT systems now exceeds £1,000 million annually.

Inland Revenue (Computerisation)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether an occupational requirement for the Inland Revenue national taxpayer tracing system has been completed; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make a statement on the pilot scheme for the Inland Revenue national taxpayer tracing scheme including its duration and date of completion;

(3) if he will make a statement on the operation of advanced CAFS option in the Inland Revenue national taxpayer tracing system;

(4) if he will make a statement on the network of landline communications that will be used in the Inland Revenue national taxpayer tracing system;

(5) if he will make a statement on the functions for which the landline communications network of the Inland Revenue national taxpayer tracing system will be used.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The national taxpayer tracing system forms part of the Inland Revenue's computerisation programme. It is an index of taxpayers' names, addresses, national insurance numbers and tax reference numbers. It will enable Inland Revenue staff to establish, where necessary, which local office deals with a taxpayer's affairs. Access will be limited to authorised Inland Revenue staff.

The system makes use of an ICL product called CAFS which provides a means of searching through large quantities of information quickly.

An experimental system, intended to evaluate the technology, is currently operating at centre 1, the office dealing with pay-as-you-earn for Scotland. The intention, subject to the success of the experiment, and a further pilot in the west Midlands starting in the spring, is to extend the system to the remaining tax districts in the United Kingdom during 1987, using the Inland Revenue data communications network.

This network provides links between local offices and computer centres, and between those centres. It is a private network, not accessible from outside the Inland Revenue.

European Monetary System

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what additional powers would be exercised by the Bank of England in the event of the United Kingdom joining the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system.

Mr. Ian Stewart: None.

Federal Excise Tax Relief

Sir William Clark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, under the provisions of the tax convention with the United States of America, S.I., 1980, No. 568, the federal excise tax relief available is limited to United Kingdom residents only.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Yes.

Civil Service (Union Activities)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy with regard to the provision of time off for trade union activities within the Civil Service, and in particular for the holding of workplace ballots.

Mr. Brooke: Reasonable requests for time off are allowed for trade union activities, including voting at the workplace in union elections, under the Civil Service national Whitley council agreement on facilities.

Value Added Tax

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the ratio of current employment costs of value added tax control officers to undeclared value added tax discovered and recouped; and what are the figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Brooke: The ratio of current employment costs of value added tax control officers to underdeclared value added tax discovered is 1:6·9. This figure is for the financial year ending 31 March 1986. The corresponding figures for each financial year ending 31 March since 1979 are as follows:

	Ratio
1979	1:1·4
1980	1:1·7
1981	1:2·8
1982	1:2·9
1983	1:5·1
1984	1:5·4
1985	1:6·0

The amount of underdeclared tax actually recouped is not available. However, approximately 99 per cent. of all declared and assessed tax is collected each year.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many value added tax control officers are at present employed in England and Wales; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Brooke: I regret that separate figures for the number of value added tax control officers employed in England and Wales are not available and the information requested would be disproportionately expensive to calculate.

However, figures for the United Kingdom as a whole, for the financial year ending 31 March, are as follows:

	Number
1979	4,000
1980	3,700
1981	3,600
1982	3,800
1983	3,550
1984	3,650
1985	3,900
1986	4,040

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the percentage rise in the value of underdeclarations of value added tax discovered per value added tax control officer since 1979.

Mr. Brooke: The percentage rise since 1 April 1979 after allowing for inflation is 368 per cent.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average increase in the value of underdeclarations of value added tax discovered per value added tax control officer in each year since 1979.

Mr. Brooke: The increases year by year in the average value of underdeclarations discovered by each value added tax control officer are as follows (figures relate to the financial year ending 31 March):—

1980	7,450
1981	17,850
1982	3,950
1983	38,350
1984	4,850
1985	12,800
1986	22,300

Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many posts in Her Majesty's Customs and Excise arise from the need to collect and administer value added tax.

Mr. Brooke: The number of full-time staff directly employed on the collection and administration of value added tax, including staff employed on fraud and revenue accounting was 10,849 at 31 March 1986. A further 275 posts have been allocated for 1986-87.

Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the submission made to him by the Society of Civil and Public Servants and the Civil and Public Services Association about the staffing of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise on value added tax work; and what his response was.

Mr. Brooke: The staffing of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise is kept under regular review and the unions' views are one of the elements to be taken into account in assessing the Department's manpower requirements for the years ahead.

Consumer Goods

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set up an inquiry into the extent to which building society advances, subject to tax relief, are used for the purchase of consumer goods; and if will he make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. The National Audit Office reported the results of an intensive examination of the Inland Revenue's operation of the MIRAS scheme earlier this year. In any case, building society advances are generally eligible for tax relief only if they are used for the purchase or improvement of the borrower's main residence. The NAO report showed that compliance check by the Inland Revenue revealed that only a very small proportion of loans had been receiving relief to which the borrower was not entitled.

European Monetary System

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of (a) the benefits and (b) the disadvantages which would accrue to the United Kingdom economy from linking sterling to the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: A memorandum was submitted by Her Majesty's Treasury to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee during the course of its inquiry into the financial and economic consequences of United Kingdom membership of the European Communities (13th report, Session 1984-85, volume II). I have nothing to add to the considerations discussed therein.

EC (UK Contribution)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the net contribution which the United Kingdom will make to the European Economic Community in 1986.

Mr. Brooke: The latest estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the European Economic Community's budget in 1986 is given in table 3 of the statement on the 1986 Community budget (Cmnd. 9907) published on 3 October. A copy is available in the House of Commons Library.

EC (Expenditure)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest estimate of European Economic Community spending in 1986; and what is the maximum level of spending permitted under the revised own resources base as agreed at the Fontainebleau European Council.

Mr. Brooke: Community spending in 1986 is governed by the 1986 Community budget. The budget as adopted uses up virtually all the available Community own resources within the 1·4 per cent VAT ceiling. Details of the 1986 budget are given in the statement on the 1986 Community budget, Cmnd. 9907.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the anticipated yield, for the current tax year, of capital gains tax, including tax on companies' chargeable gains; and how much of that revenue would be lost if 6 April 1982 was to be taken as the new base date, so that when assets were acquired before that date they could be treated as having been actually acquired for the market value on that date, as well as having the indexation allowance based on that value and how much of the anticipated revenue would be lost if gains were fully indexed to April 1965.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The estimated yields in 1986-87 from capital gains tax and corporation tax on gains are £1,050 million and £800 million respectively. Possibly about one-half of this revenue would be lost it the tax base was limited to gains accruing from April 1982, or if gains were fully indexed to April 1965.

"Official Report"

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for how long copies of Hansard are retained in print; if he will take steps to ensure that a stock of all editions is maintained for at least five years from the date of publication; what is the daily print run; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The print run of the Daily Part is normally 4,750 and larger print runs are made if justified by expected demand. HMSO also prints some 1,500 copies of the Weekly Hansard and around 1,000 copies of the Bound Volumes. To economise on expensive storage space, the daily and weekly editions are not retained beyond one year after the end of the Session, but the Bound Volumes are normally retained for 10 years.

Personal Incomes (Budget Effects)

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the gain per individual arising from each relevant component of the 1986 Budget, both at current prices and net of indexation for those at one half and three-quarters of average earnings, average earnings, and one and a half, two, five and 10 times average earnings; and if he will provide comparable figures for each budget since 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1986, c. 810]: The information is in the tables. Further information could be supplied only at disproportionate costs.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Broadcasting Interference, Eastcote

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he has taken to stop the interference caused by an amateur radio transmitter to the reception of television and radio programmes and telephone conversations by the residents of Tudor Close, Eastcote, Middlesex; and whether he is still receiving complaints about such interference.

Mr. Butcher: Since it has proved impossible to resolve complaints from Tudor close residents, my right hon. Friend has proposed that the terms of the radio amateur's licence be varied. Solicitors acting for the amateur have made representations on his behalf and have expressed their intention to make further oral representations, but wish to have an expert to carry out certain tests before doing so. These tests will be carried out on 27 October in the presence of officials of the Department's radio investigation service. The amateur's station is closed down pending the outcome of the licence variation proceedings and no complaints have been received from local residents since this closure took effect on 8 October.

I hope that it will be possible to find an early and permanent solution to this difficult problem.

Railways (Noise)

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made towards the draft European Community Directive on Noise Emission from railway vehicles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The text of the draft directive in noise emissions from rail mounted vehicles was last discussed in Brussels at a Council working group held on 6 June 1984. At this meeting the United Kingdom presented a reasoned case why the text as proposed would not achieve its aim of improving the environment. It further argued that the major remedy for excessive railway noise lies in better track and rolling stock maintenance and attention to the topography of the line, all of which are within the power of member state actions without in any way presenting barriers to trade. An Article 100 directive was therefore unnecessary.

This argument was accepted by the EEC Commission and other member states with the result that this Directive is unlikely to be further pursued.

Copyright

Mr. Absc asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the retrospective protection to be given to United States copyright works by South Korea will also be extended to United Kingdom works; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: The United Kingdom is continuing to press Korea on this point. My hon. Friend the Minister for Trade raised the matter with the Korean Vice-Minister for Trade and Industry, Mr. Hong, when he met him in London last week.

Coventry Climax

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the full purchase price for Coventry Climax was paid to British Leyland before Coventry Climax went into receivership; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Rover Group's interests are fully protected. It would be inappropriate for me to comment further whilst the receiver is attempting to secure bids for the three businesses involved.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give a breakdown of the consortium which purchased Coventry Climax for British Leyland in 1981; what financial securities were offered to British Leyland as part of the sale; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Coventry Climax was acquired by Climax Holdings Ltd. I am not able to provide information beyond that which can be obtained from returns filed at Companies House, or otherwise released by the company. The Rover Group's financial interest is fully protected, and the details are a matter for the parties concerned.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the performance of Coventry Climax for 1975 to 1981 and 1981 to 1986, covering output, employment, turnover and profit/loss.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I am not able to provide information beyond that which can be obtained from returns filed at Companies House or otherwise released by the company.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the agreed purchase price when Coventry Climax was privatised from British Leyland; on what date the sale was agreed; what arrangements were made for the payment to British Leyland of the agreed price; if those arrangements were honoured; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the reacquisition of Coventry Climax by British Leyland, and the restoration of manning levels to pre-1981 levels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Government have no such plans and have received no such proposals from the Rover Group.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps his Department is taking to assist Coventry Climax following receivership.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My Department stands ready to consider any proposals put forward by the receiver or by any prospective purchaser of all or part of the business.

Steel

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what was the total volume of steel produced in the United Kingdom in the first nine months of 1986; and how this compares with the position for the first nine months of 1985 and 1979;

(2) what was the total volume of steel produced in 1985; and how he expects production in 1986 to compare with that figure.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The available information is as follows. Production in first nine months of 1986 was depressed by the scheduled relining of the Redcar blast furnace at the British Steel Corporation's Teeside Works. This furnace returned to normal operations in September.

Total crude steel production in United Kingdom

(a) No estimate available for full year.

Self Changing Gears

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the agreed purchase price when Self Changing Gears was privatised from British Leyland; what arrangements have been made for the payment of that agreed price; what sanctions are available if those arrangements are not honoured; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The sale of Self Changing Gears Ltd. to the Cummins Engine Company was completed on 16 May 1986. The financial arrangements are matters for the parties concerned, and Government approval was not required.

Used Cars

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will seek to amend the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 to (a) introduce specific controls to outlaw the practice of clocking secondhand cars, (b) close the loopholes which exist concerning sales of unroadworthy vehicles, (c) provide a licensing scheme for car auctions and (d) make the supply of pre-sales information a mandatory requirement on all sellers of used cars.

Mr. Howard: I have no present plans to amend the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 in the manner suggested. The "clocking" of a used car odometer is already an offence under the 1968 Act. The sale of unroadworthy vehicles is governed by the Road Traffic Acts. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is currently considering suggestions for strengthening enforcement of that legislation. My own Department is considering a discussion paper prepared by enforcement authorities on the merits of licensing used car auctions. The introduction of a mandatory requirement to supply a pre-sales information report on used cars offered for sale has been considered by my Department on a number of occasions and rejected.

There would be major problems in devising criteria sufficiently objective to form the basis of a criminal offence and effective enforcement of the requirement would be likely to place a very heavy burden on enforcement resources.

Consumer Protection

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take immediate steps to remove Crown immunity from those establishments run by his Department subject to consumer protection and environmental health laws; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: No; our policy on Crown immunity is to consider every case on its merits. If we have evidence of particular circumstances which give cause for concern I shall consider, with colleagues, how best to deal with these circumstances. This may, as in the case of hospital catering, lead to a reappraisal of Crown immunity.

Nissan

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion and value of plant and equipment being purchased for the Nissan car plant is manufactured in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information in the precise form requested is not available. However, up until September 1986, capital expenditure in the United Kingdom on the Nissan project has amounted to £43·5 million which represents 84 per cent. of the total expenditure so far.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has been involved in any discussions with the Nissan Motor Co. in the Houghton and Washington constituency regarding United Kingdom companies and tendering for materials in the manufacturing process.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 24 October 1986]: Nissan's individual purchasing decisions are a commercial matter for the company themselves. However, it is the mutual objective of Nissan and the Government that the Sunderland project should contribute to the development of long-term collaboration between Nissan and the local components and other supplying industries. Nissan intend to provide the maximum practicable opportunity for local manufacturers to compete for orders and we naturally encourage this.

Fireworks

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps are being taken by his Department to educate children and parents about the dangers of fireworks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Loan Companies

Mr. Michael Cocks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will review the law controlling the activities of private loan companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The Consumer Credit Act 1974 provides both important safeguards for consumers who enter into credit agreements, and a system of licensing of loan companies, credit grantors and credit brokers administered by the Director General of Fair Trading. Other laws provide additional protection in this area, particularly against harassment of debtors. I believe that existing legislation provides a comprehensive framework of protection for consumers but if the hon. Member is aware of undesirable practices not covered by existing legal controls I should be willing to consider whether further action is desirable.

Merseyside

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what percentage of the total regional development grant received in the Merseyside special development area in each of the years 1981 to 1985, inclusive, was paid to firms investing (a) within the county of Merseyside and (b) within the city of Liverpool;

(2) what was the total payment of regional development grant to firms investing in the Merseyside special development area in each of the years 1981 to 1985, inclusive; and what were the comparable figures for those investing (a) within the county of Merseyside, and (b) within the city of Liverpool in each of those years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

United States

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give the statistics on trade between the United Kingdom and the United States of America for the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is as follows:

United Kingdom trade with the United States of America
£ millions

	Imports	Exports
1981	6·048	6·258
1982	6·624	7·475
1983	7·497	8·486
1984	9·368	10·159
1985	9·926	11·519

Geevor Tin Mine

Mr. Harris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is in a position to make a statement on the consultants' report on Geevor tin mine.

Mr. Giles Shaw: On 8 April 1986, immediately after the mine had ceased production and the majority of the workers laid off, Geevor applied for selective financial assistance to fund a large project designed to improve its competitive position. This followed the sharp fall in the tin price after the International Tin Council ceased its operations on the tin market last October. After careful examination of this application, the Department of Trade and Industry met Geevor on 30 April and explained that the project did not put the company into a viable situation. The cost per job of supporting Geevor's project would have been very expensive indeed. To provide time for Geevor to prepare a revised application for assistance, the Department made a grant of £40,000, matched with a grant of £40,000 from Cornwall county council to pay for a month's care and maintenance of the mine during May. The company's revised application was rejected on 2 June, because the proposals still did not offer sufficiently robust prospects of commercial viability to justify financial assistance on the scale requested.

After further discussions with Geevor, the Department offered on 2 July to pay for an independend consultation to study whether the mine's production costs could be reduced to a competitive level. The company accepted the Department's offer on 14 August. The Department and Geevor agreed the terms of reference for the consultant's study, the DTI making available technical expertise and Geevor giving full support to the study.

The consultant's report was sent to Geevor on 13 October, when the Department also offered Geevor a joint meeting with the consultants do discuss the report. On 21 October, the chairman of Geevor informed the Department that as the minimum cost of producing tin at Geevor mentioned in the report, is equivalent to a tin price of over £8,200 per tonne he did not consider the matter should be pursued. The Department replied on 23 October saying that the Government accepted his view that the consultant's report did not provide the basis on which a viable plan for developing Geevor could be put forward. Accordingly, the Department informed the company, with regret, that financial assistance could not therefore be made available to Geevor, since viability is one of the essential requirements for providing selective financial assistance under the Industrial Development Act 1982.

Teats (Safety Regulations)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will review the safety regulations concerning materials used in the teats of babies' bottles and dummies; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he has any plans to ban the use of silicone substitutes in the teats of babies' bottles and dummies; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he has any plans to seek the incorporation of World Health Organisation standards on the composition of materials used in babies' teats in a new British Standard; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, Friday 24 October 1986]: I am aware of the recent publicity surrounding the possible choking hazard caused by babies' dummies and bottle teats made of silicone rubber and my Department is investigating. Meanwhile the main manufacturers and distributors have voluntarily withdrawn these products from sale.

The Babies' Dummies (Safety) Regulations 1978 lay down requirements on the materials and construction of dummies and rely on British Standard 5239: 1975 for technical specifications. Following the recent allegations the British Standards Institution is reviewing the present standard and has initiated research by the Laboratory of the Government Chemist. The research findings may indicate a need for revision of BS 5239. Before a revised BS specification is agreed account will be taken of any other relevant standards including those of the World Health Organisation.

At present, babies' bottle teats are not subject to either a British standard or to safety regulations but the need will be reviewed following the action on dummies.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in Dundee are currently in receipt of supplementary benefit and how many are pensioners, heads of one-parent families, or unemployed.

Mr. Lyell: The city of Dundee is covered by two of the Department's offices, Dundee east and Dundee west, but their boundaries are not conterminous with those of the city. The numbers of people receiving supplementary benefit from those offices on 13 August 1986, the latest available figures, were as follows:

	Number
Unemployed	11,048
Over pension age	5,961
Others including one-parent families	7,214
Total	24,223

Source: 100 per cent. count of cases in action.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of pensioners who would now qualify for supplementary benefits if it were not for the payment of occupational pensions.

Mr. Major: The best estimate which we can give, based on information from the family expenditure survey, is that in 1984 some 1·1 million pensioners would have qualified for supplementary pension if they had not been in receipt of an occupational pension.

War Disability Pension

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many local housing authorities disregard wholly or partially war disability pension over and above the statutory £4 disregard, in assessing entitlement to rent rebate.

Mr. Lyell: I refer the hon. Member to my predecessor's reply to the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) on 29 April at column 387.

War Pensioners

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate (a) the number of war pensioners over retirement age and (b) the number of war pensioners over retirement age who receive supplementary benefit.

Mr. Lyell: It is estimated that at June 1986 about 133,000 war disablement pensioners including overseas war pensioners were over retirement age, and the information available suggests that about 1,500 were in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Elderly People (Care)

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of places provided for the elderly in both public sector and in privately-owned establishments in each of the last seven years.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS (General Managers)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the application of performance-related benefits for general managers in the National Health Service; if he will consider applying performance related benefits to other national Health Service workers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The scheme whereby general managers in the National Health Service are eligible for performance-related pay is innovatory. We shall therefore monitor its operation closely before taking any decisions about extending its application to other staff in the service. Under the present scheme, the performance of general managers will be assessed in April 1987 against pre-agreed objectives. The first payments under the scheme will not be made until September 1987.

Christie Hospital, Manchester

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action will be taken to correct the shortage of nurses at Christie hospital in South Manchester; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The North Western regional health authority is considering a request for funding extra nurses at Christie hospital. The right hon. Member may therefore wish to address his inquiries to the chairman of that authority.

Isobel Schwartz

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state (a) the terms of reference of the inquiry into Isobel Schwartz's death, (b) who is on the inquiry team, (c) whether it has begun its task, (d) when it is expected to complete its task, (e) whether its report will be published, and (f) who it will take evidence from.

Mrs. Currie: My right hon. Friend expects to be able to make an announcement about these matters shortly. The inquiry will be concerned with the care and after-care of Miss Sharon Campbell (who was charged with the murder of Miss Isobel Schwartz but found unfit to plead), and with the lessons to be learned. Its report will be published.

Maternal Deaths

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the maternal deaths registered in England and Wales in 1979 to 1984 were of women born in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the Republic of Ireland, (c) the New Commonwealth, (d) India, Pakistan, Bangladesh and Sri Lanka, (e) the West indies, (f) Africa, (g) Gibralter, Malta and Cyprus, (h) new commonwealth countries not included in (a) to (h) and (j) country unstated; and if he will subdivide these into (i) direct maternal deaths, (ii) indirect maternal deaths, (iii) fortuitous maternal deaths and (iv) late maternal deaths.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

National Association of Young People in Care

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether a decision has yet been reached on the application by the National Association of Young People in Care for financial assistance over the next three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Waiting Lists

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give details of district health authorities with long and acute waiting lists; and what is being done to reduce such waiting lists.

Mr. Newton: Details of the numbers of cases on National Health hospital waiting lists in each district health authority by specialty, degree of urgency and length of time on the list are given in the "Hospital In-Patient Waiting List at 30 September 1985, England, District Summaries", a copy of which is in the Library. My right hon. Friend has launched a drive to make major improvements in waiting lists and waiting times. As a first step the chairmen of regional health authorities have been asked to lead their districts in a review to establish the extent, nature and cause of any problems. They have been asked for reports by the end of October setting out action already taken and proposals to make a significant impact in the future.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has made of the number of deaths attributable to drug abuse, particularly heroin addiction, in each of the past five years for which figures are available; and whether there is any discernible relationship between known or estimated length and level of addiction and age of death.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. R. J. Knight

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to be able to decide on the application of Mr. R. J. Knight for a formal determination on whether Mr. Knight was in employed earners employment on 5 May 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell: Mr. Knight made a formal application on 27 March 1986 to my right hon. Friend to decide whether he was in employed earners employment. The application was subsequently amended by Mr. Knight on 15 June 1986. A formal inquiry will be held shortly when Mr. Knight will be invited to give further evidence so that the facts of the case can be determined.

The timing of the result of this inquiry cannot be predicted, but normally a final decision can be expected within six months.

Diabetics (Syringes)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make blood glucose monitoring equipment and plastic syringes available on National Health Service prescription for diabetics.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Pharmacies

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the average cost to the National Health Service of £50,000 per year for each new pharmacy opened excludes the costs of any pharmacy opened under the essential small pharmacy scheme.

Mr. Newton: No.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the detailed breakdown of the on average up to £50,000 a year cost to the National Health Service of each new pharmacy opened as stated by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, Baroness Trumpington, in the House of Lords on 15 October 1986, Official Report, column 832.

Mr. Newton: The breakdown of the average cost to the National Health Service of each new pharmacy is estimated at:

Labour costs: £25,000 to £30,000 per annum.
Overhead costs and profit: £15,000 to £20,000 per annum.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give an assurance that the new regulations for the proposed pharmacists' contract do not interfere with the existing Clothier arrangements;

(2) whether under the proposed pharmacists' contract, the family practitioners committee pharmacists' subcommittee considering applications for pharmacists' in rural areas would prejudice the existing Clothier arrangements for dispensing doctors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The proposed new arrangements for allocating National Health Service pharmacy contracts and the arrangements for regulating dispensing in rural areas (the Clothier arrangements) would operate entirely independently of each other.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give an assurance that the enhanced essential small pharmacy scheme in the new pharmacists' contract is not applied to new incoming pharmacists that would replace existing dispensing doctors.

Mr. Newton: We have proposed no change to the existing arrangements which, in some circumstances, lead to a pharmacist providing a dispensing service that has previously been provided by a doctor and qualifying as an essential small pharmacy.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pharmacies dispensing less than 16,000 prescriptions will under the new proposed contract (a) be expected to apply for the essential small pharmacy scheme and (b) close.

Mr. Newton: The number of pharmacies expected to apply for enhanced payments under the new arrangements for the essential small pharmacies scheme is estimated at between 150 and 200.

There are no estimates of the number of pharmacies, dispensing fewer than 16,000 prescriptions a year, which may close after the new contract arrangements are introduced. The decision to relinquish a National Health Service contract is a commercial one for individual pharmacists in the light of their own particular circumstances.

Social Security Advisory Committee (Consultations)

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what organisations are regularly consulted by the Social Security Advisory Committee, the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council and the Occupational Pensions Board, respectively.

Mr. Major: When regulations are referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee, the committee generally initiates a consultation exercise in which all interested parties are invited to apply for copies of the consultation document and to submit representations. I understand that the committee maintains several lists of organisations with an interest in social security matters; a main list and six secondary lists grouped under subject headings. For each consultation exercise, organisations are selected from the secondary lists according to the subject of the regulations and a copy of the consultation document is sent to these selected organisations and to all those on the main list. All the lists are regularly updated and I have placed a copy of the current version in the Library, together with lists of the organisations regularly consulted by the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council and the Occupational Pensions Board.

National Insurance Scheme

Mr. Michael Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many civil servants administer the national insurance scheme.

Mr. Lyell: Some 27,000 of the Department's staff administer the national insurance scheme. Of these, approximately 20,000 are engaged in the calculation and payment of benefit, the remaining 7,000 being concerned with the collection and recording of contributions.

Ancillary Staff (Reimbursement)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will review the working of the ancillary staff reimbursement scheme in the National Health Service with a view to ensuring equality of treatment between unrelated and related staff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The Government are currently reviewing the matter with the general medical services committee of the British Medical Association and we await its response to proposals we have made.

Pensioners

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the percentage increase in the state retirement pension, the pensioners' price index, and the retail price index since (a) 1983, (b) 1979 and (c) 1974 taking into account his statement on benefit upratings on Wednesday 22 October.

Mr. Lyell: Figures have been given from November 1982 and November 1978 to reflect pension rates prevailing throughout most of 1983 and 1979 respectively. Since pension values can only realistically be compared when an uprating is implemented, the percentages in each case have been taken to July 1986.

	Percentage increase since:
	November (a) 1982	November (b) 1978	July (c) 1974
State retirement pension (single person)	17·8	98·5	287·0
Pensioners price index [1]	16·9	84·8	263·9
Retail price index	17·9	90·0	250·7

The percentage increase in the state retirement pension to April 1987 in each case will be: (a) 20·2, (b) 102·6, (c) 295·0.

[1] Final quarter indices used for 1982 and 1978, second quarter indices for 1974 and 1986.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take to inform pensioners of their entitlement to supplementary benefits and heating allowances.

Mr. Lyell: The Department already makes considerable efforts in this respect. A leaflet about supplementary benefit is issued to everyone making a claim for state retirement pension. The pension order book also includes information about the supplementary pension scheme. In addition, the Department provides an advice and information service which includes leaflets, posters and a freephone service.

An age-related heating addition is payable to a householder whose family contains someone aged 65 or over. The claim form also asks for information to enable entitlement to other heating additions to be considered.

Nurses

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take in the light of the report from the health advisory service indicating loss of morale among nurses working with the elderly and the mentally ill.

Mr. Newton: We received a copy of the health advisory service annual report earlier this month. The issues raised in it are under consideration by the Department.

Northern Region (Report)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take on the report from Professor Townsend on inequalities in health in the northern region.

Mr. Newton: The report "Inequalities in Health in the Northern Region" was commissioned by, and produced with the help of, the Northern regional health authority. I am sure that the authority is considering the report's implications, and will find it a useful aid in its own planning. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the Northern regional health authority for further information.

Maternity Grant

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements will be made to ensure that families expecting their first child and not in receipt of supplementary benefit can receive a maternity grant from the social fund before the expected date of confinement.

Mr. Lyell: People receiving income support or family credit (supplementary benefit or family income supplement in 1987-88) will be eligible for a maternity payment from the social fund, subject to a capital rule of £500. As we made clear in chapter 4 of the White Paper "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9691), people who qualify for one of those benefits on the birth of their child will be able to receive a payment at that stage. We intend to allow claims for such payments up to three months after the date of confinement.

Low Income Families

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to the answer given to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) on 25 July, Official Report, columns 711-12, he will give a detailed breakdown of the low income families tables, 1983, showing for each of the tables, and according to age and sex (a) the number of single persons under pensionable age, (b) those less than 20 years of age, (c) those between 20 and 29 years of age, (d) those between 30 and 44 years of age and (e) those over 45 years of age; and of the number over pensionable age: (i) those between 60 and 64 years of age, (ii) between 65 and 69 years of age, (iii) between 70 and 79 years of age and (iv) those over 80 years of age.

Mr. Lyell: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Geriatric Wards

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Security whether an adequate patient emergency bell alarm system is available in all the geriatric wards in the East Dyfed health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have been asked to reply. The provision of patient alarm systems is a matter for the health authority. I understand that all geriatric wards of East Dyfed health authority have patient/nurse call systems.

ENVIRONMENT

Merseyside Development Corporation

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the latest data on the expenditure to date of the Merseyside Development Corporation; and if these data can be divided as to whether the expenditure was undertaken on the Liverpool or Wirral side of the Mersey.

Mr. John Patten: Total Merseyside development corporation expenditure up to end September 1986 (the latest date for which accurate information is available) excluding staff, office and estate management expenditure was £112·860 million. Of this, £4·380 million has been spent in the Wirral part of the corporation's designated area.

Green Belt (Developments)

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the speech of the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldergrave), Minister of State, to the Confederation of British Industry conference on 14 October, indicating opposition to the development of retail store complexes in the green belt, represents Government policy.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes. My speech reaffirmed long-established policy on the protection of green belts.

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to issue guidance to local planning authorities about the development of retail store complexes in the green belt.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government's policy on development in green belt is set out in my Department's circular 14/84. The circular reaffirmed that there must continue to be a general presumption against inappropriate development within green belts.

Housing (Leicester)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much public money has been available to the Leicester city council for the provision and for the improvement, respectively, of public sector housing in each of the last 10 years for which records are available.

Mr. John Patten: I shall answer this question shortly.

Council Houses (Rent and Rates)

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average council house rent including rates in 1979; and what is the average rent and rates payment at the present time.

Mr. Tracey: The estimated average unrebated weekly rent for local authority dwellings in England was £6·41 in April 1979 and £16·36 in April 1986. Estimates of average rate bills for local authority dwellings are not available, but they are believed to be somewhat lower than the averages for all domestic properties, which are £3.00 weekly for 1979-80 and £7·70 for 1986-87.

County Hall (London)

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultation will take place with the London borough of Lambeth on (a) the future use of county hall and (b) the process of sale of county hall to private developers.

Mr. Chope: These are matters for the London residuary body to decide. Any change of use of county hall would be subject to statutory planning processes requiring in the first instance submission of planning application to the London borough of Lambeth.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy on the future use of county hall.

Mr. Chope: Any change of use of county hall would be subject to statutory planning processes. Comment by my right hon. Friend could prejudice his consideration of any planning applications that might come before him in due course.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether local authorities which sell land or buildings previously used for educational purposes to trusts running city technology colleges will be permitted to retain and use all the proceeds from such sales without penalisation through the rate support grant.

Mr. Chope: I shall answer this question shortly.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment by what process the annual report and account of the London residuary body for 1985-86 will be presented to Parliament.

Mr. Chope: In accordance with the provision of section 79(5) of and schedule 13(10) to the Local Government Act 1985.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) why the London borough of Westminster was chosen as paymasters for the London residuary body during the period 1985-86; what discussion on this matter took place with his Department; and what other London boroughs were offered the task;

(2) if charges made by Westminster council for its services to the London residuary body since August 1985 will be included in the annual report of the London residuary body.

Mr. Chope: These are matters for the London residuary body, which have not been the subject of discussions with the Department.

Councillor Margaret Hodge

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why councillor Margaret Hodge was first approached to join the London residuary body; and why she was not subsequently appointed to membership of it.

Mr. Chope: I am not aware of any approach to Councillor Hodge by my right hon. Friend or his predecessors in connection with the London residuary body. Councillor Hodge recently wrote to my right hon. Friend asking to be appointed as a member. She was informed that he sees no need at present to make further appointments to the body.

South Yorkshire Residuary Body

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the effects of a decision by the South Yorkshire residuary body to transfer factories from the ownership of former county councils to the private sector on the continuing eligibility of such factories for grants from the European regional development fund.

Mr. Chope: Assets transferred to the private sector are not normally eligible for grants from the European regional development fund.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will direct the South Yorkshire residuary body to transfer all the former county council's factories to the district councils under section 67 of the Local Government Act 1985.

Mr. Chope: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance has been given by his Department to the South Yorkshire residuary body in relation to proposed sales on the open market of factories constructed with European regional development grant funds; what has been the response to this guidance of the South Yorkshire residuary body; what further action he is taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Property guidance to all residuary bodies was issued by my Department on 7 August. The South Yorkshire residuary body is aware of the implications for ERDF funding of the sale of industrial estates on the open market.

Housing Investment Programme (Barnsley)

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now enter into talks with the local authority in Barnsley to increase its housing investment programme allocation for 1987-88.

Mr. Tracey: The Government's public expenditure plans for 1987-88 have not been finalised and therefore housing investment programme allocations for that year have not yet been made. Discussions about individual local authorities' housing needs take place each year with the Department's officials at regional level before HIP allocations are made. It would not be possible for the Secretary of State to conduct these meetings for all 366 English local authorities himself.

Portsdown Park, Portsmouth

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) why the Minister responsible for making the decision with regard to Portsmouth city council's proposal to refurbish the Portsdown Park estate made contact with members of the Conservative group on Portsmouth city council and officers of the council on 3 March with regard to the city's proposed refurbishment of the Portsdown Park estate; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what advice Portsmouth city council was given by his Department on ways to refurbish Portsdown Park which would not require Government approval;

(3) what correspondence passed between the Department and Portsmouth city council about Portsdown Park other than the decision letter dated 4 March; what telephone conversation took place on 3, 4 and 6 March; and if he will make a statement;

(4) why the Minister dealing with Portsmouth's application to refurbish the Portsdown Park estate advised that he could be surcharged or challenged in other ways if he approved Portsmouth's application.

Mr. John Patten: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Loan Companies

Mr. Michael Cocks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will request local authorities to take steps to prevent private loan companies from operating on their housing estates to pressurise tenants into taking out loans with them to exercise their right to buy their houses; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will introduce legislation prohibiting private loan companies from offering money to council house tenants to provide a deposit for the purchase of their houses under the Housing Act.

Mr. Tracey: No: council tenants must be free to take their own decisions about borrowing, but they should, of course, think carefully whether they can afford to buy. Tenants with the right to buy have the right to a mortgage from the landlord, subject to an income test. If the tenant is not entitled to a mortgage sufficient to enable him to buy outright, he has the option of purchase of shared ownership terms. I hope tenants will consider that option rather than extra borrowing.

Urban Aid Programme

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the maximum length of time which voluntary and community group projects can be financially supported under the urban aid programme in England and Wales; and how many projects are currently in their final year.

Mr. Tracey: Approvals for urban programme grant to projects run by voluntary or community groups in England are normally given for four years, although in certain cases funding may be renewed for up to two years. The urban programme is supporting about 3,450 such projects in 1986-87, of which about 1,000 are in their final year. The urban programme in Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Liverpool Inner Area Partnership Committee

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how often the Liverpool inner area partnership committee in each year has met since its inception; when it last met; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The partnership committee met seven times between its inception and 1981. Following the meeting in July 1981 the setting up of the Merseyside task force with the associated discussions between Ministers and Merseyside together with the regular discussions at official level has made the formal partnership mechanism less necessary.

Merseyside Task Force

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings he has had with the Merseyside task force this year; what matters were discussed; what plans it has for the future economic development of Merseyside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: There are regular contacts between Ministers and officials of the Merseyside task force on all aspects of the Department's business in Merseyside. The task force will continue its role in helping to promote the regeneration of Merseyside.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received in response to the Green Paper, "Paying for Local Government"; what percentage have been (a) broadly favourable (b) broadly unfavourable and (c) neutral to the proposals; whether the representations are likely to lead to his modifying the proposals; and if he will place such representations in the Library.

Dr. Boyson: Excluding those concerned exclusively with capital expenditure, my right hon. Friend has so far received more than 900 responses to the Green Paper. The deadline for submission of responses is 31 October, and we are still receiving representations. We shall produce a detailed analysis of the responses as soon as possible after the consultation period has ended.

DEFENCE

Grouse Season (Opening)

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total cost incurred on the race down the Thames of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd battalions of the Parachute Regiment to deliver grouse to the Savoy hotel on 12 August; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The Red Devils parachute display team, which is drawn from the three battalions of the Parachute Regiment, met the expenses concerned and there was no expenditure from Defence Votes. Its efforts raised £11,000 in sponsorship for the Soldiers', Sailors' and Airmen's Families Association and £11,000 for the Red Devils appeal fund towards the cost of its replacement aircraft.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total cost of the flight from Blackpool airport to the Royal hospital, Chelsea, by the Red Devils on 12 August, including the parachute drop of grouse.

Mr. Freeman: The Red Devils parachute display team used its own aircraft, which is financed from its own funds. There was no expenditure from Defence Votes.

United States-United Kingdom Lines of Communication Agreement

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review the classified status of the United Kingdom-United States lines of communication agreement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: No.

New Zealand

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he next expects to meet his New Zealand counterpart; and what subjects he expects to discuss.

Mr. Younger: I last met the New Zealand Defence Minister, Mr. O'Flynn, in London on 18 September, when we discussed a number of matters of mutual interest. We have no plans to meet again in the immediate future.

Falklands War

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his talks with the media on lessons to be learned from the Falklands war.

Mr. Stanley: Consultations with the media are continuing on the lines indicated in the Government's response in Cmnd. 9499 to the report of the study group on censorship.

Contractors (Fraud)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many cases of procurement fraud by defence contractors have been discovered in the last year; and what was the value.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In the last year a number of possible instances of fraud by defence contractors have been investigated. In five cases the Ministry of Defence police have referred the papers to the appropriate prosecution service. The value of these cases is about £0·5 million.

Chile

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if there have been any collaborative military exercises with Chile since June 1982.

Mr. Stanley: No.

Cyprus

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current annual cost of the sovereign base areas in Cyprus; and what proportion of this is incurred in foreign currency.

Mr. Stanley: The cost of the sovereign base areas alone is not available and could not be obtained except at disproportionate cost. However, the net cost to the defence budget of British armed forces in Cyprus as a whole is estimated to be £92 million in 1986-87 of which some 80 per cent. is likely to be incurred in foreign currency.

Mr. Andrew Dunlop

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence in what capacity Mr. Andrew Dunlop is working for his Department; what is his Civil Service status; if the normal rules of establishment have been waived in each case; for what duration he is employed; what are his duties; what payments he will receive from public funds; what is his grade; and what access to classified documents he is to be given.

Mr. Younger: Mr. Andrew Dunlop has been appointed as my special adviser. His role is to assist me on defence policy matters generally, with particular reference to their political aspects. His appointment has been made on the same basis as that of other special advisers, which is that for the period of his appointment he is a civil servant and is subject to the appropriate terms and conditions of service in force in the Civil Service. He will be paid by the Ministry of Defence at a rate on the grade 7 (principal) pay scale, currently £16,899 per annum. Mr. Dunlop has been subject to positive vetting and he will have access to official documents on a need-to-know basis.

Iran

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of (a) the Iranian and (b) the Iraqi military forces have received training in the United Kingdom in each of the years 1981 to 1986; and what was the nature of their training.

Mr. Freeman: Some members of the Iraqi armed forces received training at Ministry of Defence establishments in the United Kingdom in each of the years 1981 to 1986. A small number of Iranian military personnel also received training at defence establishments in the United Kingdom from 1981 until the financial year 1983-84. It is not our policy to reveal the details of training provided to foreign armed forces since such agreements are confidential between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments concerned.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Group of Five

Mr. Dixon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next intends to meet his colleagues in the Group of Five.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Finance Ministers of the Group of Five nations meet from time to time.

Official Report (Price)

Mr. Hind asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the price of the Official Report.

Mr. Peter Brooke: Following a review by Her Majesty's Stationery Office, I have authorised an increase of 45p in the price of the daily part, with corresponding increases in the prices of weekly parts, indexes, Standing Committee debates, bound volumes and subscription rates. The scale of charges for reprints of Members' speeches appearing in the Official Report will also be raised. Despite these increases, Hansard will still receive a substantial subsidy.

ENERGY

British Coal

Sir Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give figures for total deep mine revenue output, number of pits, average men on colliery books and average revenue output per man shift for the latest convenient date and for February 1984 for each of British Coal's areas, in the same manner as in the reply of the Minister of State to the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) on 24 July, Official Report, column 358.

Mr. David Hunt: I am advised by British Coal that the total deep mine revenue output, number of pits, average men on colliery books and average revenue output per man shift for each area for the fiscal month of September 1986 and the fiscal month of February 1984 were as follows:

Area	Revenue Output (000 tonnes)	Number of Pits	Average Man-power	OMS (tonnes)

DEFENCE

NATO—Warsaw Pact (Balance of Forces)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what use his Department makes of the United States system of armoured division equivalents in assessing the balance of forces between the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the Warsaw Pact; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The system of armoured division equivalents is not used in the assessment of the balance of the military forces of East and West, as presented in successive "Statements on the Defence Estimates". The difficulty of calculating the balance using this and other methods is described on pages 58-59 of volume I of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1986".

Gibraltar

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence why the ground-to-air missiles installed in Gibraltar during the crisis between the United States of America and Libya have been dismantled; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: It is not our practice, for security reasons, to comment on the detailed factors governing the deployment of defence assets at particular locations.

Single Role Minehunter

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to be able to place further orders with Vosper Thorneycroft for the single role minehunter.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The timing of future minehunter orders has yet to be determined.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Companies (Investigations)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will describe the process under which applications for investigations of companies under section 447 of the Companies Act 1985 are considered for approval or refusal; what criteria are used; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will describe the sources and nature of applications made for investigations of companies under section 447 of the Companies Act 1985 and similar applications made under former legislation; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what statistics are available about investigations undertaken by his Department's companies investigation branch in recent years, including statistics of the outcomes of such investigations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to the "Handbook of the Companies Inspection System" and the annual reports on companies, both published through Her Majesty's Stationary Office, which give information and statistics concerning the use of section 447 of the Companies Act 1985 and its predecessor, section 109 of the Companies Act 1967.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a list showing the numbers of staff, by grade, in his Department's companies investigation branch in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: In January the Secretary of State announced increases in the staff of the companies investigation branch to take place over a period of two years. Those increases are being implemented.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will describe and name the management information systems used in his Department's companies investigation branch, stating the timing and contents of each report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The companies investigation branch uses internal systems and controls to assist management. These are reviewed regularly. Broadly, these systems record details of applications for investigation of companies, and monitor progress of casework and expenditure, on monthly, quarterly and annual bases.

The annual report on companies published through Her Majesty's Stationery Office gives detail of the handling of applications, and expenditure.

Ault and Wiborg, Perivale

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of the Ault and Wiborg paint factory, Perivale.

Mr. Howard: The proposed acquisition by Berger, Jenson and Nicholson Ltd. of certain assets of the Ault and Wiborg Group plc is currently being examined by the Office of Fair Trading. If the proposal is found to qualify for investigation under the terms of the Act, my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will decide, in the light of advice from the Director General of Fair Trading, whether it should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission for further investigation.

AIDS

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what contact his Department has had with the Association of British Insurers on matters relating to acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: My Department has, as part of its normal functions, kept in touch with the Association of British Insurers about the issues raised by the spread of AIDS for the life insurance industry, those seeking life assurance and more generally.

Wine (Sale)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he has now discussed with members of the licensed trade the introduction of legislation to enforce the sales of wine by measured glass and by reference to volume as agreed with the trade on the voluntary code of practice; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what the most recent survey shows of the compliance of the code of conduct on the sales of wine displaying the price and precise volume by the licensed trade.

Mr. Howard: A local authority survey submitted to the Department last autumn showed that 43·4 per cent. of premises visited were using glass sizes agreed in accordance with the provisions of the voluntary code of practice: 16·2 per cent. of premises were clearly indicating both the quantity and price of wines offered for sale by the glass.

The Department has discussed with the code's trade sponsors the options for controlling sales of wine by the glass and has invited them to suggest ways in which voluntary adherence to the code can be improved.

Beer

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make a statement on his Department's recent work to ensure that beer is served in full measure and that the head of froth is not paid for;

(2) what regulations are being discussed between his Department and the brewing and licensing trades to establish lined beer glasses in order to facilitate the serving of fair and full measures, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The Department has been considering representation on the "froth on beer" issue for some time. In the Department's view a combination of self-regulation by the trade and revised regulations for capacity measures offers the best way forward. A consultation paper on proposed new regulations was, therefore, circulated to interested parties last April. Copies are available in the House of Commons Library. In parallel with this initiative the Brewers' Society has been preparing guidance notes for publicans on the dispensing of draught beer.

The comments received on the consultation paper are currently being considered by the Department and a statement on possible changes to the regulations would not, therefore, be appropriate at this stage.

Furniture (Fire Resistance)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to review the regulations covering the fire resistance of fabrics used in the manufacture of household furniture; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 24 October 1986]: The present regulations relating to upholstered furniture specify resistance to smouldering cigarettes and labelling to indicate the result of a match flame test, not for the fabric alone, but for the combined upholstery. As stated in my reply to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) on 1 July, at column 465, the industry is developing a code of practice, which it is to complete not later than November 1987, on which legislation introducing a requirement for match flame resistance will be based. I have no other plans to introduce legislation on the fire resistance of the fabrics used in the manufacture of furniture.

Coventry Climax Ltd.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the agreed purchase price when Coventry Climax was privatised from British Leyland; on what date the sale was agreed; what arrangements were made for the payment to British Leyland of the agreed price; if those arrangements were honoured and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 27 October 1986]: BL (now the Rover Group) disposed of Coventry Climax Ltd. on 9 December 1981. The financial arrangements are matters for the parties concerned. I can tell the hon. Member that BL's 1981 report and accounts show that this was one of a number of assets sold in that year. The value of the combined sales totalled £53 million.

Fireworks

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps are being taken by his Department to educate children and parents about the dangers of fireworks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 27 October 1986]: This year the Government are mounting a vigorous firework safety campaign, the aim of which is to persuade all users of fireworks, and especially children, to follow the firework code. Parents are being encouraged to take their children to organised displays rather than to set off fireworks at home, and advised, if they do still prefer private parties, to take special care. In addition, shopkeepers are being warned that if they sell fireworks to the under-16s they are liable to a £2,000 fine or three months imprisonment, and the police have been asked to be particularly alert to the problem of fireworks being thrown about in the street.

PRIME MINISTER

Westland plc (Report)

Q62. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if, in the light of the fourth report from the Defence Committee on Westlands, she will dismiss Mr. Charles Powell from her Private Office.

The Prime Minister: No.

Princethorpe, Rugby

Q94. Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to make an official visit to Princethorpe, near Rugby.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Cruise Missiles

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Prime Minister if she will urge the United States Administration not to breach the SALT 2 treaty limits by installing this November the 131st B-52 strategic bomber with nuclear tipped cruise missiles without any compensating reductions in other strategic launch systems; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: As I told the House on 3 June, we regard it as important that the SALT 2 agreement continues to be observed by both sides.

Missiles

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Prime Minister if she will invite the Administration of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to negotiate the abolition of their anti-ballistic missile systems sited around Moscow in exchange for a reduction in the number of Trident missile-based nuclear warheads planned for deployment by Her Majesty's Government; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No.

Engagements

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 28 October.

Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 28 October.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 28 October.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 28 October.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty The Queen.

EMPLOYMENT

Cash and Running Costs Limits

Mr. Knox asked the Paymaster General whether any changes will be made to his Department's cash limits or running costs limits for 1986-87

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the following changes will be made.

The cash limit on class VII, vote 1 will be reduced by £9,373,000 from £1,309,496,000 to £1,300,123,000. This is mainly due to reduced expenditure on the community programme and the new workers scheme, reflecting slightly lower than anticipated take up of both schemes.

The cash limit on class VII, vote 3 will be increased by £5,000,000 from £62,005,000 to £67,005,000 to make additional provision for publicising Department of Employment group services. The reduction on vote 1 offsets the cost both of this increase and of increased expenditure of £4 million by the unemployment benefit service, which the Department of Employment operates as the Department of Health and Social Security's agent. The £4 million increase is matched by receipts from the DHSS (class XV, vote 5). Further increased expenditure of £2,650,000 by the UBS on class VII, vote 3 for claimant advisory work is also met by receipts from class XV, vote 5.

As a result of the overall increase of £6,650,000 in the operating costs of the UBS, the Department of Employment's gross running costs limit on class VII, vote 3 is increased from £384,588,000 to £391,238,000 and consequently the total for the Department of Employment group as a whole is increased from £885,248,000 to £891,898,000.

There is no net increase in public expenditure resulting from these changes.

National Council for Vocational Qualifications

72. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Paymaster General what steps he is taking to ensure that special interests, women, ethnic minorities and the disabled will be adequately represented on the proposed National Council for Vocational Qualifications.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The membership of the National Council for Vocational Qualifications was announced on 1 October 1986. Members were appointed on a personal basis and not as representatives of particular bodies or interests. I am concerned that the council should take full account in its work of the interests of women, ethnic minorities, disabled people and others with special needs, and I am confident that it will establish effective arrangements for doing so.

73. Mr. Colvin asked the Paymaster General when he expects the new National Council for Educational Qualifications to be operative.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The National Council for Vocational Qualifications was established as a company limited by guarantee on 17 September. It held its first council meeting on 13 October.

New Businesses (Avon)

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Paymaster General what has been the net change in the number of businesses in the county of Avon between 1979 to 1983.

Mr. Trippier: The number of businesses registered for VAT in the county of Avon is estimated to have increased by around 2,000 between the end of 1979 and the end of 1983.

Restart

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what percentage of those starting on the restart programme complete the full week.

Mr. Lee: On the basis that this question relates to the one week restart course, which is part of the restart programme, the information is not available in the form requested. However, the average attendance on restart courses is just over four days per participant.

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General if he proposes to increase the period spent on the restart programme from one week; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: On the basis that this question relates to the restart course, which is part of the restart programme, there are no plans to increase the length of restart courses. However, participants may return on one day a week, for up to 13 weeks for further support and guidance.

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what follow-up his Department proposes to conduct to assess the effect of the restart programme on its participants.

Mr. Lee: A full evaluation of the restart pilot programme will be available later this year. In addition, the Manpower Services Commission will conduct a study of a sample of restart participants in order to follow their experiences during the 12 months following their restart counselling interview.

Unemployment and Training (Swindon)

Mr. Coombs asked the Paymaster General what was the total number of people benefiting from special employment and training measures at the latest available date in the Swindon constituency; and if he will list the measures and the numbers affected in each case.

Mr. Lee: Some 3,400, although because of the various bases on which local information is collated an unknown proportion will be in areas outside the Swindon constituency. The numbers in each scheme are as follows:

	Numbers
Adult training	231
Community industry	84
Community programme	1,185
Enterprise allowance scheme	491
Job release schemes	133
Job splitting scheme	1
New workers scheme	153
YTS	1,095
Young workers scheme	10

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General if he will update his answer to the hon. Member for Newham, North-East of 18 February column 181 regarding YTS qualifications; and if he will make a statement.
